Yet older was the civilization of Egypt. Old when the ignorant Israelites heard the voice of an angry God in the thunder clouds of Sinai; old when the barbarian Abraham sought to appease a cruel divinity by the sacrifice of his son; old when the God Christians profess to adore was but one among many gods Abraham's fathers worshiped, and not yet selected for their chief—mistress of sciences and arts since lost. What mighty engins were employed in building those wondrous pyramids that still stand, defying time, centuries, and ages, after the work of subsequent civilizations hav crumbled into dust! What marvelous chemistry preserved the bodies of the builders and has kept them perfect to this day! What knowledge of other worlds taught them to map out with accuracy the starry spheres! Surely there was civilization in Egypt when, in times of famin, the perishing of other nations flocked to her as the land of plenty, and were fed. Surely there was civilization there where from all quarters of the globe scholars gathered to compare and exchange their knowledge. Surely there was civilization in the country that possessed the most complete library the world has ever seen. There was—but there is not. The doom of Egyptian civilization was sealed when the early Christian converts fled from her cities to the deserts, shunning the society of their fellow-men to dwell with wild beasts that they might find a lasting habitation with Jesus in a world to come.

Antedating probably even that of Egypt were two civilizations which hav continued to our own time, those of India and China. Cruel efforts hav been made and are making to introduce Christianity among those innocent people. Scattered over the earth to-day there are about two hundred millions of Christians of various sects. In India and the East there are three hundred million Buddhists. Among them a few ignorant peasants hav become so-called converts to Christianity. In our own land Christian men and women of culture and high thought are abandoning the teachings of Jesus for those of Buddha, and finding in Zeus Chrishna the original of Jesus Christ. Others, believing themselvs to be still Christians, are being led by the natural liberality of their own minds to so humanize their faith that they seek Nirvana and call it heaven. If there is more of mildness, beauty, and truth in the teaching of Jesus than in that of Moses, it is owing to the fact that, between the two, Buddhist principles had spread until they struck on Jewish hearts. If Christianity to-day is more liberal, more refined, and more moral than it was six centuries back, it is because the voice of humanity has been making itself heard, speaking truths that Buddha spoke.

We are sometimes told that civilization follows Christianity because that religion teaches us our duties to each other. All that is good in its teaching is summed up in the sentence, "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you." Shall we send missionaries to teach this as a new commandment to the Chinese, who read the writings of Confucius —whose ancestors, five centuries before Jesus is said to hav been born, read therein: "Do unto another what you would hav him do unto you, and do not to another what you would not hav him do unto you. Thou needest this law alone. It is the foundation of all the rest."

As men become civilized, they cast off the beliefs, the habits, and customs of savage life, and develop the good which is within themselvs. They discover truth by science, and apply their discoveries to useful purposes by art. Christianity has ever opposed science, and if at times she has encouraged art, it has been to render it subservient to her own ends. When she had most power, civilization was driven farthest back. In the Dark Ages, when she ruled, no progress was made to benefit mankind. None could be made, for every scientific discovery was subjected to scriptural test. Since then progress has kept pace with the retreat of Christianity before the advance of humanity. Civilization has reached the highest development it has yet attained in those spots where there is least faith. If we want Christianity practically regulating men's lives, we must seek it in the miserable shanty of the starving Irish peasant, or on the steps of some Italian church, where the lazy lazzaroni beg their bread. Christianity never elevated the condition of man. It never made him strive to win his rights, but taught him that was smitten on one cheek to turn the other to receive another blow. It never instructed him to preserve what he had gained, but commanded him to reward the robber who stole his coat by presenting him with his cloak. It never raised him from poverty by encouraging thrift and industry, but bade him take no thought for the morrow, and set for his example the lily of the field that "toils not, neither does she spin." As civilization advances, Christianity retires, the standard of the cross is lowered, the Bible criticised, its errors and its crimes brought to light, and over all rises in triumph the cultured reason of man.

Among the Heretics.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY is in poor health, and contemplates leaving England for awhile. He may visit America.

THE Melbourne Liberator is bringing out a series of biographies and pictures of prominent Freethinkers. The Christians hav not yet got Mr. Symes into jail for his heresy, though they are trying hard.

THE Spiritualist camp-meetings are better attended this year than on any previous year, and there seems to be more of them. The report of the Seybert commission has not shaken the faith of a great many—none that we hav heard of.

MR. G. W. FOOTE, of the Freethinker, is now under the Christian harrow. One of the stories told about him by the Christians is that he deserted his wife in June, 1876. Mr. Foote was not married until March of the following year.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL and family are trying to keep cool at Marblehead, Mass. Though Mr. Ingersoll has not lectured for many months, the Christians hate him as heartily as ever. This is a certificate to the continued good character of Mr. Ingersoll.

IN the Texas Prohibition campaign, Mr. Shaw, of the Independent Pulpit, was with the "Anti's." Now that the election is over and the temper of the combatants has cooled, he proposes to discuss the question with a view to its possible future agitation.

MR. THOMAS WALKER, a Freethought lecturer of Australia, has begun the monthly publication of an illustrated journal named the Republican. The first number contained Colonel Ingersoll's oration on the Declaration of Independence. The advocates of a republican government for Australia are numerous.

SALADIN, of the Secular Review, has been summering on the Clyde river. Mr. Ross is a Scotchman who loves his rugged country, however much he hates her superstition. No doubt his Scotch ancestry has much to do with his strong writing. Scotchmen are noted for expressing their opinions with vigor, if not always with tolerance.

DR. GEORGE W. BROWNE, of Rockford, Ill., was one of the pioneers of Kansas liberty. He went to Kansas in 1855, and in Lawrence established the Herald of Freedom. Twice was his office sacked by a mob; he was imprisoned, and for months lived in daily fear of assassination. He is a vigorous Infidel writer, and his researches into ancient history are extensiv.

THE New Thought prints an old-fashioned Catholic curse as the one sent over by Pope Leo XIII. for the benefit of Dr. McGlynn. The New Thought has been misinformed. Dr. McGlynn was only expelled from the church—excommunicated, not anathematized. Even Catholic church authorities hav too much fear of public opinion to proclaim such an apostolic malediction as Dr. Slop astounded Tristam Shandy's Uncle Toby with.

EVIDENTLY THE TRUTH SEEKER is appreciated in India. The organ of the Madras Secular Society, the Thinker, in its issue of July 10th reprints from our columns an article by J. L. Andrew, another article in which sympathy is expressed for God, and our London letter. In the next issue the Thinker reprints a section of "Tales Told Out of School." The Thinker is the only Freethought paper in India, and its editor possesses a judgment of great discriminating power.

THE Better Way, the successor to several defunct Spiritual papers, has the "original s'ate" upon which is written this message from H. W. Beecher: "My Dear Sir: It is something great in nature that spirits can return. I fondly idolize it. How great is the truth of Spiritual phenomena! I am assured that before long the world will giv more decided heed to them. I am advancing in Spiritual work, and will continue to take an interest in the welfare and progress of humanity." Mr. Beecher seems to hav passed on to the land of platitudes.

WHEN Elizabeth Cady Stanton returns from Europe, which will be soon, labor upon the Woman's Bible will be resumed, and its publication speedily follow. Mrs. Stanton has consulted the eminent scholars of Europe in her endeavors to do the Bible justice, and with their aid and that of the smart women over here, the Woman's Bible will be not alone an accurate Biblical commentary but a revelation of the dishonesty of other commentators and Christian apologists. We understand that the wit for the new work will be largely supplied by Helen H. Gardener.

WM. MCDONNELL, the author of "The Heathens of the Heath," "Exeter Hall," and "Beautiful Snow," is writing the "Remiscences of a Preacher" for the Investigator. Mr. McDonnell is a theologian of no mean ability, and was destined by his parents for the church. He is now interested in law and in railroads and other commercial enterprises, and is one of the capitalists of Canada. Besides his books, he has written operas, words and music, which hav been produced in Canadian theaters. He is short and thin in physique, and posscsses a nervous temperament.

DOCTOR MONROE, of the Ironclad Age, who always writes good-naturedly, though he is sometimes misunderstood, has his own theory of why Prohibition lost in Texas. It is this: "Religion killed it, as it does everything it heartily indorses. The ministers left their pulpits in some cases and canvassed the state for the measure. This made the people fly to their Bibles. They found that Jesus himself on one occasion had made a superior article of Bourbon whisky (then called wine) from plain water, using his miraculous power to effect the chemical transformation. And they very naturally concluded that the ministers were fighting the master and were becoming wise above that which is written. So they doubled up and voted Prohibition clear down. And now the average Texan, who is much given to religious fervor, but likes it with tansy, will continue to serve the Lord after the manner of his fathers."

Preaching and Practice.

From the Catholic News.

It might be well to add that everything taken from another paper should be credited, a rule which the Catholic News strictly adheres to. . . . The credit marks in a newspaper are a good index to its ability.

From the Evening Sun.

Yet, if the bright Catholic News is to be tested by its own standard thus set up, it is a less brilliant paper than many hav regarded it, for in its column of news headed, "Among the City Churches," we find that more than half had previously appeared in the Evening Sun, and is not credited. And it is news which cost the Evening Sun money and special effort to obtain.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

I.—Physical Maxims.

CHAPTER V.—SKILL.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

The organic faculties of each species of animals are marvelously adapted to its peculiar mode of life, but only in the lower creatures the skilful exercise of those faculties appears to be an inborn gift. The young bee builds its first hexagon with mathematical precision. The young ant needs no instructor to aid her choice of proper building-material, of proper food to be stored for winter use or distributed in the nurseries of the larvæ. The young butterfly, an hour after issuing from the shell of the chrysalis, can use its wings as well as at the end of the summer, and displays the same skill in steering its way through the maze of a tangled forest.

Young birds, on the other hand, have to acquire such accomplishments by long practice. Instead of driving them back to their nests, their parents encourage their attempts at longer and longer flights, and seem to know that occasional mishaps will prove a useful lesson for future emergencies. The mother fox carries half-crippled game to her burrow and sets her cubs a-scampering in pursuit, allowing the best runner to monopolize the tidbits. Young kittens practice mouse-catching by playing with balls; puppies run after grasshoppers, young squirrels play at nest-building by gathering handfuls of leaves and moss. A British naturalist, who had domesticated a young beaver, one day caught his pet building a dam across the floor of his study. The little engineer had dragged up a cartload of books, papers, sticks of wood, etc., and piled them up to best advantage, placing the heavier volumes in the bottom stratum and the lighter ones higher up, and filling out the interspaces with letters and journals. Every now and then he would "stand off" to scrutinize the solidity of the structure and return to mend a misarrangement here and there.

Children manifest early symptoms of a similar instinct. Infants of two or three years can be seen squatting in the sand, excavating tunnels, or building prairie-dog towns. Young Indians insist on the privilege of breaking colts; the youngsters of the Bermuda Islanders straddle a plank and paddle around with a piece of driftwood, if their parents are too poor to afford them a canoe of their own. To a normal American boy a tool-box is a more welcome present than a velvet copy of Doré's Illustrated Bible. Swiss peasant lads practice sharp-shooting with self-constructed cross bows. The old English law which required the son of a yeoman to practice archery for three hours a day was probably the most popular statute of the British code. On new railroads, bridges, etc., artisans, plying their trade in the open air, are generally surrounded by crowds of young rustics, who forego the pleasures of nutting and nest-hunting for the sake of watching the manipulations of a new handicraft. Even in after years the instinct of constructiveness frequently breaks the shackles of etiquette, and princes and prelates have defied the gossip of their flunkeys by getting a set of tools and passing whole days in the retirement of an amateur workshop. The emperor Henry I. invented a number of ingenious hunting nets and bird-traps. Mohammed II., the conqueror of Constantinople, forged his own chain armor. Charles V., the arbiter of Europe, preferred watchmaking to every other pastime. Cardinal de Retz delighted in the construction of automatons. Peter the Great was the best ship-carpenter of his empire.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

The English word king, like Danish kong and German koenig, are derived from koennen (practical knowledge), and the first ruler was the most skilful, as likely as the strongest, man of his tribe. Skill, whether in the sense of bodily agility or of mechanical cleverness, established the superiority of man over his fellow-creatures, and is still in many respects a test of precedence between man and man. Supreme physical dexterity is always at a premium, in peace as in war, in the sports of princes, in the pastimes of pleasure-seekers, in the adventures of travelers, in moments of danger, in camps, in the wilderness and on the sea, as well as in smithies and workshops. Conscious skill and agility form the basis of a kind of self-reliance which wealth can only counterfeit. In a cosmopolitan sea-port town of western Europe I once overheard a controversy on the comparative value of protective weapons. Revolvers, stilettos, air guns, slung-shots, and bowie knives found clever advocates, but all arguments yielded to the remark of an old sea-captain, who had faced danger in four different continents. "There's a use for all that, no doubt," said he, "but, I tell you, mynheers, in a close row the best thing to rely upon is a pair of quick fists." For the efficacy, even of the best weapons, depends to a large degree on the expertness of the handler, the panoply of a weakling being as unprofitable as the library of an idiot. "Presence of mind" is often only the outcome of such expertness, and in sudden emergencies theories are shamed by the prompt expedients of a practical man. In war the issue of a doubtful campaign has more than once been decided by the superior constructiveness of an army that could bridge a river while their opponents waited for the subsiding of a flood. The conquest of Canada was achieved by the skill of a British soldier who devised a plan for hauling cannon to the top of a steep plateau. The fate of the Byzantine empire was decided by the mechanical expedient of a Turkish engineer who contrived a tramway of rollers and greased planks, as an overland road for a fleet of war ships. By the invention of the chain grappling-hook Duilius transferred the empire of the Mediterranean from Carthage to Rome.

Even for the sake of its hygienic influence the development of mechanical skill deserves more general encouragement. Crank-work gymnastics are apt to pall, but in pursuit of a favorite handicraft even an invalid can beguile himself into a good deal of health-giving exercise, and, besides, the versatile development of the muscular system reacts on the functions of the vital organs, and thus explains the robust health of active mechanics often laboring under the disadvantage of indoor confinement. The poet Goethe, whose intuitions of practical philosophy rival those of Bacon and Franklin, records the opinion that every brain-worker should have some mechanical by-trade in order to obviate one-sidedness, and mental as well as physical debility. Every handicraft reveals by-laws of Nature which no cyclopedia can teach an inquirer; manual labor is a school of practical wisdom, and sound "common sense," as the English language happily expresses the sum of that wisdom, is a prerogative of farmers and mechanics far, far oftener than of speculative philosophers.

Nor are such benefits limited to emergencies from which wealth could dispense its possessor. An amateur handicraft is the best safeguard against the chief bane of wealth: ennui, with its temptations to folly and vice. Nabobs can do worse than imitate the example of Carlo Boromeo, who spent every leisure hour of his philanthropic life in practical landscape gardening, and turned a large, and once barren, lake-island into the loveliest paradise of southern Europe. "Heroum filii noxae." "the sons of the great are apt to be nuisances," would be less true if Goethe's advice were heeded by our fashionable educators, and the benefits of his plan would extend to emergencies for which fashionable accomplishments afford only a dubious safeguard. "A mechanical trade," says Jean Jacques Rousseau, "is the best basis of safety against the caprices of fortune. Classical scholarship may go begging, where technical skill finds its immediate reward. A distressed savant may recover his loss in the course of years; a skilful mechanic need only enter the next workshop and show a sample of his handiwork. 'Well, let's see you try,' the reply will be; 'step this way and pitch in.'"

Thus, too, gymnastic agility is the best safeguard against numberless perils A mother who hopes to protect her boy by keeping him at home and guarding him from the rough sports of his playmates, forgets that her apron-strings cannot guide him through the perils of after years; and a better plan was that of Cato, the statesman, warrior, and philosopher, who, in the midst of his manifold duties, found time to instruct his young sons in leaping ditches, and swimming rapid rivers, in order to "teach them to overcome danger that could not be permanently avoided."

C.—PERVERSION.

The absurd contempt of mechanical accomplishments is due partly to the direct influence of anti-physical dogmas, partly to the indirect tendency of that caste spirit which has for ages fostered the antagonism of wealth and labor. The opulent Brahmans of ancient Hindostan thought themselves so immeasurably superior to the children of toil that a Sudra was not permitted to approach a priest without ample precautions against the defilement of the worshipful entity. The temples of high-caste devotees were closed against low-caste believers. The very breath of a Sudra was supposed to pollute articles of food to such an extent that a Brahman had always to take his meals alone.

The secret of such prejudices was probably the supposed antagonism of body and soul and the imagined necessity of emphasizing that contrast by constant insults to the representatives of physical interests and occupations. For in Europe, too, the propagation of an anti-physical creed went hand in hand with the systematic depreciation of secular work, excepting, perhaps, the trade of professional manslaughter, the military caste, which here, as in India, found always means to enforce respect by methods of their own. During the most orthodox centuries of the Middle Ages industrial burghers were valued only as tax-payers; peasants were treated little better than beasts of burden—in many respects decidedly worse, for after drudging all day for an inexorable master, the serf had often to work by moonlight, in order to get a little bread for himself and his family. The proposition to join in any manual occupation (the handling of a whip, perhaps, excepted) would have been resented as a gross insult by every little baron or priest of Christian Europe. Paul Courier describes the indignation of a French nobleman who caught a tutor instructing his boys in botany and the secret of improving trees by grafting: "Going to make a clown of him? You had better get an assistant-teacher with a manure cart." The manual-labor dread of several medieval princes went to the length of employing special chamberlains for every detail of their toilet: a chief and assistant shirt-warmer, a wig-adjuster, a hand-washer, a foot-bather, a foot-dryer. German barons thought mechanical labor an incomparable disgrace—more shameful, in fact, than crime—for the same Ritter who would have starved rather than put his hand to a plow, had no hesitation in eking out an income by highway robbery. The princes of the church thought it below their dignity to walk afoot, and kept sedan-bearers to transport them to church and back. They kept writing and reading clerks, and now and then fought a duel by proxy, or sent a vicar to lay the corner-stone of a new court-house, in order to convey the impression that their spiritual duties left them no time for secular concerns.

That sort of other worldliness still seems to bias our plans of education. Colleges that would fear to lose prestige by devoting a few minutes a week to technical work or horticulture, surrender dozens of hours to the bullying propaganda of a clerical miracle-monger. Mechanical mastership (after all, the basis of all science) is denied a place among the honorable "faculties" of our high-schools. Fashionable parents would be shocked at the vulgar taste of a boy who should visit joiner-shops and smithies, instead of following his aristocratic friends to the club-house. They would bewail the profanation of his social rank, if he should accept an invitation to impart his skill to the pupils of a mechanical training-school; but would connive at the mental prostitution of a young sneak who should try to reëstablish a sanctimonious reputation by volunteering his assistance to the managers of a mythology-school.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

Neglected development, either of physical or mental faculties, avenges itself in ennui, modified, for the benefit of the poor, by the less monotonous afflictions of care. There is no doubt that the feeling of emptiness that seeks refuge in the fever of passion or intoxication, is a wholly abnormal condition, as unknown to the children of the wilderness, who never feel the craving of unemployed faculties, as to the truly civilized man, who finds means to satisfy that craving. Unemployed muscles, like idle talents, rebel against continued neglect and goad the sluggard to seek relief in the morbid excitement of vice, and the father who thinks it a waste of money to invest a dollar in a tool-box may have to spend hundreds for the settlement of rum bills and gambling debts.

Both the effect and the cause of such excesses were rather rare in the prime of the North American republic, when nearly every colonist was a farmer, and every farm a polytechnicum of home-taught trades; but European luxuries introduced European habits, and our cities now abound with plutocrats who are ashamed of the toil by which their forefathers laid the foundation of their wealth. Our cities have bred the vices faster than the refinements of wealth, and have become acquainted with ennui— and thousands who would fail to find relief on the classical hunting grounds of Peter Bayle might imitate his landlord, who practiced sharp-shooting with a medieval hunting-bow till he could challenge the best pistol shots of the neighboring garrison. In a choice of evils the most puerile game of skill is, indeed, clearly preferable to games of chance; but to that last resort of inanity the traditional aversion to manual employments has actually driven thousands of city idlers. Yet our American towns have never sunk to the abject effeminacy of European cities, where physical apathy has become a test of good breeding and a taste for mechanical accomplishments a stigma of eccentricity, and where, consequently, social prestige has to be purchased at the price of practical helplessness, of dependence in all mechanical questions of life on the aid and the judgment of hirelings.

We lack the word but have the thing;

Life-endangering accident may now and then illustrate the disadvantages of physical incapacity; a drowning bather may be inclined to admit that the saving influence of a swimming-school might compare favorably with that of the baptismal miracle tank; but the survivors will persist in relying on the vicarious omnipotence of coin, ignoring the clearest illustrations of the truth that physical incapacity avenges itself in every waking hour, even of the wealthiest weakling, while the guardian-spirit of Skill accompanies its wards from the workshop to the playground and follows them over mountains and seas.

E.—REFORM.

The growing impatience with the dead-language system of our monkish school-plan will soon lead to a radical reform of college education, and a fair portion of the time gained should be devoted to the culture of mechanical arts. For boys in their teens the "instinct of constructiveness" would still prove to retain enough of its native energy to make the change a decidedly popular one, as demonstrated by the success of the mechanical training schools that have attracted many pupils who have to find the requisite leisure by stinting themselves in their recreations. "Applied gymnastics" (riding, swimming, etc.) would be still more popular, and greatly lessen the yearly list of accidents from the neglect of such training.

The bias of fashion would soon be modified by the precedence of its leaders, as in Prussia, where the royal family set a good example by educating their princes (in addition to the inevitable military training) in the by-trade of some mechanical accomplishment (carpentry, sculpture, bookbinding, etc.), the choice of handicraft being optional with the pupil. No model residence should be deemed complete without a polytechnic workshop, furnished with a panoply of apparatus for the practice of all sorts of amateur chemical and mechanical pursuits—a plan by which the Hungarian statesman-author, Maurus Jockar, has banished the specter of ennui from his hospitable country seat. His private hobby is Black Art, as he calls his experiments in recondite chemistry, but any one of his guests is welcome to try his hand at wood carving, glass-painting, metallurgy, or any of the more primitive crafts, for which the laboratory furnishes an abundance of apparatus. Private taste might, of course, modify the details of that plan, and even without regard to eventual results, its proximate benefits if once known would alone insure its general adoption in the homes of the ennui-stricken classes. The educational advantages of mechanical training, though, can, indeed, hardly be overrated. A scholar with nerveless arms and undextrous hands is as far from being a complete man as a nimble savage with an undeveloped brain.

Is Knowledge Fatal?

This question is suggested by the almost universal ban of custom upon any intelligent discussion or investigation of sex or sex relations.

Were there any realm of civilization exempt from the evils of sex misdirection and perversion; did the sweetness of clean relations prevail in any social realm, as a rule, it would not be so strange that one who opened up a hidden cesspool, or probed an exceptional ulcer, should be seized upon as a diffuser of obnoxious elements, offensiv to the common taste and sense of propriety.

But the well-known undercurrent of prostitution, legal and illegal; the well-understood derangement of physical and moral constitution, on account of ignorance, indiscretion, or outrage, make it a matter of amazement that any honest effort to reach bottom causes should fail to be welcomed by thinking minds.

For what possible reason can it be conjectured that Elmina D. Slenker, or any other matron of well-known worthy life and irreproachable conduct, should enter upon a scientific investigation of the problem of sex, except to confer upon humanity the benefit of knowledge?

Does not the world need knowledge in this direction? Is this the one quality of life and human relation that is to be made helpful and blessed by the darkness of ignorance?

Is the source of life the one realm where nothing is or can be made clean, or lovely, or of good report?

It is the conviction of many minds that knowledge in this department of being is essential to human advancement and perfection. Sex is a principle of life. It is an all-pervading quality and force. Everything created has come into form and function through these two sex forces—positiv and negativ, male and female. Without their perfect balance and coöperation there could be no harmony in the planetary spheres. Without their balance and wise coöperation in human life and society there can be neither health, harmony, nor purity.

The perversion of sex relations, and the long-continued darkness fostered by enforced ignorance concerning this fundamental law and condition of life, has bred so deep and turbid a stream of vileness that the United States government has been called in to giv authority to a detectiv system.

This system, or its agent, does not exercise any discrimination between works or expressions intended to enlighten and reveal the causes of disorder and impurity, and make way for intelligent treatment of the sex question, and those that are designed to arouse or inflame physical amativ impulse. If but some word or expression is obnoxious, the grasp of the law throttles the beneficent teacher alike with the vendor of indecent publications.

Is not this condition of things of sufficient import in its aspects, both as a hindrance to the diffusion of saving knowledge, and an interference with the inestimable right of free discussion, to make it incumbent on all thinkers and lovers of justice to come to the rescue of those who are under the ban of legal prosecution, because of an effort to increase helpful knowledge? Why should Elmina be left entirely to the process of law and verdict of a jury? Should not the people everywhere constitute themselvs a jury to sit upon the case? Is it not time the thinking public—the people who are convinced we hav groped in darkness long enough—should cry out, Let there be light? Is not this cause of enlightenment concerning one of the greatest problems of life, the cause of humanity?

One mother, out of the abundance of motherly heart, seeks to help lift the pall of unthinking ignorance and to find a better way wherein by a wider knowledge humanity can rise to greater proportions. Shall she be condemned without a widely voiced protest? Are we not in this hour criminally inert who shall fail to rally to the support, defense, and vindication of Elmina Slenker, and anyone who is seized upon by the detectiv system when trying to find how to remove ignorance, vice, and outrage?

Those who realize that impurity, vice, and marital misery cannot be legislated or detected out of existence, but can only be eliminated by right educational influences, right knowledge, prenatal culture, and a balance of sex power, which forces will advance the race to a higher plane of being, hav everything to work for.

It is not time for carping criticism, though in no department of culture is it more important that the best possible methods, expressions, and words should be chosen—for it is humanity we should seek to redeem, not words. It is no time for shrinking timidity, or faint praise that damns, but for brave, loyal conduct by lovers of truth, righteousness, and purity. It is time for a widely voiced protest that will "ring out the old" customs of prudishness and concealment that hav bred violence and misery, and "ring in the new" order of knowledge that will, with the calcium light of truth, reveal to humanity the sacredness of Sex. LUCINDA B. CHANDLER.

Liberty or Anarchy.

As an Anarchist partisan who does not think himself mentally broad enough to hav surrounded all truth, I highly appreciate the work which THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing. From your intimation that social chaos is what you understand by Anarchy, and from reading many of your articles, I think that there is some difference in the force of certain words to your mind and ours. To me Anarchy is liberty, and liberty is Anarchy. You say that your party is Liberty—liberty for everyone to think, express his thought, and act as he pleases so long as he infringes upon no other's equal right, and curtails no other's equal liberty. Now, this is what I want, too, and with this admitted and intelligently applied we should hav that condition which we call Anarchy. But I must ask that by "equal liberty" we are at all events to understand liberty, not equal restriction. In a tantalizing sense, there may be "equal liberty" where there is very little liberty. People do not yet seem to realize that when they hav put themselvs under constitutional law, taking away natural liberty, the imposition upon a dissenting minority is not redeemed by the same being submitted to by the makers. They call that equal liberty. We call it equal slavery.

Whether or not we are to condemn government depends upon what is meant by government. Find me a government in which all the citizens hav agreed to join together and where they hav the conceded right to individually withdraw from contributing to its support when it ceases to fulfil their aims, as we now hav with churches, and I will admit that such government is compatible with Anarchism. Anarchists hav no objection to any number of persons having a government, if such government will curtail none of our liberty according to your definition. We say that when a government levies taxes upon us without our consent, it curtails our liberty and pursuit of happiness by robbing us of our means. As the churches are supported by voluntary contributions, so let the government be supported. That is to say, we hav no objection to the subjects of a government voluntarily assuming such obligations and binding themselvs as they see fit to contribute and to pay, but let them take nothing from us and interfere in no way with such of our acts as don't infringe upon their natural liberties, and we are content. We believe in preventing and punishing murder and robbery, etc. It is a question of words whether this prevention and punishment shall be called government or not. We refer it, when done by a hired force, to the principle of insurance.

You know that in economic science "rent" has a technical meaning. We giv a technical meaning to "government." We do not use it to mean protection, but rulership. Are we not justified logically by the fact that advocates of government are constantly ready to assert that it is impossible for them to carry on their scheme without forcing all nativs of the country to be citizens and taxpayers whether they individually wish to be so or not? They will respect our "equal" liberty, but they cannot afford to respect our liberty, neither our property! We are now in the same stage that you would be in if the idea prevailed that, in order to support the church, the majority might force the minority to be members—at least, to contribute to it—and that, their rights of membership, voting, etc., being reserved for them whenever they chose to claim them, they were treated with "equal" religious freedom, but contribute they must and obey they must in no matter what unnecessary things the authority of the majority ordered. We are seeking to enlighten men as to the wrong and absurdity of promiscuous reciprocal tyranny. In proportion as this enlightenment spreads, the way will be prepared for that which, with your habits of thought, you may prefer to call a philosophic Anarchical government, or government of actual consent, but which we call simply Anarchy. Chaos is a theological fiction. In all nature form and order result from the powers in things. Government other than self-government is violence. To hav a self-governing state it would be necessary to hav the voluntary adhesion of every citizen. We claim that the adhesion and support of a great majority can be had for equitable regulations compatible with and in furtherance of liberty, and that if any stand out and cannot appreciate the benefits of insurance, we can afford to let them alone so long as they behave themselvs. I claim that Anarchy will accomplish in a more true and scientific manner the aim of protection, which is all that attaches republicans to government. I claim this with the same confidence as you claim that natural morality will develop all the virtues—for which alone some conservativ people still cling to their Bibles—and develop them far better for not having a mixture or leaven of authority foreign to the meritorious element in the case. J. L. W.

"IT is the conservatism of the authorities of Rome and their priests that leads them to cling to the side of the aristocracy and the wealthy and powerful few, as opposed to the democracy of the poor masses. Some priests will preach that poverty is a blessing, but they do not think it is a good thing for themselvs or any of their relativs or friends. These preachers are themselvs a terrible example of the debasing effect of the pursuit of wealth. When I was studying in Rome my tutor told me that, if it were left to the Italian people to decide what was the worst fault of the Italian clergy, the verdict would be their avarice. I say that those who hav left the church and cursed religion because of the wrongs that the priests allow wealth unrebuked to perpetrate, pay a higher tribute to the divine justice of God than the high and dry and fossilized and moth-eaten men who sit in the first places in the church and the synagog."—Edward McGlynn, Ex-Priest.

A Dishonest Commentator.

The subject of discussion before Rev. Dr. Meredith's Bible class in this city recently was "The Red Sea," and he opened it with the statement, as reported in the secular papers, that the Israelites, before their departure out of Egypt, were instructed not to "borrow," but to ask or demand of the Egyptians their jewelry. He said it was God's transaction. Mr. Ingersoll, he saw fit to add, didn t think it beneath his dignity to talk about the Israelites borrowing from the Egyptians, and then ringing in his cavils on false pretenses. "Honest, now"—quoting Colonel Ingersoll—"was that a square transaction?"

"You can see," Dr. Meredith continued, "what effect such caviling would hav on the young men who don't know anything. Well, Ingersoll is no fool. He was brought up in a Christian family; and either he knew that the word 'borrowed' was not there, or he did not know. If he did not know, and then played on that word, 'honest, now, was that a square transaction?' (Cheers from the whole Bible class.) God commanded the Israelites to take what they did from the Egyptians; and you might as well try to fly from the sun as to think to get away from God, if you hav got any money that belongs to anybody else. He will catch you in this world or the other—one of the two."

Now let us take down Dr. Meredith's Bible from the place where it looks as if he had let the dust accumulate on its cover, and see whether he or Colonel Ingersoll is quoting God right. He asserts that God commanded the departing Israelites to take what they did from the Egyptians; Colonel Ingersoll asserts that God commanded them to "borrow" it, each relying on the Bible story. Now, what does the Bible—this dusty Bible of Dr. Meredith—itself say? Exodus xii, 35: "And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment. (Verse 36) And the Lord gave the people favor in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they lent unto them such things as they required."

This is the story just as Dr. Meredith's Bible tells it. It happens, too, that it tells it in Colonel Ingersoll's way, and not in Dr. Meredith's at all. And the secular paper from which we take the whole report crows forth in a conspicuous head-line to it: "Ingersoll Answered." Not only does the Bible say that the Israelites "borrowed" jewelry of the Egyptians before leaving with intent never to return, but it adds that God "gave them favor in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they lent unto them," etc. Thus is the proof that the Israelites "borrowed" driven clear through and clenched on the other side.

We now call on Dr. Meredith's Bible class to giv "cheers" for Colonel Ingersoll, who has shown himself a more accurate and reliable Bible scholar than their own accepted teacher is. Will they be "honest, now," and stand up and giv them? Can they really hold up their heads and say that Dr. Meredith quotes the Bible truly? and, if they cannot, will they presume to assert that his is a "square transaction?"

The Pope's Dangerous Desires.

Dr. Bernard O'Reilly, a Catholic theologian of eminence, enjoying the confidence of the powers at the Vatican, and speaking, therefore, with exceptional authority, says that it is a settled thing that the Catholic people of Italy will soon force the government to giv the pope a part of the kingdom, in which he shall reign in things temporal as well as spiritual. The claim of the pope is the modest one of the city of Rome and the States of the Church. This popish claim is viewed favorably, says Dr. O'Reilly, by all European statesmen, except the radicals and the anti-Christian sects.

Further, according to the same writer, the pope intends to push himself into the internal politics of all nations, working always, of course, for the good of the Roman Catholic church. A determination to adopt this policy led him to interfere in French politics in 1885, to issue his orders to the German Catholics to support Bismarck, to send an emissary to Ireland, to take cognizance of the constitution of the Knights of Labor, and to excommunicate McGlynn for preaching a land theory contrary to the doctrins of the Roman church. In short, the pope proposes to hav a finger in the pies of all nations, with the idea that from most, if not all of them, he can extract plums of great sweetness for Christianity.

For what the unregenerate of this age term monumental nerve, the pope must be conceded to be ahead of all others. He has adopted this program, he says, because the church is the very best friend of both the rulers and the people; and, while both church and state are supreme, sovereign, and independent each within its own sphere, yet, as both derive their origin and authority from God, they should coöperate with each other in forwarding the welfare, spiritual and temporal, of their subjects. Therefore, he seeks alliance with all the powers, promising to help them keep their "subjects" in obedience in return for their aid in restoring to him the territorial sovereignty of which the Italian parliament in 1870 deprived him.

We do not know how it will appear to Roman Catholics, but to one who looks with contempt alike upon the claims of king and priest, the pope's offer has very much the appearance that a proposal of an alliance offensiv and defensiv from one slave-owner to another would hav. In Germany, the proposal of the holy slave-owner might be worth considering by the secular slave-owner, but in a republic, where there are not supposed to be any "subjects," Mr. Pecci's overtures are of less value. It is true that here the king is represented by "society," which has an interest in keeping the common people down, and might be glad to hav the Italian humbug's aid, but the common people hav no idea of being sat upon in any such way, and the holy slave-owner will find that a certain portion of his slaves cannot be delivered.

To one conversant with the history of the church the position assumed by Leo XIII. appears dangerous just so far as it is accepted by the governments. The government of the United States, of course, cannot buy the pope's good offices in return for pressure exerted upon Italy. The administration that attempted it would be hooted out of office. In Europe, politics are conducted differently. Though the people possess the franchise, the governments, with few exceptions, are despotisms. In one way or another, the divinely appointed kings manage to hav their own imperious way. For their people, therefore, the entrance of the pope into the arena is fraught with danger of the gravest kind. But to no country so much as to Italy does the prospect look dark. To surrender the territorial sovereignty of the States of the Church is throwing the people to wild beasts. When Italy was taken from the French and given back to petty princes, archdukes, and adventurers, the States of the Church were restored to the pope. Under Pius VII. people of these States were again reduced to the condition of beggars. All reforms were abandoned, and the ecclesiastics ruled with tyranny. Education was narrowed, and placed in clerical hands. Any professor suspected of liberal views was at once expelled from his university. Under Pius VII. and Leo XII. the government of Rome is described by historians as infamous. The people lived in misery and squalor, while the church officials rioted in opulence. This continued through the pontificate of Gregory XVI., and when he died in 1846 the people were like mad beasts. Under Pius IX. more liberty was granted, and it is generally admitted that he was the only pope with nineteenth century ideas that has occupied the Vatican. But after his return from Gaeta in 1850, he began the reactionary reign, supported by French soldiers and the Jesuits. Victor Emanuel found him the greatest enemy to Italian liberty, and was forced to place church property under state control, and abolish ecclesiastical courts, or the church would hav beggared and ruined the country. In Sicily and other states, the church encouraged brigandage, and aided the thieves to despoil the people and defy the state. It was not until as late as 1870, when the national troops took possession of Rome—leaving the pope the Vatican wherein to pose as a persecuted prisoner—that Italy became a country fit for a civilized person to liv in.

Leo XIII. shows the reactionary spirit which distinguished the latter part of his predecessor's reign, together with the aggressiv impulses characteristic of the popes when they possessed actual temporal power. He desires to be a king among kings and to restore to the church the old-time magnificence and influence. He is a dangerous man, and all the more so that he is a diplomat of ability and a skilled politician.

Our Always Fresh Contemporary.

Mrs. Slenker sends us this with request to print:

"I hav just finished reading the last issue of the Winsted Press, and I feel that I ought to let Liberals know the value of this old Connecticut periodical. It is the most radical of radical papers. Not an issue of it but contains something fresh, new, and vigorous, something all Liberals need and want. Send three cents to L. V. Pinney, Winsted, Conn., and see a specimen of it."

Cheerfully do we giv our esteemed contemporary the benefit of Mrs. Slenker's good opinion, and we may add also our own general appreciation of the Winsted Press. It is lively, slashing, humorous, and grimly sarcastic, and, as Mrs. Slenker says, something fresh may always be found in its columns—for instance, the following, from the Press of the 18th inst.:

"The Boston Investigator and the New York Truth Seeker are in for the defense of Mrs. Slenker because she belongs to their church. If she had happened to be a Methodist minister or a Presbyterian deacon they would run with the Comstock hounds. This is sectarianism, and we hav yet to find that Infidel sectarianism is any more liberal in thought or action than the orthodox bigotry from which it has sprouted.

"If The Truth Seeker had never munched hay out of the same rack with Elmina she might hang. It only seems to feel such interest in the matter as a Cotton Mather Christian might hav felt in his grandmother on trial for unmistakable witchcraft. The chance of personal acquaintance, small as it is, is thus seen to be of more importance in the Truth Seeker office just now than a mere question of right or wrong. And this is the same Truth Seeker that was 'founded by D. M. Bennett,' whose imprisonment for mailing obscene literature is being very adroitly justified by his successors. True, they make some protest against illegal proceedings on the part of the prosecution in this particular case, they scold the creature Comstock for his method of procedure, they admit that private correspondence is exceptional literature. There is more indication of perversity and small craftiness than of stupidity on their part, but hypocrisy is not a saving grace on such occasions."

Fresh and vigorous Mr. Pinney has said this because in a former issue we wrote:

"If we had never until now heard of Mrs. Slenker and knew nothing of her work, we would not consider the case one that called for an uprising of Freethinkers to defend invaded principles."

If our highly esteemed friend had been as desirous of letting his readers know why we defend Mrs. Slenker as he seems to be to mislead them as to our position, he might hav found room in his fresh, new, and vigorous paper for the reasons we gave in the same editorial from which he quotes. But let that go. It is sometimes the case, we hav found, that a radical of radicals is so radical in criticism that he runs into misrepresentation. And Mrs. Slenker has given us a certificate that the Press is the most radical of radical papers. It remains, however, to be seen if Mr. Pinney is right.

We said that in Mrs. Slenker's case there is no principle invaded calling for an uprising of Freethinkers as Freethinkers. This we believe to be an accurate statement. Mrs. Slenker is not charged with heresy. She is not arrested for mailing Freethought literature. In fact, there is nowhere about her prosecution a single outward indication that she is put to all this trouble because she is a Freethinker. The work she has chosen is no more Freethought than it is Christian. It is not even a work in which Freethinkers, as a body, sympathize. More Freethinkers regret Mrs. Slenker's course than applaud it. Mrs. Slenker has committed no crime, but the one she is charged with no more appeals to Freethinkers as Freethinkers than the arrest of the most pious smut pedler in New York. And it is not because, as the fresh and vigorous Mr. Pinney elegantly phrases it, we hav munched hay out of the same rack with Mrs. Slenker, that we defend her. It is for a far different and a broader reason—a reason, perhaps, so broad that Mr. Pinney will hav difficulty in exercising the elasticity of his mind sufficiently to surround it. Personal friendship has nothing to do with it, though we should be recreant to all noble impulses did we not help a friend no matter what trouble overtook him or her.

We defend Mrs. Slenker for the same reason that we defend any one person or any body of people unjustly prosecuted. We defend her for the same reason that we ask for a new and fair trial for the alleged Anarchists of Chicago. We defend her for the same reason that we denounce the legal persecution of the Mormon church. We defend her for the same reason that we protested against the imprisonment of Herr Most, when it was clearly shown that he had done nothing deserving punishment. We defend her because in her case the right to free scientific investigation has been imperiled; because, in her arrest, the Constitution of our country has been violated, and because she was arrested for one thing and is to be punished for another. We defend her, in short, because we are a Freethinker, and not because she is.

Crime may be broadly defined as the injury of one person by another. Our laws are framed to redress such injuries by punishing the perpetrator. But unless such injury has occurred, no crime has been committed, and punishment inflicted upon an innocent person is infamous injustice. Let the attorney of Virginia show that Mrs. Slenker has injured anyone in person, property, or morals, and we hav not another word to say in her defense. But until it is so shown we shall do our best to get her out of his clutches, in which she has been placed by the scoundrelly intermeddling of the hangers-on of an illegitimate and dangerous society. We do not defend Mrs. Slenker because she is a Freethinker, but because she is a human being whose liberty and rights are wantonly assailed and violated for no decent cause whatever. If this is sectarianism, we hope Mr. Pinney will some time grow large enough to join our sect.

When the fresh and vigorous Winsted Press states that we are "adroitly justifying" the imprisonment of D. M. Bennett, it states what its editor ought to know is false. Mr. Bennett defended himself on precisely the same ground on which we defend Mrs. Slenker—that he had committed no crime, had injured no person. Incidentally came into the defense the unconstitutionality of the law, the character of the prosecutor, and of the society by whom he was employed. These are all applicable, and urged in behalf of Mrs. Slenker. But the main fact in Mr. Bennett's case, as in Mrs. Slenker's, is that no wrong was done, and no injury to anyone resulted from his conduct. It may be that some people's notions of propriety were shocked slightly, but what of that? Our notions of propriety are shocked every time a priest feeds his congregation the body and blood of Christ. In turn, we shock the Christians' notions whenever we expose the foolishness of their imaginary cannibalism. Shall a man be shut up in prison for such "offenses?" If so, what becomes of individual rights? of personal liberty? of freedom of speech and of publication?

This, it seems to us, is broader ground upon which to make a stand than that occupied by our ever fresh contemporary, which holds that, as obscenity is only a vice, and vices are not punished, Mrs. Slenker should go scot-free. This, if not damning with faint praise, is at least pleading guilty and throwing the prisoner upon the mercy of the court. There is here no manful battling for right, but an "adroit" squirming out of a consideration of the principles of the case. Mr. Pinney says that "if the Investigator and THE TRUTH SEEKER believe that obscenity is a crime, their duty to what they call their Freethought is to see that any Freethinker who commits that crime is hunted out and punished." We might retort that, just as much, should the Press seek out the vicious and reform them. And if we do so think, adds the ever fresh Press, "we ought to help Comstock make an example of Mrs. Slenker, for it appears that according to their standards she is guilty." In this Mr. Pinney adds treachery to Mrs. Slenker to his previous squirming defense of her. We cannot reflect the feelings of the Investigator, but we can say that if the Press were honest those words regarding THE TRUTH SEEKER would never hav appeared. In the editorial which has caused our contemporary to slop over with such great waste of ink, we denied Mrs. Slenker's guilt. We believe, as previously stated, that crime is whatever materially injures the individual, and that he is a criminal who wilfully and knowingly harms another. This is our standard of crime and measure of criminals. If obscenity does this, then is obscenity a crime; and if the injured person cannot protect himself, then is it the duty of collectiv individualism to protect him. But, except in the case of children away for the moment from their parents or those in whose care they are, we believe that the individual can protect himself against any obscenity that may crop out. As for the wretches in large cities who peddle the rotten stuff to minors, there are no years containing days enough for them to worry through in jail.

That is our opinion of obscenity, stated many times before; and that is our opinion of Mrs. Slenker's case, stated often enough for the editor of the Press not to hav fallen into so many foolish errors.

The Ingratitude of Politicians.

We believe that it is inevitable that every new movement shall suffer sooner or later from internal wrangling. The wrangle usually occurs as soon as the new party has sufficient strength to fight at all. The Abolition party was divided against itself, some advocating peaceful and constitutional emancipation, others advocating revolution, declaring the Constitution to be a covenant with death and a league with hell. The temperance party splits on the different methods of accomplishing its purpose, and the Woman Suffragists divide on various small issues. Even the Liberals of the country, though never strong enough to afford it, hav had their internal squabble, and will, probably, hav more of them within the next few years.

But for a good, strong, vigorous, and vicious fight between two factions of a new party, that between the Socialists and the Georgeites, in the United Labor party of this state, overtops all others.

There are three labor parties in this state and city—the Socialists, the United Labor party, the Union Labor party. The last is the least, and, though bearing the name of the labor party of the West, is but a handful of professional political wire-pullers. When it held its convention in Rochester recently, the press was divided in opinion whether the Democratic or Republican politicians paid the expenses. In other states the Union Labor party is the labor party, but not in this state. The United Labor party is Henry George's party, and claims 68,000 voters in this city, including the Socialists, who acted with it last fall. This party held its convention to nominate state officers in Syracuse last week, and there it was the row occurred between the Socialists and the land-tax men.

When Henry George was nominated for mayor last fall, the Socialists were the main stay of the campaign. Their organization is compact, and the members well disciplined. They saw in George's candidacy a chance to push their ideas, and they went in with a will. Henry George, being then poor and unfortunate, gladly accepted their aid, and was not at all particular to say that he was no Socialist. In fact, his doctrins were supposed to be Socialistic, and he did not undeceive the people.

In this election Mr. George found himself at the head of a labor party, and he was shrewd enough to stay there after the election. He saw the possibility of getting a great many people to adopt his peculiar economic ideas, and he started a paper. Through the fuss in the church over Dr. McGlynn, culminating in that gentleman's liberation, the excitement was kept up, and the United Labor party is the outcome.

As the Socialists had been the means, as they claimed, of getting such a rousing vote for Mr. George for mayor, and as Mr. George popularly was thought to run on a Socialistic platform, they demanded that more of their principles should be included in the platform of the new party. They began electing Socialistic delegates to the Syracuse convention. This did not suit Mr. George. Philip sober was a different man from Philip drunk. The land-tax theory was found not to be Socialistic; Mr. George became conservativ and desirous of being considered a reformer and not a revolutionist, and it was decided by him and his lieutenants that the Socialists must go. Thereupon a former ruling of the party was reversed, and it was officially announced that no one belonging to the Socialistic Labor party could belong to the United Labor party. Whenever Socialistic delegates to the Syracuse convention had been elected, a second and antagonistic set were also selected, and the contestants took their quarrel to the convention.

At that convention Mr. George had an overwhelming majority, and the committee on credentials voted to reject every Socialist delegate whose seat was contested. In its zeal to repudiate Socialism the convention went on to unseat Socialists who were not members of their party. They seemed to go upon the principle of that man, famous in history, who commanded the Bartholomew massacre. When he was appealed to by the soldiers as to how they should distinguish the Huguenots from the Catholics, his reply was, "Kill them all. God will know his own." The slaughter was continued, therefore, indiscriminately. While this is none of our quarrel, we cannot help sympathizing with these victims of misplaced confidence. We cannot help thinking, too, that there is at least as much truth as poetry in the short speech of one of the rejected Socialists. He did not belong to the Socialist party, and some of the members were in doubt as to him. But, his seat being contested by an anti-Socialist, he was expelled. He left the convention with these parting words:

"I don't propose to argue the issue of Socialism. I refuse to be trapped. I did not enter this convention as a Socialist, but as a Labor man. If I hold Socialist views, that is my own business. The issue of Socialism was not raised until a few of Mr. George's friends were defeated for delegates in New York. It was not intended that this convention should stand for the theories of Mr. George. The movement to drive Socialists out of the party is a movement to change this from a labor party of workingmen to a tax reform party for the middle classes. We are to be punished for doubting the efficiency of Mr. George's theory. That is the crime of the Socialists. No theory is involved except our criticisms of some people who are not demigods and gods, who hav been damned, and, if not damned, excommunicated. It is bad taste for men who hav been excommunicated by another pope to try to excommunicate us."

Mr. George defined his position as follows:

"I oppose Socialism or any compromise with Socialism. This question has been settled by the highest authority in New York. The Socialists hav forced this question on us, and we must meet it and not compromise with them. I recognize the services of the Socialists. [A voice: 'They hav voted for you.'] Whether they vote for me or not, I cannot compromise on their ideas. They worked together with us last fall. I would be glad to hav them with us still, but we hav come to the parting of the ways. We hav our principles—first, the equal rights of all men in the land of the country in such method as will put all taxes on land to take the value for the community; second, assumption by society of all functions that are natural monopolies. So far we go together. There is no reason why we should not go on together. But the Socialists hav stated distinctly that we are not going the same way, but other ways. The Socialists want to naturalize land by taking it as the property of the government, and working it by the government, taxing all capital, all machinery, all productions, and setting up a system of distribution and exchange. I cannot, for one—I will not, for one—go that way. On that question there cau be no compromise. We cannot go that way. I hav the highest personal regard for many Socialists, and I hope that they will go our way. If not, they can go theirs, and we will go ours. It is far better for us to part company than to work together where there would be marked recriminations, mutual strife, and mutual weakness. There is one simple question to be settled. It is a plain, clear question of natural rights."

T. B. Wakeman, associate editor of the Freethinkers' Magazine, offered a resolution, admitting both the Socialists and those who wanted their seats, giving each a half vote. Dr. McGlynn opposed this. He said:

"No man here desires harmony more than I, but harmony without union is simply futil. Parties hav to exist on a definit principle and platform. Now, while I hav heard a great deal about these Socialistic gentlemen being in favor of the same objects that we are seeking, it does not appear that they are in favor of the same means that we regard as absolutely important to reach those ends. The very means that we declared to be primary in the Clarendon Hall platform, upon which we rolled up Henry George's great vote, was the means that made this convention possible. The leaders of that convention were called upon to call this meeting, and, upon the same lines upon which the great moral victory of last fall was won, we were called to organize not only the state of New York, but the whole United States, upon those party lines and that platform. It is too late now to discuss a question of this character. We would look foolish to the people all over the state who are watching us to see if we will stand by our principles. The substitute has been offered in a sense of justice, but it is not in the interests of justice. It is a gross injustice. The labor of this committee, who worked the whole night, should not be in vain, and it is a pity that we should hav lost so much time in going over the same ground. We are fighting over the absurd question of whether the dog is to wag the tail or the tail wag the dog. I want to know whether I am the dog or the tail, and I do not propose, if I am the dog, to be wagged by the tail."

Mr. Wakeman's resolution was lost, and all the Socialists were expelled. The new party will enter upon its second campaign with divided ranks and bitter feelings. It is pretty safe to say that the United Labor party will not cast 68,000 votes in this city this fall.

Mr. George's theory is a wonderfully captivating one for city residents. Being without land, they hope by a turn of fortune's wheel to acquire some. In the country a purely labor and anti-monopoly party is regarded with more favor. Possessing land, the residents of the country do not desire fortune's wheel to turn them off it. Mr. George's theory is certainly Socialistic so far as it goes, and his desire to hav society assume control of all functions that are natural monopolies, is also a Socialistic doctrin. These functions include not only land, but railroads and telegraphs, and it is Mr. George's avowed purpose to turn these over to the government when he gets the chance. From this it will be seen that Mr. George differs from the other Socialists only in degree.

To an impartial outsider it looks very ungrateful and inconsistent for him to expel the Socialists from his party. It is not likely that he will catch many conservativ votes by being ungrateful to the men who made him what he is.

CHARLES WATTS will lecture in Halifax, N. S., Sunday afternoon and evening and Monday evening, Sept. 4th and 5th.

FRANK PIXLEY, editor of the San Francisco Argonaut, says that in his younger days he "gambled with God for gold dust." That is an alliterativ but irreverent way of saying that he was once a miner.

MR. LAVELLE, rector of the cathedral in this town, and Archbishop Corrigan's assistant, said officially that it is a positiv fact that the holy see employed competent theologians to examine the land doctrins taught by McGlynn and found them palpably at variance with the commonly received notions of rights of property, not only among Catholics and all Christians, but throughout the world. He called them revolutionary. The congregation, however, did not pass upon them, and they are not, therefore, officially denounced. This is a very convenient way of doing, for if in after years the world comes around to George's land theories, the church can say she never condemned them, while now she has whatever gain there was for her in excommunicating McGlynn. The church ought to hav thought of this plan before Galileo was ordered to vacate.

Letters from Friends.

NEWPORT, ME., Aug. 16, 1887.

TO WONG CHIN FOO: Here is my ☞. Henceforth I am a heathen, for you hav proved heathenism far superior to Christianity. A country out of debt is the place for me. Christianity and crime are synonymous terms.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

OLNEY, Aug. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Religion, after a trial of eighteen hundred years, is a perfect failure. If any denomination had the power to-day, it would act the same as it did in the Dark Ages. It is not alone the Catholic religion, but Protestants and Jews are the same way, and one faction would like to see the other everlastingly damned. I know what I am talking about, and maybe know more about it than the general run of your readers, for I was born and raised a Jew, and the Jews, especially the orthodox faction of them, are no exception to the general rule. That we at present enjoy somewhat of religious liberty is not on account of religion, but in spite of it.

I hav been a reader of your paper for about sixteen months, but hav never seen any correspondence from this place. We hav a beautiful town of about four thousand inhabitants, but, I am sorry to say, the religious element predominates. We hav eleven churches here, of as many different denominations, and since last year another one was added, which is the Swedenborgian or New church, so we hav plenty of roads to choose from for the New Jerusalem. I expect our town is about like the general run of them, and it will take quite a while yet before people will begin to think for themselvs and throw off the old superstition. At the same time, if we look back a few hundred years and compare the present, we hav great cause to congratulate ourselvs, and hav good reason to be hopeful for the future.

Is the defense argument of Colonel Ingersoll's in Mr. Reynolds's case in print already, and how can I get one?

Yours truly, I. M. TOBIAS.

BOSTON, MASS., Aug. 15, A.S. 287.

MR. EDITOR: I was very sorry to see Brother Koezly intimating that the giving of means to the Liberal cause is a "punishment," for to me it seems the exact opposit of that, being, in fact, a great pleasure and high privilege in my estimation.

The phrase, "When he gets sober, he will be sorry for that," will apply to him in regard to this expression, I think. Brother Koezly has made what he, no doubt, considers a really generous offer to help truth and reason along in this world of sin and sorrow, but in order to show him how far astray he is in that, as indeed he seems to be in almost everything, I will make his offer into something that can rightfully be called generous, it being very much more liberal and praiseworthy than is his arrangement.

He declares himself anxious to suit me in this matter, and I can therefore confidently tell him just what will suit not only myself, but most all Freethinkers the wide world over, and it is as follows: That we each giv a $25 share of stock in the Paine Memorial to the cause of reason, whichever way the decision goes, he to giv his to the sturdy old Investigator, and I to giv mine to the gallant TRUTH SEEKER.

In that way, whatever happens, these two grand helpers of progress will be benefited, and through them, of course, the whole great humanity of which we are all a part.

And now, as soon as Mr. Seaver shall notify me that the Investigator has received Brother Koezly's gift of the $25 share, or its equivalent in money, I will at once write and get the decision from Harvard College, giving it to both papers for publication, meantime holding my own share of stock ready for THE TRUTH SEEKER, so as to set our worthy, but often mistaken, friend a bright and shining example of promptitude in business matters.

OSCEOLA, IA., Aug. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Many thanks, as the noble old TRUTH SEEKER still comes into the family when the money for the present year is long past due; but you will please find inclosed the subscription price, $3. I should like to write a long letter, as I don't see anything written from this priest-ridden locality; but I was brought up in the time when the salvation of the soul was of more consequence than the salvation of the head. I was raised by good Christian parents. They tried hard to get me to walk in the ways of that monster the orthodox God; but, thanks to reason and humanity, I hav never made one misstep in that direction, and I am now nearly fifty-three years old and still seeking after truth. I hav a large family, which I hav given and am giving a fair education, and that makes too rich soil for superstition and myths to grow in; but my Christian friends giv their Lord credit for most of my course in life. They say that I am sure to go to heaven; that the hand of the Lord is upon me. But I hold up to their view some terribly wicked things. One I hav is a large picture of Old Splitfoot, eleven feet and a half tall, on the side of my barn, with fork in hand, making long strides westward, trying to get away from Bob; and in my house I hav exposed to view a cartoon, where Bob has slain him, and he is ready for burial. Bob has him by the tail, dragging him off, the different creeds, headed by their priests, following along mourning, carrying the implements for burial. It is a lamentable affair for the priest, for he knows that the young will begin to think, and he will hav to begin to work or steal. I am sorry that we cannot hav some good Liberal lecturer come to this place and preach to the people the religion of humanity. J. E. Remsburg has written twice to my son, offering to come and giv three lectures for twenty-four dollars, but we can't get what few scattering Freethinkers there are in this community to assert their rights, they hav been so often told by the Christians that they hav no right to exist, and that they should be thankful to their God to eternally damn them; and it does seem as though they had about come to the conclusion that it was partly so.

LEXINGTON, KY., Aug. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I listened last night to a lecture delivered by W. Mills, quite a noted Prohibitionist. I do not credit all of his statements. He said that Socialists could be always found in saloons, that their plans were concocted there, that all new theories were there discussed. But he did not call these advanced thinkers hypocrits. Next he stated that Christians had preserved the morals of the world from shipwreck, but did not commence this great work until the time of Luther, who was the best politician in Europe, except the dear, merciful Saint Cromwell. And then Calvin and Knox, what lovely reformers! He forgot that when persecuted individuals fled into Calvin's arms, they soon ran out, preferring the wilds of America to his tender embraces. Knox had his own church brethren executed, without mercy, if their belief deviated in the least from his own. The awful sublimity of their morals would horrify an American Indian. Think of offering the cruelties of Calvin, Knox, Alva & Co. as patterns for Christians to follow! Oh, listen! He next declared that the Constitution of the United States was accepted only to gratify the wishes of twenty-five clergymen, present at the convention of state delegates. How strange it was, then, that Jefferson and other great statesmen had so poor an opinion of divines in general and particular, as if they were not to be esteemed as reliable, from the very nature of their office! Why were they, in the very wording of the Constitution, debarred from any share in the government?

Will men, in their senses, giv their support to a pious system which permitted dukes, under the feudal system, to take the bride from her husband for three days and nights? The priest, also, was guilty of the same. (See notes, "Custom of Country," Beaumont and Fletcher.)

Women must hav some share in the government or submit to indignities forever. ALHAZA.

SALEM, NEB., Aug. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is ever welcome. It is the best paper that father takes, because it furnishes more food for the brain.

Mr. Oswald's "Bible of Nature" is grand. "Letters from Friends" are just the things to acquaint us with the ideas of the people, and to inform us as to the progress of Secularism. Therefore, excuse this letter.

We, the people of Salem, possess everything requisit to prosperity but wisdom. The brains of the people seem to be sleeping, while passions hold sway over every being. We are slaves in order to avoid trouble with Madam Grundy. The object of most people is to accumulate wealth. Yes, even parents think this the most important step in education, forgetting, probably not knowing, that they should inculcate first a desire to become true men and women—citizens of the world.

In this country people read but comparativly little. Many people do not read even the papers, and hav no books but a Bible, which is seldom read by the majority. Gossip is an art in which we are all versed. Just think of a place where most of the so-called weaker sex work hard all day, and then attempt to rest their minds by reading trashy literature—such a place is it here.

For the purpose of causing the people of this church-ridden community to think, my father, with the aid of a few Freethinkers, induced Mr. Remsburg to deliver his lecture on "False Claims" in this town. The lecture was very well attended, and I think it will cause some thinking, which will prepare the way for Mr. Bell, who is to deliver three lectures here during this month.

The Freethinkers hav more courage since the lecture. I think that if we can get Mr. Reynolds, after having the people roused to action by Mr. Bell, the overhanging cloud of ignorance will soon commence melting.

"The Infidel School-Teacher" is a bonny volume. It is written in pure language, and is just the thing to cause thinking. It, as well as the author's other works, deserves a place in every Freethinker's library. May its author's days be long and many and ever bright, because she is doing good—making the world better. T. P. BRINEGAR.

SEATTLE, WASH. TER., Aug. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: After an absence of lecturers for over two years, Brother Samuel P. Putnam made his appearance in our midst and delivered five lectures, in which he succeeded in gathering together a sufficient number of Liberals to organize into a branch Union.

At the last lecture the meeting was called to order by Captain May, president of the Liberal League, who introduced Mr. Putnam. As previously announced, Brother Putnam delivered a lecture on "The Glory of American Poetry and Poets." He started out by reciting a grand and pathetic poem on the Laws of Nature, which was received with great gusto. The lecture, throughout, was listened to in almost breathless silence and profoundest interest.

At the close of the lecture the enrolled members present proceeded to perfect a permanent organization of a branch of the American Secular Union by electing the following brothers and sisters its officers for the ensuing six months: O. A. Carr, president; Walter Walker, vice-president; P. Wickstram, treasurer, and John H. Hummell, secretary and corresponding secretary. Sister Josephine Giddings, Sister Nellie Wood, and Brother A. Amonds were elected executiv committee—Brother Amonds as chairman.

After the election of officers the committee previously appointed presented a set of by-laws for consideration and adoption which elicited quite a spirited discussion upon a motion of their adoption, in which Brothers Walker, May, Clark, Putnam, and others took part. In the course of Mr. Putnam's remarks he quoted quite extensivly from THE TRUTH SEEKER to sustain the position taken by himself and others in the moderation of discussions on labor questions when they tend almost to the exclusion of those pertinent to the purposes and object of the Secular Union.

At a late hour further discussion was suspended until next Sunday, 7th inst., at 3 P.M.

On motion a unanimous vote of thanks was tendered to Mr. Putnam for the noble manner in which he had entertained the Liberals and citizens of Seattle (in the course of five lectures delivered during his stay in our midst) in the advocacy of Liberalism and Freethought. I hope his lectures will redound in much good in the near future.

JOHN H. HUMMELL, Cor. Secretary.

MARSHFIELD, OR., July 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We hav received the first number of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been reading up old numbers, disconnected numbers, as far back as 1880. A bachelor friend supplied my husband with them. To S. P. Putnam's lectures and these papers I owe my entire conversion to Freethought. For years I hav been an unbeliever in the Bible as divine writing, but like many others I thought best not to say so. Henceforth my pen will be used for freedom. My pen has been the one oasis in the desert of my life, but nearly all my writings hav the orthodox taint about them, the serpent and cross following me up so I felt afraid to speak my mind. Now that is all gone, and I come to the writers of your paper offering my hand as a co-worker for the good of humanity. I do not come to you laden with scientific researches or high-sounding phrases, but using simple language, with no philosophy save my own observation of nature's works; one who has scarcely been away from my breezy, billowy Pacific home for twenty years. If I can find a little corner in the rear of your writers I shall be most happy to air my few thoughts there. I hav for many years pictured my own demise, where a few friends would gather around my coffin with flowers, and some old woman would say, "Poor soul, she is better off!" and that would be all. Now I feel like doing something that will liv after me; leave a little at least that some wiser head can take up and carry out. I am sorry fifty years of my life is gone and I hav been so idle.

I do not yet belong to the League at Marshfield, but as soon as I can attend I shall. My husband belongs to that mysterious band misnamed Freemasons—the "Free" I would leave off. I grant him that privilege, notwithstanding I hav no faith in a society where a man has to be good and moral before he can get in it; besides, old King Solomon is no favorit of mine. Still, I hav gone over the water in sunshine and storm with my husband while he attended his lodge, and expect I will do the same again, and I expect him to respect my rights and wishes just as I respect his.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Aug. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In reading over the article of Geo. Malcolm, dated July 30th, I thought that if he substituted "representativ of value" for "measure," he would be nearer correct, and perhaps there would not be so much difference between him and Mr. Newton. Money is used as the representativ of value to do away with the necessity of barter. The value of anything varies according to the quantity in the market and the number of persons to whom it is desirable. If there should be but one horse in the market, and three men were desirous of buying it, the one willing to giv the most dollars would get the horse, not that there was any difference in the horse, or that one man's dollars were worth more than another's, but because his desire for the horse was that much more than the other's, measured in dollars; so in that sense dollars are a measure of value—the dollar is of no less value, nor the horse more, than before. The dollar represents value; for that reason it ought to be made of something as little liable to fluctuation as possible. For that reason gold and silver were fixed upon as the best and most durable. For hundreds of years their increase was very slow and steady, without fluctuation, but within the last century the quantity has increased to such an extent that its purchasing power has decreased perhaps one-half. Why? Because the gold of the world represents the value of the property of the world; therefore, a pound of gold represents the same amount of property that half a pound did a century ago, and by substituting paper for gold during the war, as it could be done easier than digging the gold, we lessened the value in proportion to the amount we issued, thus causing the apparent rise in value of every species of property. Brother Malcolm would hav national banks louning paper money to all comers, as it is much easier got than gold. There would be a limitless supply. How long does the brother suppose it would be till the paper money was equal to the old French assignats or Continental money, or even the paper money of the Confederate States?

I admire the stand you hav taken on the action of the government in regard to the Mormons. The principle is sound. At the same time, I think good will come out of it, as you say no reason can be given for this action against the Mormons that will not act with tenfold force against the Catholic church; and the time will come, and that before the end of the present century, in my opinion, when some such action will hav to be taken with that church if the people are to retain a fraction of the liberty that seemed to be guaranteed to them at the commencement of the century. Therefore I say that the present action of the government against the Mormons will make a splendid precedent, and the sooner it is followed in the Roman Catholic case, the better it will be, and the easier accomplished. "So mote it be." JOHN DOWNES.

DULUTH, MINN., Aug. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $2, for which you will please send me the following, and if there is any money left, send double or treble of those things you consider best for distribution. I am only sorry that I cannot spare more money for the purpose of thus evangelizing the community. But "the ball is rolling on," not "for Tippecanoe and Tyler, too," but for something infinitly more important than was their success. And the ball rolls with regularly accelerated motion; but, as an octogenarian, I cannot expect to see the glorious triumph of truth in this and in other subjects in which I feel more or less interest. The one which I hav most at heart you appear to be opposed to, and it is so evidently and palpably right that I wonder that a truth seeker does not find it. Why do you not see the self-evident truth that the earth, with the other elements, belongs to all the people, not to a class whose superior brain alone has enabled, and still enables, them to rob the mass? I hope you are not, like the religious and the secular press generally, under the fear of offending the classes, "the saviors of society." These fellows see the truth just as well as I do, but self-interest binds them to opposition. Why don't they bottle up the air and the sunlight? Because it is impossible. If it could be done, it would hav been done ages ago. They do it in England, Scotland, and Ireland so far as they can. They tax the window-glass in every house, thus showing a disposition to monopolize every right. "Land belongs in usufruct to the living," was enunciated by immortalized Tom Jefferson, and it is not a "glittering generality." As surely as you liv, that doctrin known as Henry George's doctrin is correct, and will be adopted in time, and you may liv to see it if you are not old now. Read George's works, and if you are not convinced, I will pronounce you a hardshell, an incorrigible. I beheld the evils of land monopoly years before George was born, but I had not the genius nor the knowledge that he exhibits in his method of treating the subject. I knew the necessity for land-limitation, but did not think of a constitutional method of getting at it as he has. I, however, assisted in getting the freedom of the public land to actual settlers in quarter sections. I see you hav a discussion in your paper of the phonetic system of spelling, in which I hav felt an interest since my childhood.

PORTLAND, OR., July 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The lecture recently delivered in this city before a large audience by Mr. Samuel P. Putnam on "American Democracy" has commanded such universal attention and worked out such good results for our cause that I feel it should be recognized in a more public manner for the benefit of Freethought. Through this gentleman the great Northwest is now being moved to higher thought and action. The members of reform organizations, as well as Liberals, unite in the happy thought that free and equitable government is yet possible.

The consummation of Secularism will be equitable government. The æquitas of the Roman empire had reached its highest state when Constantine became converted to the Christian religion—when, as he passed through Italy, he saw a flaming cross in the heavens bearing the inscription, "In hoc signo vinces" (Under this sign thou shalt conquer); and when Christ appeared to him that night and commanded him to take for his standard an imitation of this fiery cross (so he said). This equity of nature was principally evolved by the Roman prætors and put into scientific shape by the great priests of the empire. The prætor did not lay down abstract propositions, but on taking his office issued an edict stating what he would do under certain specified circumstances, and also taking what his predecessor had left him and altering, amending, or adding to as the needs of an advancing civilization required. But that humanitarian jurisprudence of that rising civilization went down with the Roman empire and the triumph of Christianity, and equity has been a beggar in the world ever since.

England, in her formativ state, borrowed much from the jurisprudence of Rome, but the Anglican church soon discovered that she could not build up a land-grabbing aristocracy under the benign influence of these principles of equity left from the Roman law, and equity was soon assigned a separate jurisdiction, which was hedged in by arbitrary rules, fixed precedents, and technical forms of the law. So England, from that time to this, has had both law and equity.

About the beginning of the twelfth century England commenced teaching this jurisprudence of Rome in her colleges and schools. The English mind broadened, became more comprehensiv, and its people hav been abreast of her laws ever since.

Washington, Jefferson, Paine, Franklin, and other Liberals and Freethinkers gave the world the greatest Liberal, equitable, and fundamental document ever issued for the promotion of liberty—the Declaration of Independence. But slavery first, and then ecclesiastical rings and combinations, and heartless and artificial corporations hav robbed the people of their natural rights until the land is filled with woe and suffering.

Mr. Putnam showed that religion never gave the world a free government, and never could, for it did not preach and practice liberty itself; that two noted persons came to this country about the same time—John Wesley, advising us to stand by God and the king; Thomas Paine, telling us God would take care of himself, but for us to forsake and abjure the king and all oppression. The advice of one would hav reduced us to the condition of Ireland; the instructions of the other would hav made us a happy and prosperous people.

Mr. Putnam showed that the value of all the property in the United States, except church property, went through the tax-collector's hands once in forty years; that this inequality will increase church property and diminish the people's property until ruin and desolation will prevail. For this reason President Grant and General Garfield urged the taxation of church property to prevent confiscation and bloodshed. Mr. Putnam paid a beautiful and poetic tribute to Sunday, and claimed it for the people's holiday. He defended the Nine Demands of Liberalism with so much logic and force that a number of persons came over to Freethought, leaving their myths behind them. Mr. Putnam presents his cause, and not himself; he seeks results; he leads a new departure; he builds up. The Liberal ranks are full of would-be kings, popes, bishops, and priests, who for centuries hav bulldozed Freethinkers into inactivity and prevented them from organizing. Every village and city has one or more of these self-conceited fossils. Like the late Emperor Norton, of San Francisco, they hav no power to enforce their edicts, and nothing remains but to treat these non-commissioned tyrants with contempt. Let us organize! Let us join every Liberal society which comes along! Let us unite and use every instrumentality which will build up Liberalism. Then our roll-call will soon number millions, when humanity will hav hopeful births, glorious lives, and peaceful deaths.

Now, Liberals, are you willing to join with one from this sunset shore, and say that, if necessary, money, services, and life shall be devoted to the new departure?

CORNELIUS BEAL.

SQUAW CREEK, IDA., Aug. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Lying on my back unwell, I hav been perusing THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 23d. The pictures, of course, came first. That barrel of drugs is a perfect representation of the workings of the Maine law. The last picture represents one of our forefathers evoluted so he can play upon one string. After reading Jessie Brewster's piece on those animals in the "Children's Corner," the thought came, Whose turn will come next, if there are too many weak-kneed Americans, and an animal of the one-stringed order succeeds in melodious strains in lulling Mrs. Slenker to silence? Will it be Susan H. Wixon, too, who must stop her pen and her "Children's Corner?" I then opened a history of the country inhabited by the brave and the free. Having studied the same in boyhood days in school, I naturally opened near its close. Lo and behold, there was Jacob Sharp recorded. Then the thought occurs, When the next issue comes out, will the case of Mrs. Elmina Drake Slenker, of Snowville, Va., be as faithfully recorded, if convicted because from a differentiation of nature she branched off a little farther from her ancestors, and then, by improving herself by study and evolutional progress, became able to put her thoughts in books, papers, etc., and could play on even a harp of many strings, and, in her goodness of heart, devoted her time and talent for the good of generations yet unborn, when her ashes would be feeding the plants to sustain life for the brain of those who were growing from seed sown by her? If the animal of one string cannot appreciate the harp, should the one-stringed brute be permitted to harass, with the help of his same kind sitting as jurors and judges in places where justice is said to be dealt out in the nineteenth century?

If the New York Senate had power to appoint a committee for Jacob Sharp and others, why should it not be incumbent on some other Senate or somebody to look into an outrage worse than pinning Jesus Christ to a cross and giving him vinegar because he was born better than and in advance of his surroundings?

Unfortunately for herself, she was too much like him. She has been helping feed the hungry and clothe the naked and forsaken for years, as is known to others besides myself; and because she would see unborn generations more Christ-like to their fellow-men, her steps must be dogged by a Judas Iscariot, whose evolution seems to hav progressed just far enough to giv him the scent of a bloodhound. Well, too well, do those of that ilk know that the only way to silence a brain like hers is to crush the spirit till the body pines away from grief and is laid beneath the sod, or, as is done to the best brains and kindest hearts of Russia, to bury it alive in some bastile or Siberian mine. What, in the name of God, if there be one, has got into some brains of this country? When boys we all attended state and county fairs, where encouragement was given to raising nice, smooth vegetables, pumpkins, corn, etc., the best pulling teams, the fastest horses, the best milch cows, the plumpest pigs, the wooliest sheep, the nicest roosters, and the largest eggs. The old men, the young men, old ladies and young maidens, all became interested. Their brains grasped all they saw, and when the next year came round there were better stallions, better horses, better boars, better sows; the big eggs had brought forth larger and nicer hens and roosters; and they would all go joyfully home, each who had helped improve the animal or vegetable kingdom feeling elated at his success. And now, after half a century, an advanced spirit (like Copernicus, who told of the heavens, or Columbus, telling of another continent, or like Socrates) thinks the human (or inhuman, as you choose) family can be bred up to a better standard, so there may be fewer robbers, murderers, and thieves to take the roofs and clothing which may cover the shivering, hungry, naked, and forlorn unfortunates who are unable to protect themselvs, voters or otherwise, and are forced to succumb to the law of (survival of the fittest) might makes might; and she must be locked up with rats, and if she hav no money or friends she can rot there, and the one-string animal will curl his tail over a limb, crack a nut, show his teeth, and chatter the louder!

It is about time those who feel like good American citizens cast their banner to the breeze, nailed to the mast, said their prayer (Patrick Henry's speech before Congress), uttered their benediction (Gen. Warren before the battle of Bunker Hill), and died if need be. A. G. C.

CANAAN, O., Aug. 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: If you please, a few words for Mr. Bodge. The turn things hav taken between me and Mr. Bodge was not anticipated by me, but, hoping no harm has been done, I will make a few words of reply. I think I understand him fully, and that when he spells "giv," "liv," and "hav" by our present alphabet, he spells them just as I do, both understanding the sounds alike. THE TRUTH SEEKER and I use the phonetic alphabet, the first vowel letters of which are used invariably for the first sounds, as a in at, e in et, i in it, o in ot, and u in ut. Mr. Bodge probably did not know this, and would call them by their long-sound names, and therefore used figures instead of new letters. All right so far, but had he known the phonetic alphabet, he would hav been supplied with letters for his purposes.

Mr. Bodge thinks that "knowledge" should be spelt thus, "nalej," which he says is spelling the word as now pronounced. I beg pardon, friend Bodge. I hav three dictionaries, Webster, Walker, and Smalley, who all in the notation spell it as I do, using o as in "rot," "sot." Mr. Bodge says, "I would explain to Mr. Pikard that the authority of the spelling reform is not expected to extend over family names and proper nouns." Mr. Bodge, do you know that to be true? Were you present when Isaac Pitman, the father of the spelling reform, printed his phonetic Bible and dated it "Lundun," and printed at "Ba[phonetic character for th]," and spoke of the "Rev. Mr. Moseli" (Moseley)? Is not this spelling proper names by sound? To illustrate: There is a certain number of simple numbers, and a naught to signify location. These are represented by ten figures, which constitute a numeral alphabet, or alphabet of numbers. More is unnecessary; less would be a deficiency. It matters not what is numbered; it is the function of each figure infallibly to signify its number, without leaving us to guess. So our one hundred thousand words are made from thirty-five sounds, for each of which the phonetic alphabet furnishes a letter which as infallibly signifies one sound as a figure does a number, so that a correct, critical pronunciation can be arrived at without a guess, as numbers are by figures. Then children and foreigners can pronounce our words by simply knowing the letters, proper and common nouns alike, as all words are made from the sounds indicated by the alphabet. It is as important to know how to speak a proper noun as a common one, whether of person, place, or thing. Letters don't spell words. If they do, you need only to call over the names of the letters in the alphabet and you hav spelled all the words in the language. Letters spell sounds, aggregates of which make words.

But to return to the place of starting, the propriety of spelling "liv," "hav," and "giv" without a tail. Mr. Bodge must claim that these words are spelled right with a final e or wrong. If it is right to spell one sound by one letter only, then it would seem equally right to spell three sounds with three letters only. If this is allowed, then the question is whether I hav used the right letters.

No one objects to the letters in "giv," "liv," and "hav;" they are universally used in English in spelling these words, as necessary to spell these sounds in England and America. THE TRUTH SEEKER can't be much out of the way. The final e doesn't spell anything unless it is the fact that the person who puts it on doesn't know the function of letters.

If, therefore, THE TRUTH SEEKER has spelled these words as everybody else does, Mr. Bodge included, how could he ridicule that paper for spelling them right, in leaving off their useless tails? The toad, you know, when he has no more use for his tail, drops it off and goes bobtailed. I should hav supposed that our friend Bodge would hav shouted: "Hurrah for our TRUTH SEEKER! Go ahead. Just as fast as you can see a chance for another step forward, take it; for 'is' use 'iz,' for 'was' use 'woz,' for 'knowledge' use 'nolej,' and so on." No word will be obscured, nor anyone hurt, nor will any sensible person be offended at a step so important to universal intelligence.

Letters are to sounds what photographs are to people, and when we know the sounds that compose our names, we know how to spell them, and hence hav the word as certainly by the eye as by the ear when spoken.

Now, what is to hinder this? Oh, what a feather it would be in the cap of Freethinkers to add the spelling reform as the tenth Demand in their platform! The churches accuse them of never having done anything for education. The adoption of this reform and carrying it to success would do more for universal education than the churches hav ever done, all put together. It would add one-fourth to the education of the people at one-fourth less expense than now.

But friend Bodge did not say anything of that little font of phonetic type for the use of THE TRUTH SEEKER. What a diffusion of knowledge would be given if the "Children's Corner" should be printed phonetically! We can negotiate with the editor to ascertain what the cost would be of letters enough to print two columns to begin with. After the cost of the punches for the new type, the cost would not be more than that of Roman type. After that is ascertained, and we think proper, we will go among the people with a subscription paper and see what we can do for the type, including a little alphabetic plate, to be kept standing in the "Children's Corner." We hav $5 offered already. I will furnish the form of the new letters. Now, what will my friend say? A. B. PIKARD.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a panse in the day's occnpations
That is known as the Children's Honr."

My Souvenir.

'Tis not a letter seared with age,
The tear-bedimmed and yellow page,
Telling the tale of false and true,
And careful wrapped with sacred blue—
My souvenir.

'Tis not the time-stained, mildewed glove,
Sad talisman of buried love;
Nor rose, with petals brown and dried,
Which symbol hearts whose hopes hav died—
My sonvenir.

'Tis not a ring in rnbies set,
Nor cnrling tress of glossy jet;
Nor yet a thing to cause regret,
Or, laid away, one might forget—
My souvenir.

To me it is a boon more rare
Than jeweled ring or glossy hair,
Or aught beside, however fair—
My sonvenir.

Thongh queer, my sonvenir was spoken,
A precious, pure, and lasting token;
From lip to ear, to heart from ear,
Came that most treasured souvenir.

A litt'e boy, with lovely eyes
And sweet red lips, says his good-byes.
"Good-bye, Jinny!" to me he said.
I only kissed his rosy cheek;
The tears forbade the voice to speak.
The child to me is very dear,
And well I knew in parting then
We'd never meet the same again.
The child would go his way, I mine,
And change will ever come with time.
For thus will sadness fil the heart,
When comes the moment loved ones part.

So his "good-bye," which now I hear,
To me's a precious souvenir.

Little Edna.

I heard a funny story or two of little Edna H., the other day. She was rather fond of running away, or straying off where no one could find her. Her grandma told her that if she ran away again, she would hav to be tied just like the old hen that was always wanting to set. A day or two after, little Edna was heard screaming and crying as if her heart would break. Her grandma ran to see what was the matter. "Oh, dear!" she screamed between her sobs, "Edna has runned away, and—and—I tied her to de fence like de ole settin' hen!" And sure enough, the litle girl, after running a little distance, had tied her ankle to the fence and then commenced kicking and screaming as if somebody else had tied her instead of her own little hands.

One time she was riding with her grandma through a dense maple grove. It was very shady, and Edna began to cry.

"Oh, don't cry," said her grandma, "God will take care of you just the same in the dark wood as in the sunny field."

"I 'spect he will, grandma," said the child, "but I thought the bears might come out of the woods and eat up the horse! God might forget about the horse, you know!"

The Metals.

Did you ever think, my dears, what a world this would be without the metals? Just suppose there were no iron, no copper, no steel, no lead, no gold, no silver, no anything of a metallic nature!

Why, what should we be? What should we do? How could we liv?

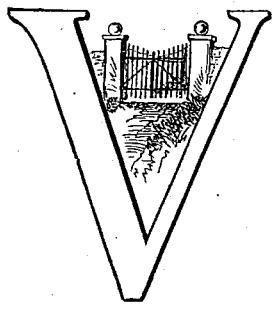
No iron for our stoves, pots, kettles, and engins; no copper for boilers, and other uses; no steel for rails for cars to run on, no steel for knives Why, what would the boys do for jack-knives? and all the thousand articles made of steel?

If there were no lead, no zinc, how strange it would seem! No metals at all, anywhere! Why, what a queer place the world would be, surely enough! The rocks and the trees would still be here, you say. Well, yes, but then, we couldn't make sewing machines, printing presses, telegraph and telephone wires, plows, forks, mowing machines, scythes, altogether of wood, you know, and what a sad plight we should be in!

And then, if there were no gold or silver, if no brave miner had ever been down beneath the earth's crust, and found the shining metals, what then?

Well, perhaps, we might hav got along without the two latter, for we could hav had something else to answer as a medium of exchange or money. But then, see all the pretty articles made of gold and silver, the rings, pins, bracelets, thimbles, all the thousand articles of use and beauty made from these ores to giv us pleasure.

These things are beautiful and refining; without them, man might relapse to the former state of barbarism. Hidden in the earth, they tax man's ingenuity to bring them to the surface and fashion them to use and beauty.



The mines of the earth mean knowledge, understanding. The metals are steps to higher knowledge, and some one has said: "The finer the metal the higher the civilization." So then the product of the mines means thought, culture, civilization, intelligence, scientific progress, and enlightenment. The pick and the drill that open the rocky doors of the earth are great factors, revealing the great age of the earth, and also foretelling the grand future of man. S. H. W.

Correspondence.

GRANT, ILL., July 24, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is some time since I wrote you a letter, but, seeing so many other children writing, I thought I would write again. I read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and like it very much. I think the pictures are pretty. My home is at Fox Lake, Lake county, Ill. I am staying with my grandpa and grandma for a while, and hav lots of fun milking cows, driving horses, riding out with grandpa, and gathering eggs. I think it delightful to run and play till I get tired, then come in, sit down, and read THE TRUTH SEEKER till I get rested again. I got "The Story Hour," and read it through and through, and then gave it to my cousin. I go to school, and study reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, geography, and grammar. I am eleven years old. Now I will close. I do not want to tire your patience. I remain,

Your loving friend, CORA M. HOWARD.

The Little Ones.

Shortly after General Grant's death a bright little boy in Bangor, Maine, held the following conversation with his grandmother:

"Grandma, did General Grant go to heaven?"

"Why, yes, dear," said grandma.

"But, grandma, how could he when they put him in the ground?"

"They only put the tired, sick part of him in the ground, dear. His soul went up to heaven."

"Yes'm," doubtfully; and then, after serious thought, "Grandma, do you s'pose he'll make a whole angel?"

The same little fellow is not very brave in the dark. One night his mother was putting him to bed, and it grew dark enough for a lamp, but our small friend made decided objections to being left alone while the lamp was found. In vain his mother protested: "But you won't be left alone, darling; God will be here." There was a short silence, and then, struck with a bright idea, the small boy exclaimed: "I say, mother, just send God after the lamp, and you stay here with me."

This story suggests another of a small maiden. One Sunday morning her mother essayed to wash her before putting on her "meeting dress." Now, Miss Floy strongly objected to being treated in this fashion, and, moreover, she had had a bath the night before. Her soul filled with righteous indignation. She cried: "Oh, mamma, I don't need to be washed, but maybe I want rinsing a little."

In a certain city in Connecticut there lived a very small boy with a liberal share of small "original sins." It chanced that one day he was playing in front of the house and overheard some street gamins using slang expressions profusely. He ran in to his mother crying: "Mamma, mamma, what's a 'gone sucker?'" Now, mamma did not in the least know, but as her son had been disobeying her that morning, she took advantage of the opportunity to point a good moral. "A gone sucker, my son? Why, it means a naughty little boy who doesn't mind his mother." That night, as Johnnie was saying his prayers, the full measure of his sin seemed to occur to him with awful significance, and stopping short in the usual petition, he cried out in the abandonment of his remorse: "O Lord, I'm a gone sucker!"

Sitting one Sunday in the Bible class, during a pause in the conversation there suddenly floated down to me from the infant class in the gallery the "golden text," as it was being recited by an exceedingly diminutiv scrap of a boy: "Not for our shins alone, but for the shins of the whole world."—Harper's Magazine.

The Bobolinks.

Bobolink is a very dandy-looking fellow, proud as a belle who has danced with the Prince of Wales or the Duke Alexis. He has a habit of singing in rattling notes in the air and hovering until his rollicking solo is finished; or, if he commences his song on a stake or a tree, he never rises until his music is completed. Many writers hav tried to imitate his song. Bryant and Irving both giv him a prominent place in the written picture galleries.

When I was a boy on the farm we used to call him the corn-planting bird, and, as we read his song, he said: "Dig a hole, dig a hole, put it in, cover't up, cover't up, stamp on't, stamp on't, step along." He wore his parti-colored suit, the main portion of a genteel black, a little whitish-yellow powder in his hair, as if he had poked his head into a lily some time and carried away the pollen, and a shoulder-strap of the same on each side of the neck, proving him a brigadier in the army of peace. In the autumn the bobolinks go South on a furlough, take off their gaudy uniform, put on suits of rusty black, change their name, and become either reed birds or rice birds.—Hearth and Home.

Gleanings.

Talent is power; tact is skill. Talent is weight; tact is momentum. Talent knows what to do; tact knows how to do it. Talent makes a man respectable; tact will make him respected. Talent is wealth; tact is ready money. For all the practical purposes of life tact carries it against talent in the proportion of ten to one.

A little girl saw an old drunken man lying on a door-step, the perspiration pouring off his face, and a crowd of children preparing to make fun of him. She took her little apron and wiped his face, and then looked up pitifully to the rest, and made this remark: "Oh, don't hurt him! He is somebody's grandpa."

A lady noted as a model housekeeper, on being asked by a friend how she was able to manage everything so easily and so well, replied: "My dear, you must know that the root of power is knowledge. Because I know how things ought to be done, I get them done." This applies to almost everything else as well as to housekeeping. "Knowledge is power" the world over, and the lack of it leads not only to misery, but often to destruction.

Once upon a time a good man took his little boy to the gallery of the House to show him the great men of the nation, and they listened eagerly to an able effort by one of them. When he had finished, the father turned to the boy and put his hand on his head. "My son," he said, "an honest man is the noblest work of God." The boy looked into his father's face with his great, earnest eyes. "Papa," he inquired, simply, "who made Congressmen?"

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secnlar Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Bepublic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesqnes of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

The Newer Bells.

"Ring out the old, ring in the new."
O letters with your golden bands,
Bring truer words to all our hands
Till freedom dwells in all the lands,
And men are great in being true.

Ring out the slaves, ring in the free—
The martyrs who with voice and pen
Shall speed their pages' clearer ken.
Redeem the world with better men,
And each the "Christ that is to be."

Ring out the myths of musty creeds
That narrow down and hedge us in.
This is the church's shame and sin,
But Reason's flaming camp-fires win,
Rejecting ashen molds and weeds.

Ring in the right, ring out the wrong,
The selfish lust of power and pride,
When England's poor are crucified,
And starving babes for bread hav cried
To swell one jubilee of song.

Ring out the pope, ring in the press,
And bid the sons of Erin go
To greener plains and whiter snow,
To brighter hills from want and woe,
Where broad domains are tenantless.

Ring out the rich, ring in the poor,
Who soon shall share the bread and wine—
This humble song to be the sign
That here I giv this hand of mine
To guard brawn Labor's cottage door.

Ring in the smiles, ring out the tears,
Of toilers bowed beneath a yoke
Till Labor longs for battle smoke,
For hands of steel and thunder stroke,
Where wealth has cursed a thousand years.

Ring out the boast of everywhere
Till this wide world, from sea to sea,
For faith has but humanity;
Nor false light shall its flotsam be
When all the gods are only men.

"Ring in the new, ring out the old"—
O sweetest words of any time,
What sad hearts leap to hear your chime
That, sweeter than my moaning rhyme,
Shall stamp the future's better gold!

Ring out the huts, ring in the homes;
Ring out the grief, ring in the cheer;
Ring out the prince, ring in the peer;
Ring simple silence round the bier;
Ring out the bells and gilded domes.

Book Notices.

THE STRUGGLE FOR RELIGIOUS AND POLITICAL LIBERTY. By Theo. C. Spencer. New York: The Truth Seeker Co. Price, 75 cents.

No doubt many Freethinkers, long occupied with consideration of some single detached problem of our present intellectual warfare, and having had time to notice little but the more pressing special questions of the hour set forth in our journals, will gladly receive this masterly synopsis of the history of the Christian religion, in all its varied manifestations, and of despotic government, with the gradual emancipation from both. It omits no salient fact, and is written in a condensed but admirably lucid style, with every detail arranged in its clear and logical connection with the posited fundamental principles, and every statement introduced in a setting of deep and suggestiv thought. An eminent English writer once said in concluding a letter to a friend, "I havn't had time to write you a short letter, so I hav written you a long one;" and it is unfortunately true that many writers do not spend on their works the studied, anxious labor requisit to reduce lengthy assemblages of facts and iteration to the lucidity, order, and brevity that characterize this book. The chapter headings are as follows: "Introductory; The Beginning; The Pagans and Jews; The Church of Rome; Mormonism, Mohammedanism; Dogmatism; Martin Luther and John Calvin; The Godhead; Persecution of the Early Christians; Christians persecute Christians; The Wrongs of Ireland; Huguenots persecute Catholics; Catholics persecute Huguenots; The Puritans; The Pilgrims; The Revolution; The Church of England; Protestant Churches of America; Slavery; The Cause Found." Few having read this fascinating and valuable work will find themselvs to lack, when engaged in disputation with some Christian, one of those statements of fact that are generally followed by a perplexed silence on the part of the religious polemicist, a constrained remark about the weather and crops, and a hasty adieu.

We hav received from the Truth Seeker Company a copy of "The Struggle for Religious and Political Liberty," by Theodore C. Spencer. This book givs an outline history of the struggle of the human race for liberty from the earliest ages, showing how the race has advanced slowly but surely, marking their way with sighs, tears, and blood, wrung from them by stripes of cruel oppressors, from remote antiquity down to the present time. When we look around and see how much is still to be accomplished, we feel as if the task were almost hopeless; but when we look back and see how much has been accomplished, we are enabled to gird up our loins anew and go forth, with high hopes and bounding heart, to renew the great fight which must ever go on as long as there is a right or a privilege of which a single human being is deprived. This book is well worthy of a careful perusal by all who want to know what great strides the human race has taken in the cause of liberty.—The Southland.

Freethinkers wishing their sons or daughters to attend a college where they will not be impeded or disgusted by absurd Christian doctrins or ceremonies, will do well to send to the Freethought University of Liberal, Mo., for a copy of its "First Annual Catalog."

The latest work on Spiritualism is published by Colby & Rich, Boston, and entitled, "Lifting the Veil." It is a large, handsome volume, and contains several fine engravings. The authors, Susan J. and Andrew A. Finck, giv a thorough and well-written exposition of the Spiritualistic doctrins, enlivened with many personal reminiscences and anecdotes. Price, $2.

The contributors to the September number of the Forum are to be: the Hon. Thomas White, minister of the interior of Canada; Mrs. Craik, author of "John Halifax, Gentleman;" Dr. Jessopp, the well-known English essayist; President Bascom, of Williams College; Professor Young, the astronomer; Senator Ingalls, Andrew Lang, Professor Cope, Bishop Coxe, Nicholas P. Gilman, and Professor Winchell.

O. H. Harris, of Newman, Ill., has discovered that of the Bible threats of annihilation of man more use the word "soul" than the word "spirit," and writes thereon a book, "The Spirit of Man is Immortal, but the Soul of Man is Not Immortal." Its teaching will be sufficiently indicated by its title; Freethinkers will add it to their list of examples of the sad waste of painstaking and ingenuity for which Christianity is responsible.

Dr. Alexander Ross, president of the Canadian Anti-Compulsory Vaccination League, issues at Montreal, Canada, a small book setting forth that vaccination is not only absolutely valueless in the prevention of smallpox, but is an activ factor in its propagation by creating a susceptibility to the disease, and is an agent in the transmission of many other maladies. The author adduces corroborativ views of many of the highest medical authorities.

Part III. of "Woman: Her Glory, Her Shame, and Her God," by Saladin, is out. Those of our readers who hav perused previous writings of this popular English Freethinker will no doubt at once secure copies of this work; those who hav not, should know that in Saladin's books they will make acquaintance with a writer in originality, vivacity, and power perhaps unsurpassed among living Freethinkers, and whom they will do ill to miss. Price per part, 30 cents.

We hav received from Mr. I. E. Welch, New Haven, Ct., the following letter: "I wish to testify to the merit of a pamphlet issued by you entitled, 'Personal Existence After Death Improbable,' by L. R. Smith. It is a remarkable pamphlet, being very scholarly in composition, and one of the best documents on the question of immortality that I hav ever read. Liberals and Materialists wishing to procure a good thing for missionary work would do well to procure a few copies of this excellent book."

The latest number of the Humboldt Science Library is a double number (30 cents): "The Formation of Vegetable Mold Through the Action of Earth-Worms," by Charles Darwin. Of the great Darwin, it is eminently true that he touched no subject without adorning it. What more unpromising theme can be thought of than "the action of earthworms?" But when one of the highest geniuses of our time undertakes to study these creatures, and to describe their habits and their labors, he invests even that subject with the profoundest interest. The titles of the several chapters show the wide range of the great naturalist's researches in this field. He treats of the habits of worms; the amount of fine earth brought up by worms; the part played by worms in the burial of ancient buildings; the denudation of land by the action of worms, and many other aspects of the subject.

In turning over the pages of such a book as "Try-Square; or, The Church of Practical Religion," it becomes a difficult matter to judge it fairly. The author is of the species "crank," but evidently with an honest conviction of his mission to reform the world, if he can—to lift up his voice at all events, and reprove it for its shortcomings, moral, physical, and spiritual, and offer such advice as he is capable of giving. He is earnest, but sometimes incoherent, and always inelegant. Literary graces he has none, and evidently does not care for them. The author does not giv his name, and has published under the auspices of the Truth Seeker Company, of New York.—Springfield Republican.

"Romantic Love and Personal Beauty: Their Development, Causal Relations, Historic and National Peculiarities," is the attractiv title of a new work announced by Macmillan & Co. The author, Mr. Henry T. Finck (Harvard, 1876), has collected a number of curious facts tending to show that Romantic Love (as distinguished from conjugal affection) is a modern sentiment, only about six hundred years old. He analyzes Love into eleven constituent traits and emotions (including Admiration of Personal Beauty, Emotional Hyperbole, Gallantry, Coyness, Jealousy, etc.), and shows, in separate chapters on "Love Among Animals" and "Savages," "Ancient Hebrew Love," "Greek Love," etc., that although traces of some of the elements of Love are to be found among animals and primitiv men, the majority were absent even in the love-affairs of the ancient civilized nations, owing to the lack of opportunities for courtship (chaperonage), the degraded position of women, and the substitution of parental dictation in place of the free choice of lovers. In "Roman Love" Gallantry makes its first appearance; and Gallantry gone mad is the characteristic trait of chivalrous or "Medieval Love." Under "Modern Love" there are a number of subheads, such as "First Love is not best;" "True Love is transient;" "Love at first sight;" "Coyness lessens woman's Love;" "Masculin versus feminin Love," arguing that man's Love is deeper than woman's. In three chapters on Genius and Love, the author endeavors to prove by numerous biographic illustrations that all geniuses are amorous, and then considers the analogies between "Insanity and Love," and the "Language of Love," including "Kissing—Past, Present, and Future." "How to Win Love" and "How to Cure Love" are two chapters summing up the wisdom of philosophers, wits, and poets on this subject, from Ovid to Heine and Byron. Six chapters are devoted to French, Italian, Spanish, German, English, and American Love, corresponding to six subsequent chapters on Personal Beauty in those countries, as affected by the chief sources of Beauty—Hygiene, Crossing, Mental Culture, and Romantic Love. That Romantic Love becomes an important source of Personal Beauty (through sexual selection) is shown in the analysis of Schopenhauer's Theory of Love, and in a series of chapters on the eyes, cheeks, nose, ears, hair, complexion, etc., each containing numerous cosmetic and hygienic hints and a history of fashionable aberrations of taste. Price, $2. Like any other books our readers may wish, it can be obtained from the Truth Seeker Company.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

A DECISION of insanity has been given in the case of Mr. Briggs, a gentleman who was arrested one night last week for disorderly conduct in New York streets, insisting that he was above all human laws and amenable only to divine direction.

THERE were ninety-nine excise arrests in New York city last Sunday.

CONSIDERABLE appropriations for the navy are being made, and new cruisers built.

THERE is much suffering along the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador from need of food and clothes.

A LOCAL assembly has withdrawn from the Labor party in Chicago because of the predominance of the Anarchistic elements.

BELGIUM and Holland are making very extensiv military preparations, fearing destruction in the expected Franco-German war.

SECRETARY LAMAR has ordered the restoration to the national domain of the indemnity lands granted to the Atlantic & Pacific railway company.

THE Rev. Dr. Curran, a prominent associate of George and McGlynn, has abandoned them and their cause at the order of his Catholic superior.

STRIKES continue of very frequent occurrence throughout the country, and are often attended with violence.

THE steamer City of Montreal, Inman line, was burnt at sea Aug. 11th, but fortunately only thirteen lives were lost.

THE Ancient Order of Hibernians is in dissension over the action of a Brooklyn division in engaging a lecture from Dr. McGlynn.

THE Rev. Wm. Fox, a Methodist minister and ardent Prohibitionist of Nashville, Tenn., has been arrested for selling whisky without a license.

RUSSIA remains isolated in her protest against the recent assumption of the Bulgarian throne by Prince Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg.

THE revolutionary movement in Russia continues to spread among the students, but the masses remain devoutly attached to their czar and church.

MANY conflicting reports as to Stanley's fate arrive from Africa. Emin Bey, the captured governor of whom he went in search, is reported alive and well.

DR. MCGLYNN is instructing the people that, in their bearing upon the labor reform, "the creeds of the church are useful and beautiful; they throw a strong light on the way."

THE old Know-Nothing party, it is said, is about to be revived. Its friends claim for it 1,500,000 members. It insists upon the restriction of immigration. Powderly is said to be a member.

THE Women's Christian Temperance Union has sent out from Chicago a call to all Christian women in every land to observe Nov. 12th and 13th as days of prayer for the success of temperance work.

THE lord lieutenant of Ireland has issued a proclamation denouncing the Irish National League as dangerous, preparatory to taking legal action toward its suppression. The League intends to change its name and continue its work.

THE most serious of the week's railway accidents is the wreck of a B. & O. express at Washington on the 17th, in which the engineer was killed and twenty persons were injured. It was caused by the failure of every brake to work when emergency required.

LITTLE boy: "Pa, what does 'phenomenal' mean?" Father: "It is a word used by the citizens of Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska when they refer to the growth of their respectiv towns. It doesn't mean much."

"How is your son to-day?" asked a friend of a Wall street broker. "Very bad," replied the old gentleman, striving to compose his agitated features; "very bad, indeed. I would not giv ten per cent for his chance of life."

ST. PETER: "Come in, good and faithful servant." Newly-arrived spirit: "Servant, is it ye say? It's lady's help I waz, sir." "Oh, never mind; come in." "That's heaven, is it?" "This is heaven." "How many nights an' afternoons out will I hav?"

S. P.: "Enter, sir, and turn into that avenue to the right." N. S.: "Thanks, sire. Where does it lead?" S. P.: "To the celestial asylum for imbecils."

DE GARMO: "So you're all alone, eh?" Basom: "Yes, the old lady and the girls hav gone to the seashore." De Garmo: "Will they be there long?" Basom: "I hope not. I hav very encouraging reports as to the possibility of my becoming the father-in-law of a French marquis. There is nothing like having a good barber in the family."

"WHAR' d' yo' git dat load er lumber, Br'er Jimson?" "Down ter de Healin' Ba'm church." "Dasso, Br'er Jimson? Why, has dey tored de buildin' down?" "Oh, no, sah! Hit's dar yet, but I hearn Parson Blowhard say dat de pews was free, so I riz up 'arly dis mornin' an' went down dar an' ripped up a pa'r of 'em an' fotched 'em erlong."

IT was in one of the stately mansions of Beacon street, Boston, that our story opens. He was declaring his love in language that only a Boston youth can use, and even he must be sober. "Dearest Penelope," he said, "if I had loved you less I could hav told you that I loved you long ago. If——" But he suddenly stopped. A far-away whither-am-I-drifting look had come over the girl's face, and his heart sank within him. "If my words are displeasing to you, Miss Penelope," he went on in his broken tones, "if I hav said what I ought not to say, or you ought not to hear; if I——" "Not at all," interrupted Penelope, looking wildly about her, "but I hav certainly lost my spectacles. Oh, there they are. Thanks. As you were saying, Mr. Waldo——"

A WITNESS was being examined before a Dakota justice of the peace, and in the course of his testimony mentioned having said to the prisoner at one time that he had a horse he wanted to trade. "Hey?" said the prosecuting attorney, who was conducting the examination; "was it that sor'l one of yours?" "Yes." "Want to trade yet?" "Don't care if I do—what you got?" "He hasn't anything that you want," put in the attorney for the defense; "if you want to trade, I can giv you a mighty good show with my bay mare." "Order in the court-room!" roared the justice, waking up at this point; "what was the last testimony you gave?" "I said I once met the prisoner, and said to him: 'Bill, I'd like to trade you that sor'l mare o' mine——'" "Hold on a minute," said the justice; "you don't want to trade your sor'l yet, I s'pose?" "I might if I got a good chance." "Say," continued the court, "if you mean business, I can giv you jest the slickest swap for that buckskin hoss of mine, an' 'bout ten dollars to boot, that you ever seen! This court is adjourned for one hour—come out to the barn and look my hoss over."

Gems of Thought.

IT was not only born in Lady Malin's blood, but from earliest years had been impressed in her brain, that her first duty was to her family, and mainly consisted in getting well out of the way—in going peaceably through the fire to Moloch, that the rest might hav good places in the temple of Mammon. In her turn, she had trained her children to the bewildering conviction that it was their duty to do a certain wrong, if it should be required. That wrong thing (namely, to marry a man that she could neither love nor respect, nor even tolerate) was now required of Hesper—a thing she scorned, hated, shuddered at; she must follow the rest; her turn to be sacrificed was come; she must henceforth be a living lie. She could recompense herself, as the daughters who hav sinned by yielding generally do, when they are mothers, with the sin of compelling, and thus make the trespass round and full. There is in no language yet the word invented to fit the vileness of such mothers; but, as time flows and speech grows, it may be found, and, when it is found, it will hav action retrospectiv. —Macdonald's Mary Marston.

MR. DAVIDGE, in his speech on the trial of Guiteau, referred to "the Atheist Tom Paine," which showed him to be either an ignorant man or a man indifferent to truth. Thomas Paine was exactly the reverse of an Atheist. He was a Deist; that is, he was a believer in one God. Deists are not uncommon, and they were even common in England in the last century; and Mr. Paine was an Englishman, and he was born in 1737, when Deism was the creed of half the cultivated men in the British empire. His splendid services to this country, some time before the French alliance had made its independence a certainty, entitles him to be safe from American misrepresentation.—Boston Traveler.

"AT the trial of Louis XVI.," says Madame De Stael, "Thomas Paine alone proposed what would hav done honor to France if it had been accepted—the offer to the king of an asylum in America; by which he offended the Mountain party; and in 1793 Robespierre caused him to be ejected and thrown into prison, where he wrote the 'Age of Reason,' against Atheism and against Christianity, and in favor of Deism."—Chambers' Encyclopedia.

THE question of the tenure of land is a deep and important one, and must needs engage the attention of good men of all countries.—D. M. Bennett.

THE greatest man is he who chooses right with the most invincible resolution; who resists the sorest temptations from within and without; who bears the heaviest burdens cheerfully; who is calmest in storms, and most fearless under menaces and frowns; whose reliance on truth, on virtue, and on God is most unfaltering.—Seneca.

MY creed is this: 1. Happiness is the only good. 2. The way to be happy is to make others happy. Other things being equal, that man is happiest who is the nearest just—who is truthful, merciful, and intelligent—in other words, the man who lives in accordance with the conditions of life. 3. The time to be happy is now, and the place to be happy is here. 4. Reason is the lamp of the mind—the only torch of progress; and, instead of blowing that out and depending upon darkness and dogma, it is far better to increase that sacred light. 5. Every man should be the intellectual proprietor of himself—honest with himself and intellectually hospitable—and upon every brain reason should be enthroned as king. 6. That every man must bear the consequences, at least, of his own actions; that if he put his hand in the fire, his hand must smart, and not the hands of another. In other words, that each man must eat the fruit of the tree he plants.—Ingersoll's Tilt with Talmage.

THE horrible doctrin of unending punishment is asserted by Jesus, and all the efforts of his modern disciples will not explain away this fact. The tares are to be bound up in bundles to be burnt. The wicked are to be cast into a furnace of fire, where there will be wailing and gnashing of teeth. It is better to enter into life mutilated than to be thrown unmutilated into the fire of hell which is never quenched. The servant who had made no money by usury is cast into outer darkness. The righteous go into eternal life; the wicked go to eternal punishment. Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost cannot be forgiven, but involves eternal damnation. It is almost needless to observe that no wickedness could ever justify punishment without an end; that is, punishment for punishment's sake; and that the creation of human beings whose existence terminated in torture would be in itself a far more terrible crime than any which the basest of mankind can ever commit.—Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief.

HERBERT SPENCER loses money, while Oscar Wilde gathers in the shekels by the peck. Emerson has to think twice before buying a rare book, while the successful pork-packer pays $5,000 for counterfeit Murillos. The great philosopher wears darned stockings, while the preacher of absurd superstition has whole bushels of fancy-worked slippers.—Boston Herald.

HOW UNCLE SAM ROBS THE POOR TO FEED DRONES.

Notes and Clippings.

THERE is a Sunday law in Mexico, and the officials sometimes enforce it. The Two Republics says: "On account of the miserably poor bull-fight at San Rafael Sunday before last, Manager Pubilones has been fined $500 by the presiding regidor."

A PROPOSITION will be presented to the next Mexican Congress for the taxation of all churches and church property one-fourth of one per cent as a rental. This refers to that class of edifices which under the law of December 14, 1874, are the property of the nation.

A YOUNG thief named Dohne who has for years secured rich plunder in the houses of New York religious people whom he pleased with his unusually fervent piety, has been arrested, but insists that the complainant should withdraw her charge to "giv him a chance to make his peace with God."

THE pastor of the A. M. E. Zion church of Kingston has been found by his trustees to be guilty of the following misdemeanors: 1. Misappropriation of church money; 2. Usurpation of authority; 3. Removing church organ without consent of trustees; 4. Refusal to surrender the church books; 5. Forgery.

RICHARD HUNT, a colored preacher, of the Hermitage district, near Nashville, Tenn., has built up a little congregation and established a small church. He wanted to hold a revival, but had no money for lights, etc. He stole a cow and sold it for $15, and started his revival. He had secured fifteen converts, and six more promising mourners were on the anxious seat, when the constable came along, closed up the revival, and brought Hunt to Nashville, where he is now in jail.

THE way the Rev. J. J. Henry's misuse of his means of grace was found out was his victim gave premature birth to an infant, and, under the impression that she was dying, made an ante-mortem statement inculpating him. The Kansas City Times of August 16th has a telegram, stating that she has recovered sufficiently to break a cane over the Rev. Henry's head, and chase him home and clear under the bed.

THE Socialists are in hot pursuit of Henry George. They hav found out that in January, 1881, he made an address before the Spread the Light Club, in Brooklyn, in which was this: "Mankind must rise to some system of coöperation or go down to Anarchy. Our civilization must mount up to the ideal of the Socialists; it must follow in the path of every preceding civilization, or rush into Anarchy and ruin."

A PECULIAR case is claiming the attention of attorneys at Akron, O. A clairvoyant was arrested some time since on complaint of one of her customers on a charge of obtaining money by false pretense. A justice of the peace found her guilty and sentenced her to a term in the workhouse. She served one day, and was then released on a writ of habeas corpus issued by Judge Ripson of the circuit court, who held that the woman was at work at an avocation, that it was no offense against the statutes to obtain work by false pretense. Now the woman has brought suit against the justice who committed her and his bondsmen, and also against the deputy sheriff who took her to the workhouse, for false imprisonment. The case is being watched with interest.

IN the Anamosa, Iowa, penitentiary, according the superintendent's report for the biennial period ending June 30, 1887, there are seventy-seven Catholics, seventy-one Methodists, one Infidel, eighty-two belonging to various other denominaticns, and ninety-seven not religiously affiliated. One out of three hundred and twenty-eight is pretty good showing for the Infidels of Iowa, for the state is full of them.

THE World says that in about a fortnight the Evening Standard will unfurl its labor banner under the editorial quill of Rev. Dr. McGlynn. The moneyed man in the enterprise is said to be Allen Thorndyke Rice, of the North American Review, who is also said to own an interest in Henry George's Standard. A month later a daily morning paper is to be started, with well-known labor sympathizers upon the editorial staff. The name decided upon is the American Workman.

THE Jewish Times finds only a slight difference between Dr. Oswald's religion of the future and Judaism. The Times says: "THE TRUTH SEEKER is publishing a series of excellent articles from the pen of a noted Agnostic writer, Dr. Felix L. Oswald, author of 'Physical Education,' 'The Secrets of the East,' etc. The series when completed are to be considered as a contribution to the religion of the future. We hav carefully read the papers so far published, and the philosophy of living as outlined therein is strikingly Jewish in its principles. In fact, the only difference we can see is that in Dr. Oswald's philosophy there is no exalted and sublime spiritua ideal such as exists in the philosophy of Judaism." The Times deserves credit for its original discovery.

La Réform, of Brussels, states that many Belgian Freethinkers hav notified the Council General of the International Federation of Freethinkers at Antwerp of their intention to attend the London International Freethought Congress, to be held at the Hall of Science, on September 10th, 11th, and 12th, and that twelve delegates will attend from the city of Antwerp. What are the Freethought societies of the United States going to do about being represented at the Congress?

A MOST interesting paper by Professor Dr. Ludwig Büchner on "Freethought and the Social Question," has first place in the Brussels La Société Nouvelle. It is written specially in view of two questions placed by the General Council on the order of the day for discussion at the forthcoming London International Freethought Congress: "Can the Freethought Question be Separated from the Social Question?" "On the Social Relatio.s of Freethought in the Past, Present, an Future." Dr. Büchner writes that in hi opinion Freethought has only a very indirect relation with Socialism. "One can be a Freethinker," he says, "and decidedly adverse to Socialism, or a determined partisan of Socialism and yet pious and believing. Christianity—of which Freethought is in all things the adversary—has had in principle an evidently Socialistic and even Communistic character."—National Reformer.

I.—Mental Maxims.

CHAPTER I.—KNOWLEDGE.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

In the arena of life animal instinct triumphs over the elemental forces of Nature, as human intelligence triumphs over instinct, and the secret of that superiority is knowledge. Skill is well-directed force. Prudence is well-applied reason. The efficiency of that directing faculty depends on experience, as we call the accumulation of recollected facts. Knowledge is stored light, as helpful in the narrowest as in the widest sphere of conscious activity, and the instinctive appreciation of that advantage manifests itself in the lowest species of vertebrate animals, nay, perhaps even in the winged insects that swarm in from near and far to explore the mystery of a flickering torch. Curiosity, rather than the supposed love of rhythm, tempts the serpent to leave its den at the sound of the conjurer's flute. Dolphins are thus attracted by the din of a kettledrum, river-fish by the glare of a moving light. Where deer abound, a pitchwood fire, kindled in a moonless night, is sure to allure them from all parts of the forest. Antelope hunters can entice their game within rifle-shot by fastening a red kerchief to a bush and letting it flutter in the breeze. When the first telegraph lines crossed the plateau of the Rocky Mountains, herds of bighorn sheep were often seen trotting along the singing wires as if anxious to ascertain the meaning of the curious innovation. Every abnormal change in the features of a primitive landscape—the erection of a lookout-tower, a clearing in the midst of a primeval forest—attracts swarms of inquisitive birds, even crows and shy hawks, who seem to recognize the advantage of reconnoitering the topography of their hunting grounds. In some of the higher animals inquisitiveness becomes too marked to mistake its motive, as when a troop of colts gathers about a inew dog, or a pet monkey pokes his head into a cellar-hole, and wears out his finger-nails to ascertain the contents of a brass rattle.

For the intelligence of children, too, inquisitiveness is a pretty sure test. Infants of ten months may be seen turning their eyes toward a new piece of furniture in their nursery. Kindergarten pets of three years have been known to pick up a gilded pebble from the gravel road and call their teacher's attention to the color of the abnormal specimen. With a little encouragement that faculty of observation may develop surprising results. The wife of a Mexican missionary of my acquaintance, who had taken charge of an Indian orphan boy, and made a point of answering every pertinent question of the bright-eyed youngster, was one day surprised to hear him usher in a stranger and invite him to a seat in the parlor. "How could you know it was not a tramp?" she asked her little chamberlain after the visitor had left. "Oh, I could tell by his clean finger-nails," said Master Five years, "and also by his straight shoes. Tramps always get their heels crooked!"

The shrewd remarks of boy naturalists and girl satirists often almost confirm the opinion of Goethe that every child has the innate gifts of genius, and that subsequent differences are only the result of more or less propitious educational influences. And in spite of most discouraging circumstances, the love of knowledge sometimes revives in after years with the energy almost of a passionate instinct. On the veranda of a new hotel in a railroad town of southern Texas, I once noticed the expression of rapt interest on the face of a young hunter, a lad of eighteen or nineteen, who here for the first time came in contact with the representatives of a higher civilization and with breathless attention drank in the conversation of two far-traveled strangers. "If they would hire me for a dog-robber (a low menial), I would do it for a dime a day," he muttered, "just for the chance to hear them talk."

"But if they should take you to some smoky, crowded, big city?"

"I don't care," said he, with an oath, "I would let them lock me up in a jail, if I could get an education like theirs."

It would, indeed, be a mistake to suppose that the thirst for mental development is the exclusive product of advanced culture. In the thinly settled highlands of our western territories, miners and herders have been known to travel ten miles a day over rough mountain roads to get the rudiments of a school education. Missionaries who have mastered the language of a barbarous tribe have more than once been followed by converts whom the charm of general knowledge (far more than any special theological motive) impelled to forsake the home of their fathers and follow the white stranger to the land of his omniscient countrymen.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

Knowledge is power, even in the contests of brutes. Superior topographical knowledge enables the chasing wolf to intercept the flight of his game; a well-chosen ambush makes the tiger the master of his would-be slayer. Familiarity with the habits of enemies and rivals decides success in the struggle for existence.

The advantage of superior knowledge is not limited to the prestige of superlative scholarship, but asserts itself in the chances of every competitive pursuit, so infallibly, indeed, as to justify Diderot's paradox that there is no need of any such thing as love of science for its own sake, since all knowledge repays its acquisition by collateral benefits. A farmer's boy studying statute law, a lawyer collecting market-reports, will sooner or later find a chance to profit by their study. The infinite interaction of human affairs connects the interests of all branches of human knowledge, and makes the humblest handicraft amenable to scientific improvement. Knowledge has never hindered the successful pursuit of any manual vocation. Fifty years ago several states of the American Union made it a penal offense to teach a slave reading and writing; and if the planter valued his laborers in proportion to their canine submissiveness, he was perhaps right that "education spoils a nigger." It qualified his servility, and by making him a better man, made him perhaps a less available dog. But with that single exception, ignorance is a disadvantage, and knowledge an advantage, both to its possessor and his employers. In the solitudes of the Australian bush-land, Frederick Jerstaecker found a herdsman reading Aristophanes in the original. Neither the sheep nor their owners were any the worse for that incidental accomplishment of the poor shepherd, who found his study a sufficient source of pastime, while his comrades were apt to drown their ennui in bad rum. James Cook, the greatest of modern maritime discoverers, served his apprenticeship on board of a coal-barge and employed his leisure in studying works on geography and general history. The knowledge, thus acquired, might seem of no direct advantage, but three years after, on board of the Eagle frigate, the erudition of the brawny young sailor soon attracted the attention of two intelligent officers whose recommendations proved the stepping-stones of his successful career. Mohammed Baber Khan, the emperor of the Mogul empire, owed his triumphs to his topographical studies of a region which afterward became the battleground of his great campaigns. Mohammed the Prophet gained the confidence of his first employer by his familiarity with the commercial customs of neighboring nations. Superior knowledge compels even an unwilling recognition of its prestige. In the Middle Ages, when Moslems and Trinitarians were at daggers drawn, Christian kings sent respectful embassies to solicit the professional advice of Ibn Rhus ("Averroes"), the Moorish physician. During the progress of the life-and-death struggle of France and Great Britain, the discoveries of Sir Humphrey Davy impelled the Academie Française to send their chief prize to England. The benefits of great inventions are too international to leave room for that envy that pursues the glory of military heroes, and the triumphs of science have often united nations whom a unity of religion had failed to reconcile.

C.—PERVERSION.

There is a tradition that a year before the conversion of Constantine the son of the prophetess Sospitra was praying in the temple of Serapis, when the spirit of his mother came over him and the veil of the future was withdrawn. "Woe to our children!" he exclaimed, when he awakened from his trance, "I see a cloud approaching, a great darkness is going to spread over the face of the world." That darkness proved a thirteen hundred years' eclipse of common sense and reason. There is a doubt if the total destruction of all cities of the civilized world could have struck a more cruel blow to Science than the dogma of salvation by faith and abstinence from the pursuit of free inquiry. The ethics of the world-renouncing fanatic condemned the love of secular knowledge as they condemned the love of health and the pursuit of physical prosperity, and the children of the next fifty generations were systematically trained to despise the highest attribute of the human spirit. Spiritual poverty became a test of moral worth; philosophers and free inquirers were banished, while mental castrates were fattened at the expense of toiling rustics and mechanics; science was dreaded as an ally of skepticism, if not of the arch-fiend in person; the suspicion of sorcery attached to the cultivation of almost any intellectual pursuit, and the Emperor Justinian actually passed a law for the "suppression of mathematicians."

When the tyranny of the church reached the zenith of its power, natural science became almost a tradition of the past. The pedants of the convent schools divided their time between the forgery of miracle legends and the elaboration of insane dogmas. The most extravagant absurdities were propagated under the name of historical records; medleys of nursery-tales and ghost-stories which the poorest village school-teacher of pagan Rome would have rejected with disgust were gravely discussed by so-called scholars. Buckle, in his "History of Civilization," quotes samples of such chronicles which might be mistaken for products of satire, if abundant evidence of contemporary writers did not prove them to have been the current staple of medieval science.

When the gloom of the dreadful night was broken by the first gleam of modern science, every torch-bearer was persecuted as an incendiary. Astronomers were forced to recant their heresies on their bended knees. Philosophers were caged like wild beasts. Religious skeptics were burnt at the stake, as enemies of God and the human race. It was, indeed, almost impossible to enunciate any scientific axiom that did not conflict with the dogmas of the revelation-mongers who had for centuries subordinated the evidence of their own senses to the rant of epileptic monks and maniacs. And when the sun of Reason rose visibly above the horizon of the intellectual world, its rays struggled distorted through the dense mist of superstition which continued to brood over the face of the earth, and was only partially dispersed even by the storms of the Protestant revolt.

The light of modern science has brought its blessings only to the habitants of the social highlands; the valley dwellers still grope their way through the gloom of inveterate superstitions and prejudices, and centuries may pass before the world has entirely emerged from the shadow of the life-blighting cloud which the son of Sospitra recognized in the rise of the Galilean delusion.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

Of all the sins of Antinaturalism, the suppression of human reason has brought down the curse of the direst retribution. It is the unpardonable sin against the Holy Spirit. The actual extinction of their local sunshine could hardly have entailed greater misery upon the slaves of the Christian church. The victims of a permanent Egyptian darkness might have taken refuge in the Goshen of their neighbors, in the sunny garden-homes of the Parsees and Spanish Moriscos, but the jealousy of the clerical tyrants closed every gate of escape, and for thirteen centuries the nations of Christian Europe suffered all the horrors of enforced ignorance and superstition. The history of that dismal night is, indeed, the darkest page in the records of the human race, and its horrors bind the duties of every sane survivor to a war of extermination upon the dogmas of the insane fanatic whose priests turned the paradise of southern Europe into a hell of misery and barbarism.

The battle against the demon of darkness became a struggle for existence, in which the powers of Nature at last prevailed, but for millions of our fellow-men the day of deliverance has dawned too late; spring-time and morning returned in vain for many a once fertile land where the soil itself had lost its reproductive power, where the outrages of Antinaturalism had turned gardens into deserts and freemen into callous slaves. The storm that awakened the nations of northern Europe from the dreams of their poison-fever, could not break the spell of a deeper slumber, and the moral desert of the Mediterranean coast-lands remains to warn the nations of the future, as the bleaching bones of a perished caravan remain to warn the traveler from the track of the simoom.

The religion of Mohammed, with its health-laws and encouragements to martial prowess, has produced no ruinous results of physical degeneration, but the entire neglect of mental culture has not failed to avenge itself in the loss of national prestige. For after the northern nations of Christendom had broken the yoke of their spiritual tyrants, the children of Islam remained faithful to the task-masters of their less grievous bondage, but also to its total indifference to secular science, and from that day the crescent of the prophet became a waning moon.

E.—REFORM.

The experience of the Middle Ages has made the separation of church and state the watchword of all true Liberals. But the divorce of church and school is a duty of hardly less urgent importance. While many of our best Freethinkers waste their time in hair-splitting metaphysics, Catholic and Protestant Jesuits coöperate for a purpose which they have shrewdly recognized as the main hope of obscurantism: The perversion of primary education by its re-subjection to the control of the clergy. The definite defeat of those intrigues should be considered the only permanent guarantee against the revival of spiritual feudalism. A perhaps less imminent, but hardly less serious, danger to the cause of Science is the stealthy revival of mysticism. Under all sorts of nomenclatural modifications, the specter-creed of the ancient Gnostics is again rearing its head, and menacing reason by an appeal to the hysterical and sensational proclivities of ignorance.

In the third place, there is no doubt that under the present circumstances of educational limitations the adoption of female suffrage would prove a death-blow to intellectual progress and re-doom mankind to the tutelage of a clerical Inquisition; but rather than perpetuate a twofold system of oppression, we should complete the work of emancipation by admitting our sisters to all available social and educational advantages, as well as to the privilege of the polls. From the suffrage of educated women we have nothing to fear and much to hope.

It has long been a mooted question if the progress of knowledge can be promoted by arbitrary encouragement, such as prize offers and sinecures, but the preponderance of logic seems on the side of those who hold that science should be left to its normal rewards, and that the proper sphere of legislation does not extend beyond the duty of securing the full benefit of those rewards by the removal of absurd disabilities and unfair discriminations in support of worm-eaten dogmas. Reason may be safely left to fight its own battle, if the arms of Un-reason cease to be strengthened by statutes which enable every village ghost-monger to silence the exponents of science by an appeal to medieval heretic-laws.

The Spirit of Infidelity.

The letter killeth, but the spirit maketh alive.
The spirit searcheth all things, even the deep things of Zeus.
The fruits of the spirit are joy and peace, etc.

There are so many good, rational, sensible things in that old book containing the thoughts of men centuries ago, and on which modern superstition relies for its support, that unbelievers in the latter should use them in their own defense and to convince their religious opponents of the absurdities of their faith.

It is because we believe most fully and cordially in the truth of the above quotations that we discard the letter and accept with all confidence the spirit.

We see in tracing the past history of the church, its bloody, merciless persecutions, its no less arrogant pretensions and assumptions everywhere around us to-day, the overwhelming and indisputable evidence that the letter has not only led to killing millions in the past literally, but is killing its millions, mentally and spiritually, of those who are building a faith on and depending on it everywhere now, in all religious organizations. The Infidel is the only true believer in the philosophy of this ancient writer, because he rejects the letter as a fatal enemy to his intellectual and spiritual growth and life, and depends wholly and unreservedly on the spirit.

He believes in testing everything and extracting the sense, spirit, and life out of it, and using them only, for his life, strength, and guide.

The spirit is not only above the letter, but its function is that of the absolute autocrat, to dissect, to reject, or to destroy the letter, if, on examination, it cannot discover something good or useful for its own purposes. The letter in itself is but a mere shell at best, and, if there is no kernel, life, or essence in it, must be cast out as rubbish by the dictates of the spirit.

The spirit is not a fetich, nor is it anything that can be personified as a ghost or incubus of the Spiritualists; it means that force in human nature which can determin right from wrong, and prompts to action, without consulting the letter, the creed, the law or command of others. Everyone who rejects authority and acts from his own sense of right, is moved and guided by the spirit.

The Infidel is such a firm believer in these ancient propositions or maxims that they giv him all the warrant and authority he asks, or that is necessary. He does not hesitate to accept them in their fulness of meaning, and to plunge at once into searchings of all things, even the deep things of Zeus.

Now, the man that will not or dare not do this is infidel to the most important lessons the book teaches whence he professes to derive his religious faith. The letter has already killed him mentally and morally, and he is left spiritually dead. The Infidel is the only true spiritual searcher, and he is strictly in the line of his duty when he dives to the depths, unveils and explodes all those heathen and Christian ideas, of Zeus, which the letter has involved in unmeaning mystery.

It is not blasphemy or irreverent to go into this deep, searching inquisition, but it is the duty of every true believer.

Not to do it is evidence of being governed by the letter that killeth, and not by the spirit which searcheth all things.

If the power of the priesthood and the literal, monstrous theology taught and sustained by it are ever to be broken, the Infidel, who is the true spiritual believer, must do it largely by the weapons, the authority, furnished by believers' own sacred text and its lessons. The power of the church must be met, overcome, and slain by the arrows of truth, reason, and sense, drawn from its own armory. If we spurn and trample upon as an infamous fraud all this ancient, sacred literature, so dear to the sincere orthodox believer, we cannot get his ear; we shock him, and put ourselvs outside of his recognition or sympathy. We excite feelings of hostility toward us and any influence for good that we might otherwise hav exerted.

The church is the fortress and bulwark of orthodoxy and of the letter.

If it ever leaves its stronghold, it must be driven out by the power of the spirit, as manifested in the life and teachings of the Infidel.

The Infidel is entirely at home and within the record when he is searching, without let or bias, into the deep things of Zeus, and is showing how much superstition has done to veil the simple lessons of these ancient writers. They tell us "Zeus is light, and in it there is no darkness at all." If Zeus is Light, then Light is Zeus, and that is liberal enough even for the Atheist. We want nothing better for our own Zeus, if we need one.

This is an impersonal abstraction, and has nothing of those human qualities and attributes which modern orthodoxy has collected together and organized into its self-constituted artificial ideal of a Zeus.

The same ancient writer says also that "Zeus is Love," and "they that dwell in love dwell in Zeus and Zeus in them"—an equally simple definition, and one no Atheist can object to; it being so entirely harmless and impersonal.

This writer was evidently addressing himself to a mythologic people, who probably held as vague and absurd views of Zeus as the multitude are teaching and believing now.

Then he also said "Zeus is spirit" and they that worship Zeus must worship in spirit and in truth. Now, in these lessons we are taught that Zeus is light, love, and truth.

As Infidels, if we hav any feelings of reverence to gratify, we certainly should not hesitate to worship a Zeus represented by "light," "love," and "truth." If we feel under no obligation to avow our homage even to a Zeus of this character, we should be liberal and tolerant to indulge those who wish to so manifest their feelings of reverence, if they see proper to do so. The function and work of the Infidel, who rejects the letter and is ruled or led by the spirit, are, to correct the errors and rectify the abuses into which the letter has plunged orthodoxy. We will gain nothing by annihilating or killing Zeus, and thus making the worshiper our deadly enemy. We must in the spirit search into the deep things of Zeus and unmask it of all that is false and spurious, corruptions of the true idea.

The modern Infidel is quite outside, and cut off from much useful influence, by his ultra-iconoclastic pronunciamentos. The believer assumes the rigidity of the ascetic, from a prejudice formed against him in his reasonings and teachings on matters theological. If he has to hear, he has resolved not to weigh, nor to allow himself to reason on religion. These hav been his priestly instructions, and he obeys them; so his mind is generally forever closed to Infidel views. As Infidels, we attempt too much when we discard all. We should hold on to the truth, avowing our deep reverence for it, and none the less because it has been misunderstood, or mixed with falsehood, by ancient writers and modern believers. The work of the Infidel should be to purify, not destroy, the ancient faith. That is the proper use of the spirit, which alone should guide his labors.

The late revisers of the New Testament hav let out so many secrets and revealed the sources of so much that is fabulous and corrupt, that they hav done us all great service in exposing the fallacy of the letter, and the necessity of depending on the spirit, which searches and tests all things.

When they tell us that the earlier teachers and the copies of their writings were more simple, pure, and rational than the compound of sense and superstition which we are now asked to accept, they hav opened the way for us to enter into the so-called sacred text and subject it all to the criticism of the spirit. They began it, but became alarmed and left the more free and liberal to complete their work. The Infidel is the only one who can do it honestly.

Would it not be better to take sides with them, to recognize the great work they hav done in breaking the enchantment and in pointing out in their orthodox way how much they found wrong, how much they attempted to rectify, and what a vast amount of uncertainty and of equivocal matter they discovered, which they left, because the worshipers of the volume would not tolerate such sweeping and revolutionary changes as it would make in the text, undermining and dissipating their whole system of theology? We should recognize them as our friends, and cooperate with them rather than discard them and their work as hostil to the interests of truth and as impediments to human progress.

I think they did a great work, but, of course, in a timid, patronizing way.

Liberal literature would be read were it based more on the popular thought, the advanced views, of the more scientific theologians, and especially if on the conclusions and concessions of the late revising committees. If we wish to weaken the faith of the bigot in his implicit reliance on the authority of the letter of the scripture, it must be done by reason, and respect for those who hav been misled, and not by ribaldry, caricature, or denunciation. Instructed in these more moderate views and methods of discussing Liberalism, the Infidel could meet and be heard by his Christian associates or neighbors. He would hav access to the church and its devotees, and his Liberalism be made to leaven those from whom he is now denied all intercourse.

If we score and scourge and jibe the believer, we make him our enemy; he will neither hear nor read, but will do his utmost to make us obnoxious to all believers. Men of genius, humor, and eloquence like Ingersoll may take this freedom and be heard, through their charming powers even over enemies; but those not so gifted will fail, and defeat their own purposes by indulging in such liberties.

Liberalism is doubtless losing much of its labor and resources by its ultra, outside attitude and its little respect for the sincere opinions held by ardent and earnest believers. To keep with the people as far as practicable, and to correct their views, is better than to desert and ridicule them. To convert, not condemn; to save, not to abandon, the erring, is the true wisdom and benevolence of the higher type of men. T. E. LONGSHORE.

Our London Letter.

The summer campaign so far, notwithstanding certain drawbacks, may fairly be considered successful. Several well-known Freethinkers hav specially given their attention to outdoor lecturing, and are invariably favored with good audiences. In certain places the orthodox party has mustered its fighting men, whose business it is to break up the meeting and maltreat the lecturer, but these very characteristic proceedings hav generally failed of success. Very rarely will a believer attempt to defeat the arguments used by the speaker, and, after so many polemical defeats, it is not surprising that the champions of the faith are chary of entering the lists. But as it will not do to allow the Freethinker to hav it all his own way and meet with no opposition, the church militant comes to the front; it has not yet, however, developed into the church triumphant; nor is it likely to do so, now its day is well nigh over; though, for all that, it will not surrender without many a hard struggle. The church of Christ appears to partake very much of the nature of the shark; human prey being the favorit food of each, they are both extremely tenacious of life and equally difficult to kill.

Now and again one finds a priest who, while firmly believing what he teaches, yet, strange to say, allows that there may be another side to the question, though it is not very probable that such is the case. There is a certain vicar in the north of London who is giving a course of Sunday lectures in his church on Infidelity and Christian evidence, and one of the most activ members of the National Secular Society has recently interviewed him on the subject, stating his intention of giving a lecture in opposition to his statements, with the result that this vicar has permitted the use of his school-room on each Monday following his own address for that purpose; when, as is the rule, discussion will be invited during the evening, and the parson will get two opportunities to the Freethinkers' one to speak on each subject. Every opportunity thus offered to show the errors and absurdities of the Christian religion as practiced will be of great use, enabling Freethought to bé more fully disseminated abroad, for although Atheism has existed in its present form for many years, it is yet but little understood by the majority. There are, no doubt, some millions of English people who hav never read a Freethought work nor heard a Freethought lecture, and whose only ideas of Atheism are those so carefully stated by interested persons, many of whom know that their calumnies are entirely false, but salve their consciences by the Jesuitical maxim that "the end justifies the means." I never yet met with an individual of any degree of intelligence who condemned Atheists and Atheism who really knew anything about either. Their sole knowledge consisted of the scurrilous falsehoods contained in religious papers or stated from pulpits. Many people of this description believe firmly that an Atheist is ill-favored and dirty in his habits and person, usually a cobbler by trade, or perhaps a blacksmith, extremely ignorant, very ungrammatical, a drunkard, and one who never by any possibility can say half a dozen words without bringing in two or three oaths. The open-air propaganda will disabuse the minds of some of those who consider the above pleasing description as a correct one, and when they see that such is not the case, are induced to listen to what is said, and though they may not be willing to open their minds at once to the truths taught, will, at all events, hav the seeds of doubt sown in their minds, which will grow till they bear fruit of use to themselvs and the world. ## Call for the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are wanted to attend the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held at Chicago, October 15th and 16th.

The Congress will be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs—the President and Secretary and three delegates. All charter members and life members, all Vice Presidents, all Chairmen of state Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats, but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Free thinker in the United States and Canada who can will be present.

Per order Board of Directors:

News and Notes.

From the Dalles a night ride brings me to Palouse Junction, with just two houses and the depot. Colfax is eighty-seven miles from here. For the first fifty miles it is one of the most desert-looking countries through which I hav passed. The volcanic lavas once ran riot, and the rocks are rolled into all imaginable shapes, and barren prospects stretch away. After awhile bands of horses begin to appear and straying cattle. When we strike the Palouse river there are some green meadow lands and habitations. At Endicott, where about a dozen houses are flung together, we take dinner. Here the farmers' teams do congregate and betoken cultivation. Occasionally we discern a wheat-field. Signs of productivness increase. As our railroad train proceeds at the rate of ten miles an hour, we seem to be coming into the purlieus of civilization. Still I wonder where Colfax is, and what kind of a town can be built amid such vast wastes and walls of rock. After eight hours' ride the train creeps down into a big crevice, and by a sudden plunge I find myself in the heart of a busy and elegant city, one of the liveliest on the coast. It seems by magic to encompass you in the hollow of the earth. Colfax has about two thousand inhabitants, and a bright future. It already has two railroads, with the prospect of others. It is in the midst of a vast wheat producing section of country. It has been burnt down twice. In the last fire the loss was two hundred thousand dollars, but the plucky citizens went right ahead, and soon a new city was under way over the blackened ruins.

I found a courageous Liberal phalanx here, and cordial hospitality. I already knew something about the pioneer spirit of the Wolfards, at Silverton, Oregon, and here I found the same bright and generous Liberalism in the home of Mr. and Mrs. D. Wolfard, who liv on a hill, overlooking the city, where one can see the busy tide of life at their very feet. Mrs. Kate P. Wolfard is an occasional contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and is, therefore, known to our ranks. Mr. John B. Wolfard, now over seventy years of age, who livs at Colton, twenty miles off, was unable on account of health to attend the lectures, but he sent a word of greeting, and a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I hope that this example will be followed. The Wolfards are all in the front ranks at Colfax. There is L. D. Wolfard, Vert, and Oliver—the sons, who inherit into good blood the spirit of Freethought. Vert Wolfard engaged the band at his own expense for the lectures, and so we had enlivening music, which of course gave pleasure and impulse to our work. It will be seen that we hav real workers in this remote spot, who are bound to hav things go off in style, and who put fire into their intellectual as into their business life.

I gave four lectures at Colfax, Saturday evening, Sunday afternoon and evening, and Monday evening, and there was good attendance at all, and interest and appreciation. Of course, the churches hold sway, and don't want the Infidel to come in; and they would rather hav the community patronize a traveling show than lectures on science and humanity. Besides the half-dozen churches, there is an imposing Baptist college going up on one of the hill sites overlooking the city, and it looks as if it meant to keep watch and ward over all the place, and threaten with overwhelming destruction the venturesome pilgrim of reform. However, Infidelity has a good deal of the inside track at Colfax, and quietly flourishes.

Besides the Wolfards of happy memory, with age and youth in their advancing columns, there is P. Wilmans, jovial and strong, and ever ready to make the stranger welcome. He is always for the open fight, and his flag is never hauled down. He gave me a pleasant drive about the many-hilled country, and I had a chance to see its quality. It is up-hill and down-hill for miles away. There is no level space anywhere in a day's journey, except occasionally a "flat," or valley, called "Rebel Flat," "Union Flat," etc. The soil is twenty feet deep. It is well watered. There are a multitude of springs, and on the highest elevation a well thirty feet deep strikes water. This is one of the finest wheat countries in the world. The average production is twenty-six bushels to the acre. In Illinois and Wisconsin the average is only ten and twelve bushels per acre. The average this year in the Palouse country is, I understand, about forty bushels per acre. The total product last year was three million bushels, of which one million were shipped from Colfax. Barley and flaxseed are also raised in large quantities. The Palouse is also an excellent cattle and horse country. There are in this section two hundred thousand sheep. The agricultural prospects are, therefore, great; and Colfax is about the business center of it all, and reaps the main harvest. It does a business of two million dollars a year. It pays the railroad in freight charges nearly one thousand dollars a day Only eight per cent of the tillable lands are now cultivated. The fruits mainly are peaches, apples, plums, prunes, and cherries.

Besides my friend Wilmans are J. M. Hubbard, the Ewings, John Erford, Mr. and Mrs. S. S. Benton, Mr. and Mrs. I. W. Davenport, John Adams, Smith and Judson, Wm. Spencer, James Bleeker, Wm. Harper, John Harper, Mr. and Mrs. John Noble, Urban Chase, Jos. Moore, Frank Boyd, Chase and Chapman, T. B. Weller, Wm. Hamilton, mayor of the city; H. W. Livingstone, W. B. Sparrow, G. A. Miller, S. J. Saxon, I. M. Priveit, John Privett, etc.

I look forward to a strong organization in the future. My little friend Charlie Heatherly, only thirteen years of age, spent his pocket-money for a beautiful copy of Mr. Ingersoll's complete works. I thought this a noble sign of what will be. Such a boy will make a bright and go-ahead Infidel who takes to his heart these teachings of our modern Shakspere, so simple and natural that even a child can understand the splendor of his thought.

I hav a good time, good friends, pleasant meetings in Colfax. I hav been repaid for the long journey. I wanted to go up to Waverly and see my friend William Graham and others, but time would not permit. I hope next year to be able to visit this and other points. The field of work broadens every day.

From Colfax I come to Pasco on Tuesday, and lecture on Wednesday and Thursday evenings. Pasco is about two years old, and has only a dozen houses, and sage-brush stretches about it for hundreds of miles. Where was an audience to come from in this little, straggling hamlet? However, I had it, and the school-house was full the two evenings, and I shouldn't wonder if a Freethought hall were built when I come back, for the friends are quite enthusiastic and are of the veteran army. They hav been all over the world, some of them—railroad men, steamboat men, etc.—and they know what reality is by struggle and experience. It is marvelous what an immense amount of life one finds in every Western village. It is like a camping-ground where every nationality meets, and, with only a few houses, there is a cosmopolitan aspect. It is like a rendezvous of travelers.

When I looked forth on the wilderness of sage-brush, I said to myself, "This can't be a farming country; what can grow on this sand?" In the first place, however, this soil is not sand, but a kind of volcanic dust, and, when watered, can produce wonderfully. Frank Schunemann took me out to his farm, where he has been located about five years. It is in the midst of a beautiful green grove. His corn is about twelve feet high. The grass is luxuriant. The watermelons are abundant and finely flavored. The grapes are delicious. It is a good cattle country. They grow fat on sage-brush and bunch-grass. Over across the Columbia river, on the banks of which lies Schunemann's farm, is what is called "Horse heaven," where horses roam in perfect delight and revel in the rich pasture lands. I am glad that horses hav a heaven. They deserve it. So this desolate-looking country is found to be fertil, and has its brilliant prospects for the years to come. The lands are being taken up for cultivation. Purple vinyards may some time make this the Rhine valley of America. The problem to solve is irrigation. These lands are like those of California once considered worthless, but now commanding hundreds of dollars per acre. Water is all that is needed to transform the wilderness to a garden. The climate is pleasant both summer and winter. Pasco is about the smallest place I hav visited, but time did not hang heavy on my hands. Although but two days' notice was given, friends came from ten, twenty, and thirty miles off, and we had good cheer and fellowship. I believe there are only about two hundred inhabitants in the whole county, but most of these are Liberals.

Among our number on this picket-line of civilization are J. W. O'Keefe, formerly of Seward, Neb., one of the leading men of the place; Sheriff W. B. Grey, Capt. W. P. Grey, A. W. Grey, A. P. Grey, W. R. Kahlow, who carries two hundred and forty pounds of good Infidel flesh, which has borne him safely through many a controversy in these frontier lands; W. J. Hesse, Jos. Clark, James Biddol, John Hauser, John Poles, Fred. Kurtzman, J. F. Buchanan, Jas. O'Connell, John McCarty, E. P. Kuhl, George Findley, W. C. Roland, M. F. Hock, Stecker, etc. There is some prospect that Pasco will be a railroad town. It is a junction now, and the end of a division. A round-house is to be built, I understand. I shall look, therefore, for a city when I come back. Of course it may vanish like an Arab encampment. A year or more ago Ainsworth, three miles off, across the river, had a population of two thousand. It is now absolutely deserted. Not a soul is there, and most of its buildings hav been moved—some to Pasco. If the latter can hold on for awhile it may get a fair start, and survive in the struggle of existence. If it does, I think we shall get ahead of the churches, and, next to the school-house, the first public building to be erected will be the Freethought Hall. For its size, Pasco is the banner frontier post of the Liberal army.

From Pasco I ride until three o'clock in the morning, and strike Grant's; I take a couple of hours' sleep and arise at daybreak. Whom do I find here but W. W. Jesse, of New Era, and his daughter Miss Lena, and son Willie, en route for Goldendale, where I am to lecture for the next four days. Mr. Jesse, although in life's prime, is a grandfather; and he is on his way to see his posterity and take in the Liberal campaign at Goldendale, for this is a dreadfully orthodox place.

The churches hold almost complete rule, and try to run things to suit themselvs. However, we hav a few vigorous Infidels, chief among whom is Henry D. Young, who owns a hall, and in that hall the campaign guns will be heard. We hav to climb from Grant's, on the Columbia river, fifteen hundred feet to reach Goldendale. It is a pleasant village twelve miles from the railroad, and is supported mostly by the farming country about it. It is, in appearance, like a quiet New England village. I hav already given two lectures and the attendance has been fair. I lecture to-day, Sunday, afternoon and evening, and to-morrow, Monday, evening. There are only a few Liberals, but they hav plenty of pluck. Henry D. Young has always been in the midst of the warfare. He has a splendid Liberal family, who know how to make music and enjoy life, and I am now at their delightful home penning these "News and Notes," amid the sunshine and melody of genial surroundings.

Next week I shall be at Union Wednesday and Thursday, and then over Sunday, Aug. 28th, at Baker City, and then for a week until Sept. 5th at Prairie City; Sept. 7th I shall be at Weiser City; Sept. 9th to 16th at Emmetts, Idaho; Sept. 18th at Boise City; Sept. 24th, 25th at Salt Lake City for convention of Utah Liberals.

The Annual Congress is called to meet at Chicago October 15th and 16th, Saturday and Sunday. I hope that all Liberals who can will attend the Congress. Chicago is a favorable point, and the time selected is during the exposition, when there will be excursion rates. We want mainly a business Congress to talk up plans for next year's work. Addresses will be delivered by Courtlandt Palmer, president of the Union; Mrs. M. A. Freeman, General Trumbull, and others. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

My Indictment.

While hundreds, and perhaps thousands, are willing to take my testimony, my simple word for it, that the correspondence for which I am indicted was purely carried on by me in a scientific sense, and with no intent of lewdness or obscenity, there are many who are more finical and want to hav a full explanation of this, that, and the other. Among the rest, since the publication of the indictment, queries are propounded by so many as to what possible connection a document so dubious as to be the only one specially named in said indictment could hav to do with a scientific discussion of sexual physiology.

But this very paper and those that grew out of it caused more discussion than any other document in the whole correspondence. In all works on the origin of life and species we find debates and differences of opinion regarding the relativ relationships of various species and genera as to which will unite and form hybrids and which will not.

Of this sort was the paper named in my indictment. It was sensationally written, and taken alone by itself would undoubtedly impress one who was not acquainted with the reason why it was told as being purposely penned as obscenity. Of the real value of such documents no physician or physiologist would hav a moment's doubt. As to the manner of wording and style of description, we were compelled to let narrators be their own judges. Facts were what we wanted, and such facts we could not obtain from books, and hence we resorted to private correspondence, and this correspondence was growing more select and more valuable every day, so that it has been real loss to the world that the law interfered and broke it up, instead of fostering and aiding it as it should hav done.

Now that Professor Parkhurst has shouldered the authorship of "Diana," and told why it was written and why the documentary evidence of the truth of the theories the book advocates was worded as it was, methinks even the most finical of the finical ought to feel assured that there were good wholesome reasons for all that was mailed. ELMINA.

Dr. Titus L. Brown.

The death of Dr. Titus L. Brown, of Binghamton, which occurred on the 17th ult., removes from the leading New York Freethinkers another powerful man. For six years Dr. Brown was president of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, and every attendant upon the state conventions will remember his prompt appearance with a speech in manuscript which never failed to delight the Materialists and disgust the Spiritualists. This peculiarity gave Dr. Brown a host of warm friends, who stood up for him through thick and thin; and while it made him many philosophical enemies, we never knew one that did not forget all hateful feelings when the doctor got him alone and told him funny stories.

Dr. Brown came into the world October 16, 1828. in Hinsdale, this state. He received his education at the Binghamton Academy and the New York city and Philadelphia Medical Colleges, the latter of which confirmed his preferences for homeopathy. The Elmira Telegram says that "as a physician his patrons were decided in their preference for him, he having won this enviable standing among them not only by his ever close and courteous attention, but by his professional success in their behalf. The poor had in him a medical friend." A few weeks before his death he suffered a slight paralytic stroke, and from that time until the last shock he felt that he might die without much warning. This knowledge, however, made no difference in his conduct, and he continued to attend to his business. The last attack of the disease prostrated him completely, and he lay for several days wholly unconscious, and died without knowing that the end was near.

Several years ago Dr. Brown wrote his own funeral sermon, had it printed, and then kept the manuscript on his office desk, with plain directions thereon how and when it should be used. This was not done in any spirit of bravado or crankiness, but the doctor wished, as a plain, straightforward man who knew his own mind, to do away with the superstitious sermons which Christians usually consider appropriate on such occasions. His family, however, disregarded his wishes, and the Episcopalian rector read the stereotyped service of that church over his coffin and his open grave. "I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he liv," and "I know that my redeemer liveth," must hav sounded hollow and mocking even to the Christians among Dr. Brown's friends who knew how firmly he held that there is no resurrection and no life beyond the grave, and that apart from himself and his own efforts there is no redeemer for man, nor redemption necessary. "We therefore commit his body to the ground; earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust; looking for the general resurrection in the last day, and the life of the world to come through our Lord, Jesus Christ," chanted at the grave of Dr. Titus L. Brown, a Freethinker, a Materialist, a man of scientific attainments, was desecration of his memory.

Dr. Brown was a member of the Broome County Medical Association, the New York State Freethinkers' Association, the American Secular Union, the Iron Hall, Order of Red Men, Broome County Homeopathic Medical Society, New York State Homeopathic Medical Society, International Hahnemanian Society, American Institute of Homeopathy, and the American Obstetrical Society. His motto was, "Damn others as you would like to be damned yourself," and conspicuous on his letter heads was the following:

> "Happiness is the only good.
> The time to be happy is now.
> The place to be happy is here.
> The way to be happy is to try to make others so."

Another motto which the doctor had hung in his office, and one he was fond of repeating, reads: "A noble life is never lost, good deeds and virtuous actions do not die. They scatter wide with generous hand the priceless deeds of virtue, purity, and truth, and a golden harvest will be reaped." Dr. Brown became a Materialist at the deathbed of his mother. Of a large family he was the boy most companionable to his mother, and both had been students of Spiritualism. When she died, she called him to her and said: "Titus, I am going to die. Hold my hand in yours, and if I hav continued consciousness I shall press yours." The end came, but no sign from her, and the boy received what he considered strong proof that the theory of immortality is a delusion. This was in later life strengthened by his experiences with believers in the doctrin. The Elmira Telegram, published in his immediate neighborhood, and by men who knew him well, speaks of him with accuracy as "a man of great intellectual ability, a strong if not convincing reasoner. Positiv and radical, he was an extremist in his views. He had no faith. He had no belief, we may say. He did not believe in man, God, or the devil? He was outspoken. Like all men of his class he was a questioner—a doubter. What he couldn't understand he didn't take any stock in. What he believed in must be founded on the cold, hard substratum of fact. Logical results he arrived at. Conclusions must be reached through honest reasoning. If he couldn't understand the whys and wherefores he rejected the matter. He took nothing on faith. He accepted nothing on trust, and so he was a scoffer and a doubter, and railed at religion and derided its promises."

Dr. Brown won great local fame as a physician, and was generally considered to be a level-headed and keen man. He was aggressiv and good-naturedly sharp in controversy, with a strong disposition to believe that whatever Dr. Titus L. Brown said and thought was about as near right as it could be. "Macdonald," he said to us last summer at White Sulphur Springs, "you're a younger man than I am and you'll probably hav to write my obituary. I hav only one thing to say to you about it, Tell the truth. If there is anything good about me, say so. If there isn't, say that, too." "Doctor," we retorted, "if your obituary is printed ahead of ours, the only bad thing that we shall say about you is that you are egotistic." He laughed and answered, "Well, ain't I usually right?"

Only a year has passed since then, and the genial, powerful, self-assertiv doctor is dead. We told his fault to himself; we tell his virtues to the world.

Heretical Personalities.

W. F. JAMIESON, the popular Western lecturer, is a Canadian by birth. He is responsible for the conversion of Moses Hull from Adventism to Spiritualism, but he never could convert Mr. Hull to Materialism. While he was a Spiritualist, Mr. Jamieson converted the Rev. Mr. Butterfield and Elder Robert G. Eccles to that faith. Mr. Jamieson is fifty years old, of fair complexion and stout physique, a ready debater and an earnest orator.

CHARLES ECKHARDT, treasurer of the American Secular Union, is fat, fair, and somewhere around sixty. He made a fortune in bookbinding, and now livs comfortably thereon. He owns one of the biggest sand-banks in New Jersey, and is always ready to sell sand. Europe is as familiar to him as America, and he detests the Catholics. He rivals Frank Pixley, of the 'Frisco Argonaut, in denouncing the "Pope's Irish" and upholding American institutions.

DR. E. B. FOOTE, JR., chairman of the Secular Union Executiv Committee, is a tall, slim, athletic young man, and stands up in front of big Anthony Comstock without a tremor. The doctor can turn a double somersault from a spring-board or jump from Albany to Washington to defeat Tony with equal grace. He is in partnership with Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., and shows a sheepskin from the most orthodox medical college in this city. When he has lived as long, he will probably be as genial, generous, and skilful as his father, for he is crowding him now.

THE nineteenth century was still in boyhood's garb when Horace Seaver came into it, but that veteran Freethinker is in spirit one of the youngest workers we hav. He edits the Investigator, punctuates and corrects the manuscript of his contributors, and reads the proof. He used to be found occasionally setting type, but lately he has taken things more easily, and early every afternoon he can be seen descending from the top floor of Paine Memorial, and getting into a horse-car, bound for his suburban home. In the cars he usually finds a Christian friend, and reports of the impromptu debates then held are among the features of the Investigator.

G. G. GROWER, who prepares Science Lessons for our "Children's Corner," is a young man of slight build, studious habits, and fair complexion. He is the analytical chemist for a large manufacturing firm in Ansonia, Conn., and makes good use of the large salary befitting his responsible position. Before he became acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER—which he did by seeing it quoted in the New York Sun—he held the hazy idea that he was the only Infidel in the world. Mr Grower is the only man who ever got the late Dr. T. L Brown to acknowledge himself mistaken on a scientific point. Like most men of genius, Mr. Grower is modest, and the large amount of work he does for Liberalism is performed quietly and unobtrusivly.

E. A. STEVENS, who replaced the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER as chairman of the Finance Committee of the Secular Union, is tall and fair, and about forty. He is the hardest worker among the Chicago Liberals, and to him is due the most of whatever success the Chicago League has achieved. He can find more virtues in a cake of sapolio, when he gets a purchasing groceryman to talk to, than any housewife can. Mr. Stevens is a Socialist, but keeps his economic opinions on a lower shelf than he does his heresy. With him it is Liberalism first. At the time of the Anarchist scare in his city he stood in some danger from the police, who confounded Anarchy, Socialism, and Infidelity, and thought one synonymous with the other two. He is a widower, with one child, a remarkably bright girl of some fourteen years.

GEORGE MACDONALD, who is liked by everybody except the orators of the Manhattan Liberal Club, is a young fellow of thirty, of muscular development, and is proud of it. He occupies the enviable position of foreman and proof reader in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and in spare moments twists the "Letters from Friends" into shape for the compositors. He is a remarkable humorist, and could get fun out of the Concord School of Philosophy. The Liberal Club audience loves him, though the orators do not, and Mr. Wettstein, patentee of the badge-pin, has a deep affection for him. He is an occasional contributor to Puck, and has also written for the Judge. He is up in New Hampshire now—hence this paragraph; for, if he saw it, he would probably "pi" the type, and would hav to be locked up to afford us opportunity to pay this humble tribute to his merits.

WHEN Canal street was considered up-town and cattle were pastured where the TRUTH SEEKER office now is, C. B Reynolds was playing in the streets of New York, and later was assistant foreman of one of the old volunteer fire companies. He glories in his record at fires, which is a good one. At one time in his life, he was an actor and a theatrical manager. Afterward he became converted to the Seventh Day Advent faith, and was a popular and successful preacher. He never could be induced to wear his hat straight, and the tilt he givs it was a cause of grief to the members of his church. He is short, fat, and jolly, and would travel many miles to serve a friend. Since he began to lecture for Liberalism he has had a variety of experiences, from being stoned, arrested and tried for blasphemy, to having twenty-dollar bills thrust into his hand from some admiring auditor. He owns a farm or two in North Parma, N. Y., and has a family of grown-up children. He goes West on a lecturing trip this month, and is willing to look at the Pacific ocean before he returns if he is wanted out there.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON'S first call for his winter work is at Salida, Colorado. At the suggestion of Mr. Morse Coffin, of Longmont, Mr. Jamieson will organize Liberal unions in Colorado. To this end Liberals of that state should write him at once to Monte Vista, Colorado.

THE engagements of Mrs. H. S. Lake are as follows: The Sundays of September at Philadelphia, Pa.; of October, Norwich, Conn.; of November and December, Boston; first, second, and fifth Sundays of January, at Salem, Mass; the third and fourth Sundays of January at Lynn, Mass. Societies desiring her services will address accordingly.

J. E. REMSBURG is now lecturing in Iowa. The following is a list of his appointments as far as arranged:

CARDINAL GIBBONS has been invited to offer the closing prayer and pronounce the benediction on the celebration of the centennial of the completion of the United States Constitution. In accepting the invitation, Cardinal Gibbons writes:

"The Constitution of the United States is worthy of being written in letters of gold. It is a charter by which the liberties of sixty millions of people are secured, and by which, under providence, the temporal happiness of countless millions yet unborn will be perpetuated."

It is a great pity that the professions and practices of ecclesiastics do not square. Cardinal Gibbons says this with well-simulated sincerity, though the policy and legislation of his church are subversiv of almost every provision of that venerable document.

THE sum of fifteen hundred dollars has just been gathered in by the priests to build a Catholic church at Nantasket Beach. The begging instrument was an entertainment held in a skating rink at the Beach. The Boston Herald reports the proceedings: "The first number on the program was a black face comedy sketch by Messrs. Gardner and Hamlin, who delighted those present by their funny sayings. They were followed by John Wilkes in his funny recitations, Mr. John Manning in his flying trapeze act, W. J. Sully and Nelly Germon in a comedy sketch, Thomas Lemack in songs, parodies, and funny sayings, Willis Arnold, vocalist and dancer, and John Manning in his laughable creation, 'Silly Billy.' Then came the athletic entertainment, which commenced with a four-round London prize ring set-to, between George La Blanche and Patsey Kerrigan, and ended with a three-round Marquis of Queensberry rules set-to between champion John L. Sullivan and Steve Taylor, of New York. The bouts between La Blanche and Kerrigan created a vast amount of mirth, particularly among the ladies, who composed more than half of the number of spectators. Mr. Pat Sheedy, who was introduced as master of ceremonies by Mr. Robert Bishop, announced that the contest was for the hand of a society young lady of whom both men were enamored. He also stated that their fighting efforts would be proportioned to the esteem they had for the young lady. Everything but biting was allowed, and at the end of the contest it was decided a draw. There was vociferous applause, which was well merited. When champion Sullivan appeared for his bout with Steve Taylor he was cheered and applauded for several minutes, and afterwards introduced by Mr. John Boyle O'Reilly. A scientific exhibition of the manly art was given for three rounds, and the exhibition closed with more applause for the champions."

Our Right to Buy and Sell Where We Please.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has published a very plausible article by Mr. Van Buren Denslow, in support of the restrictions now imposed on this sacred right by the tariff. We, lovers of liberty, are particularly bound to study the question, now rapidly becoming foremost in politics, what business our government has to say that we shall not buy our blankets, flannels, window-glass, salt, sugar, books, tools, and thousands of other useful articles as cheaply as we can. Why should not the free American be able, like the Englishman, to purchase foreign-made goods, when they are cheaper and better than domestic products, without being taxed for it? This question will soon meet us at the polls. All who write about it agree that it is vitally important.

Mr. Denslow argues in the first place that our tariff keeps up wages. He estimates that labor is worth $1 50 a day here, to $1.10 in England, $0 90 in Belgium, $0.80 in France, $0 60 in Germany, etc., down to $0.05 in India. This difference he ascribes to the tariff; but, by his own showing, the laborer is much better off under free trade in England than under the high tariffs of Belgium, France, and Germany. If protection has any influence over wages in the last country, it is to keep them down nearly to one-half what they are where the manufacturer is not protected. Skilled labor is much more poorly paid in Germany than in England; and this is partly due to the weight of taxes—by which the court, the army, and the church are kept up at the expense of the industrial population—and partly to the poor quality of the labor itself. The real reason that the Hindoo gets so little pay in comparison to the Englishman or American, is that his labor is worth so little. Our manufacturers would not employ him, even if they could get him gratis and hav a bounty besides. Mr. Brassey, who built railroads all over the world, says that shoveling dirt cost him as much in India as in England, and that a guinea could buy about as much work in one country as in another. His work in France was done most cheaply by English navvies, brought over at unusually high rates. The prosperity of the American laborer is due mainly to his superior efficiency, his opportunities of getting land to cultivate, and his freedom from such burdens as an expensiv and useless court, a state church, a hereditary nobility, a large army and navy, etc. These advantages are so plain that it is scarcely necessary to consider so improbable a supposition as that the same system of high tariffs which is starving out the laborer in Germany should be enriching him in America.

A more practical question is whether skilled labor really is paid much better here than in Great Britain. The only difference claimed by Mr. Denslow is as 15 to 11; and this would be more than offset by higher prices of clothes, rent, groceries, etc. A few years ago, when the tariff was almost as high as at present, a committee of English artisans came over to see whether wages really were high enough in this country to justify any general emigration of highly trained laborers. They told a friend of mine that they were better off at home. What emigration we get from Great Britain is mostly of a class which we do not pretend to protect. If any laborers are peculiarly benefited by our tariff, it is those in steel and iron; and yet the census tables show that they only earned on the average ten per cent more in 1880 when the tariff on this industry was from 50 to 200 per cent, than in 1860, when it was 12 to 24; and meanwhile rent and board had risen about forty per cent, the average of prices being "fully one-third above the one of the low-tariff period previous to the war." Here I quote from a pamphlet by J. Schoenhof, on "The Destructiv Influence of the Tariff upon Manufactures and Commerce" (G. P. Putnam's Sons). My main reliance, however, is on the well-known fact of the prosperity of the Northern laborer during those years of low tariff before the war. There certainly were not so many tramps then as now; and I think there were not so many strikes either.

Of Mr. Denslow's other arguments, the principal one is that our country had better do as much manufacturing as possible, especially of her own products. This is what all the protectionists insist upon; and they are perfectly right in it. The only trouble is that they charge their opponents with being less friendly than they to manufactures. The fact is that the so-called free traders are just as desirous as the protectionists to hav our manufactures flourish. The only question is what rate of duties will answer the purpose best. No one expects any general increase of the existing duties; but it must be confessed that our industrial condition is by no means perfect. Our ship-building, for instance, which had flourished ever since it sprang into existence, despite British jealousy during the colonial period, has sunk into insignificance under the high tariff. Our steel and iron industry, so prosperous before the Revolutionary war as to call out hostil legislation from the British Parliament, is so weak that our total export of metals was only $14 116,000 worth in 1880, when we imported $72,744 000, and England exported $237,500,000. Of woolens, worsteds, and mixed textils, we exported $216 576 to $35 000,000 imported by ourselvs, and $100 000,000 exported by England. For cotton goods, our exports were $10 000 000; our imports, $30 000 000; and the English exports, $375,000,000. We grow cotton, and England does not; but she is able to export about forty times as much cotton goods as we can, and we hav to import three times as much we export. Our neighbors buy our cotton, and we buy their goods. England has become, with free trade, the great maker of cotton, woolen, and iron goods for all mankind.

We hav better workmen and machinery; and we hav a protectiv tariff. Let us see how we stand in our trade with our natural customers to the southward. In 1880 we bought of our sister republics in South and Central America to the amount of $176,000,000, while they took only $58,000,000 of our products, and only one third of this from our manufacturers. Of cotton goods, Mexico bought three times as much from England as from us, and the other states in Central and South America took sixteen times as much. As for Canada, we all know how much the excess of our tariff above hers does to prevent our having more friendly relations and brisk trade. Is this protecting our manufacturers, to oblige them to confine themselvs to the home market, and find some difficulty even in filling that? The true friend of the American manufacturers is he who tries to throw open to them all the markets of the world. The main reason that it is so hard for them to get customers abroad is that we are the only great manufacturing nation that taxes raw material. Hemp, flax, wool, iron ore, copper ore, coal, glass, clay, dye-stuffs, chemicals, and vegetable gums are all admitted free of duty, not only into Great Britain and Ireland, but even into protectionist Canada, Germany, France, and Belgium, the only exception being that coal is taxed in Canada, though not so heavily as in the United States. Even the British fair trader, as he calls himself, who is striving vainly to put protectiv duties on manufacturers, admits that raw materials ought still to be admitted free. It is our duties on raw materials which prevent our exporting the surplus products of our factories, even when the home market is glutted. Other parts of the tariff work in the same direction, but less plainly and disastrously. It is especially these duties which hav made ship-building almost a lost art, except for fast yachts. Do our manufacturers wish to hav the prices of their coal, wool, iron, etc., run up against them? Of course not. Why are these duties kept up? In order to rope in votes for high tariff on manufactured goods. The tax on raw wool, for instance, is a bounty to the grower at the expense of the manufacterer, as well as of the consumer, and is plainly a bid for support of the protectionists, as is the purchase of $2,000 000 worth of silver a month in order to coin dollars for which there is no demand as a circulating medium. The miners get more out of this bargain than the farmers, who owned, on the average, in 1880, nine sheep each. These sheep gave about fifty-five pounds of raw wool, protected by a duty of ten cents per pound. Thus the former gained, on the average, $5 50 by the tariff, while he lost by the increased price of clothing alone more than four times as much. What is worse still is that both foreign and domestic wools are needed for making the same cloth. Hence the tariff, by raising the price of foreign wool, prevents the manufacturer from buying domestic wool, and lowers its price accordingly. Thus the duty of wool really works against the grower as well as the manufacturer, though neither suffers as much as the buyer does.

The bad effect of these duties is so plain that a prominent member of the party which has made it its special work to keep up the tariff, Senator Dawes of Massachusetts, recently admitted the necessity of such a reduction as would giv "free raw material." "No industrial policy," he says, "will promote the highest prosperity of both labor and capital in this country which fails to lay down the raw material at the door of the manufactory at the lowest possible cost." He also admitted the wisdom of such other changes in the tariff as would reduce the annual revenue from it at least $75,000,000.

Among the measures by which he proposed to get rid of the present surplus, was repealing the duty on sugar, which now retails for twice as much in New York as in London. Most of the Republicans I meet talk like Mr. Dawes, especially as regards raw materials.

One of the most important elements of the problem, however, is the fact that whenever the Republicans act or speak as a party, it is in favor of high tariff.

Various plans of horizontal reduction and free raw materials hav been supported in Congress by about four-fifths of the Democrats, and defeated by an almost unanimous vote from the other side of the house. The recent Republican conventions, in the leading states of Ohio and Pennsylvania, do not favor any sort of reduction, even in the interest of manufacturers, but insist on a high enough tariff "to secure to American citizens the privilege of supplying every article which can be produced as well in the United States as in other countries, and sufficiently to supply American wants." (See Ohio platform.)

This looks like giving up all hope of foreign markets. The words, "produced as well," do not, of course, mean produced as cheaply. There is no need of a tariff to secure that. The object of our present tariff is to giv the American manufacturer the monopoly of the home market for goods which he will not furnish as cheaply as similar articles could be procured from abroad. And the claim of the Ohio platform is not merely that some articles should be protected thus, for instance, to build up especially important enterprises, but that "every article" should be, until the home market is supplied fully. Taken literally, this would require putting heavy enough duties upon monkeys, parrots, logwood, mahogany, cochineal, coffee, camphor, palm leaves, and other tropical products to enable our country to raise all she needs of them in hot-houses. What munificent protection, not only to gardeners, but to mechanics, glass-blowers, and iron-makers! I do not say that any such plans hav been proposed seriously. What I do charge against the protectionists is that they are, in the first place, openly proposing to offset the surplus revenue from their tariff by taking off the taxes on tobacco and whisky; and, in the second place, aiding and abetting all sorts of schemes for using up this surplus revenue in wholesale pension bills and similar extravagances. Thus, what a protectiv tariff really means is cheap whisky and tobacco, dear food and clothes, factories which make millionaires, mill-hands on the tramp, foreign markets shut up against our goods, and our national treasury kept wide open, in literal conformity to the text, "Giv to him that asketh." ## The Age of Man on the Earth.

I hav carefully examined Professor Moss's able effort on the length of the human period in reply to my paper on this subject, and I suppose it remains for me to present a closing argument on the points under discussion. I should hav presented my paper before this, but circumstances were such that I could not.

The professor, in his first paper, included three questions under this head, and in my first I took the affirmativ of each, and in this I will place them in the following form:

1. All men are of one species with many varieties.
2. That so far as science teaches they originally sprang from one single pair.
3. "The age of man on the earth," or the length of the human period, as given by Moses, is reconcilable with science.

The first the professor hesitatingly admits; not being able to disprove this important position, he feebly attempts the second. In his first paper he said: "It is too late in the day to attempt to prove that climatic conditions or congenital accidents will account for all the varieties of men having descended from one pair;" and in his reply the only evidence brought forward in support of this broad assertion is simply the supposition that man is "the off-shoot of the ape;" that one branch of men went off in one direction and another in another, and from these through his imaginary process of evolution the many varieties of men descended.

In support of this mere supposition he produces the speculations of Haeckel, who says: "In that long chain, of many generations, that formed the transition from the men-apes to the ape-men, and from these last to actual articulate-speaking man, no single pair can be designated as the first pair of human beings" (Ped. of Man, p. 80).

The origin and descent of man is not in this discussion, but as the professor's argument is principally made up of suppositions and speculations, or, as he says, "ingenious sophistry," I will allow him the privilege of bringing in the same, by way of evidence or illustration, especially as one set of suppositions and speculations is very admirable and particularly suitable to prove or illustrate another.

Now, it is well known that Huxley is an authority of perhaps greater distinction than Haeckel. He plainly says: "I am one of those who believe that, at present, there is no evidence whatever for saying that mankind sprang originally from any more than a single pair" (Huxley's Origin of Species, p. 113).

We will call the evidence of these two eminent scientists a set-off, and then we hav an abundance of scientific evidence deciding in favor of the unity of the species and the derivation of the whole human race from a single pair.

This is the evidence afforded by physiology and zoölogy. The researches and arguments of Blumenbach, Haller, Cuvier, and many other eminent scientists, above all of Dr. Prichard (Physical History of Mankind, vol. i, pp. 114–376), hav established this point beyond all reasonable doubt. Even the author of the "Vestiges of Creation" admits "the result, on the whole, of the inquiries into what are called the physical history of man to be that conditions such as climate and food, domestication, and perhaps an inward tendency to progress under tolerably favorable circumstances, are sufficient to account for all the outward peculiarities of form and color" (Vestiges, p. 262, tenth ed.).

Comparativ philology, after divers fluctuations, has settled itself into the belief that the various languages hav been all derived from a common basis. This view is supported by Professor Max Müller. (See Bunsen's Philosophy of Universal History, vol. i., p. 474, and compare pp. 478, 479.)

Ethnology pronounces that, independently of the scriptural record, we should be led to fix on the plains of Shinar as a common center or focus, from which the various lines of migration and the several types of races originated (Rawlinson, in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society. vol. xv., part 2, p. 232; also, Herodotus, vol. i., p. 586).

The "Toldoth Beni Noah" has extorted the admiration of philologists and ethnologists, who continually find in it anticipations of their greatest discoveries. For instance, in the very second verse, the great discovery of Schlegel, which the word "Indo-European" embodies—the affinity of the principal nations of Europe with the Arian or Indo-Persic stock—is sufficiently indicated by the conjunction of the Madai or Medes (whose nativ name was Mada) with Gomer or the Cymry, and Javan or the Ionians. Again, one of the most recent and unexpected results of modern linguistic inquiry is the proof which it has furnished of an ethnic connection between the Ethiopians or Cushites, who adjoined on Egypt, and the primitiv inhabitants of Babylonia—a connection which was positivly denied by an eminent ethnologist only a few years ago, but which has now been established from the cuneiform monuments.

The affinity of the Sanskrit with the Persian, Greek, Latin, and German languages was first remarked by Sir W. Jones; but it remained for F. Schlegel, in Germany, and Dr. Prichard, in England, to make a scientific use of the material this provided for them. Schlegel's essay on the "Language and Philosophy of the Hindoos" and Dr. Prichard's inaugural "Dissertation on the Varieties of the Human Race," were published almost simultaneously; but Schlegel's work is regarded as the more advanced production. (See Bunsen's Philosophy of Universal History, vol. ii., p. 50; also, Rawlinson's Herodotus, vol. i., p. 442; Essay 11 of same volume, p. 655; and an elaborate article in the Journal of the Asiatic Society, vol. xv., part 2, pp. 215–259.)

Therefore, science establishes the great fact that all the varieties of men originally sprang from a single pair. The professor feels the force of this staggering fact; and well knows that he is confronted with difficulties of an insuperable character; that he cannot remove nor surmount them unless he set aside the testimony of science; consequently he attempts to parry the crushing blow by quoting the speculations of Haeckel with these questions: "If Adam was the first man, what sort of a man was he? Was he a Jew? Then I am not his descendant. Was he Chinese? Then I am not his descendant Was he Hindoo? Then I am not his descendant. Of what color and type was Adam?"

Now, these questions are unworthy of notice except for a little pleasantry. We are not discussing the color and type of the first man and woman, and as science teaches that all the different varieties of men originally sprang from a single pair, and as that single pair was not an "offshoot of the ape," then the professor, if we admit his own language, is the only person in existence that can boast of the ancestral ape; but I demur to this, for I am certain that he is mistaken as to the true teachings of science, and I affirm without fear of successful contradiction that he is not an improved ape, as he would hav us believe, but an intelligent, high-minded member of some variety of the human species.

Now, the impartial reader of the first and second chapters of Genesis will find these facts taught. that the different varieties of men are of one species, and their derivation from a single pair; then, when we candidly and seriously consider this matter, the question naturally arises, and I will again repeat it, How came Moses, in an age of ignorance, long before science was known, to state these facts, which scientists after ages of unceasing toil hav only been able to reveal in the present century? We are forced to admit that he was gifted with faculties far surpassing all human experience, or else his knowledge was divine.

Here the professor is again confronted with insurmountable difficulties, and his attempts to extricate himself only betray the great weakness of his cause, and consequently his inability to defend it.

This, from the first chapter of Genesis, "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he them; male and female created he them," he says, means that "God did not create one single pair, but numerous men and women;" then in the next place he admits that in the second chapter we are told that God created one man and one woman, but denies that Moses wrote these chapters, and asserts that they manifestly contradict each other, that is, they giv different creations.

Now, this is only an attempt to dodge the question, for an answer would be fatal to his side of the discussion. Suppose we substitute "the writer of Genesis" for the word "Moses," and the professor is in the same dilemma as before, but I will not do so, for I maintain that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch, and am surprised that a man of such intelligence would meet an argument with such frivolous quibbling.

As to that "manifest contradiction," the "two histories of creation," etc, which the professor says is given in these first two chapters, it is quite refreshing in this enlightened age to find a man of his ability giving us such interpretations, for upon a careful consideration of these chapters, we find that in the first the sacred historian has given us the general outlines of the work of creation; the second is an appendix to this brief history, explaining some particulars more fully which would otherwise hav interrupted the order of his brief narration, and more particularly enlarging upon that part which relates immediately to man, and giving a more particular account of man's creation as the summary of the whole work; and the assertion that "they were written by different persons at different times" is without foundation, for there is sufficient evidence to warrant the belief that Moses wrote them; but as we are not discussing this question I will pass it with the express understanding that I am willing to discuss it in the future, and also the story of the flood, the origin and descent of man, the hypothesis of evolution, etc., if he thinks his side of these questions rests on foundations of sufficient scientific support to bear investigation.

Next, the assertion that all I said about the time it has taken to produce the many varieties of dogs, of horses, of pigeons, was quite beside the question, was made without the least consideration, for I only made this argument in my first paper by way of illustration, to show that of domestic horses there is one species, of domestic cattle there is one species, of domestic hogs there is one species, of dogs there is one species, of pigeons there is one species; now, of each of these five species of animals there are many distinct varieties of as extreme divergence of types and characteristics as are found to exist in the varieties of man, and if, from each of these five species, there hav been produced many varieties so diverse in perhaps, at most, not over one-half the given length of the human period, then we may reasonably conclude that climate, station, food, and other conditions of existence would develop the different varieties of men within the period given in the Bible. This argument was admissible, but it was so forcible, and carried with it such great preponderance of scientific evidence, that he could not refute it, therefore he attempted to evade it by saying it was quite beside the question.

Another ludicrous attempt to dodge this argument was stating that Haeckel has traced the dog back to the jackal and the wolf, as clearly as Huxley has the horse to the bear; this I deny, as not being supported by science, but as it is clearly beside the question and only made to draw the reader's attention from the point in controversy, I will pass it.

Not being able to weaken, in the slightest degree, my arguments upon the first and second propositions, or withstand the great preponderance of scientific evidence in their favor, he makes a vigorous attack upon the third, which is the real question under discussion, but as he is so prone to digress, I hav taken so much time and space in meandering after him that I will conclude my article on this third proposition in another issue.

J. W. GRABILL.

De Nihilo, Ex Nihil Fit.

"I hate Diderot; he is an idealist, a declaimer, and a revolutionist, believing in his heart in deitv, and more hated than Voltaire. The latter ridiculed Needham, and was wrong, for Needham's eels prove that God is unnecessary. A drop of vinegar in a spoonful of flour supplied the fiat lux; suppose the drop larger, and the spoonful bigger, and you hav the world. Man is the eel; then what is the use of the eternal father? The Jehovah hypothesis wearies me; it is only fitted to produce thin people who think hollow. Down with the Great All which annoys me! Long liv Zero, which leaves me at peace. Between ourselvs, and in order to confess to my pastor, as is right and proper, I confess to you I possess common sense.

"I am not wild about your savior, who continually preaches abnegation and sacrifice. It is advice offered by a miser to beggars. Abnegation! Why? Sacrifice for what object? I do not see that one wolf sacrifices itself to cause the happiness of another wolf. Let us therefore remain in nature. We are not the summit, so let us hav the supreme philosophy. What is the use of being at the top, if you can not see farther than the end of other people's noses?

"Let us liv gaily; for life is all in all. As for man having a future elsewhere, up there, down there, somewhere, I don't believe a word of it. Oh, yes! recommend sacrifices and abnegation to me. I must take care of all I do. I must rack my brains about good and evil, justice and injustice, fas et nefas.

"Why so? Because I shall hav to giv an account for my actions. When? After my death. What a fine dream! after death! He will be a clever fellow who catches me. Just think of a lump of ashes seized by a shadowy hand! Let us speak the truth, we hav been initiated, and hav raised the skirt of Isis; there is no good, there is no evil, but there is vegetation. Let us seek reality and go to the bottom—hang it all, we must scent the truth—dig into the ground for it and seize it. Then it offers exquisit delights; then you become strong and laugh. Human immortality is a thing which anybody who likes may listen to. Oh, what a charming prospect! What a fine billet Adam has! You are a soul, you will be an angel and hav blue wings on your shoulder-blades. Come help me! Is it not Tertullian. who says that the blessed shall go from one planet to the other? Very good; they will be the grasshoppers of the planets, and then they will see God, ta! ta! ta! These paradises are all nonsense, and God is a monstrous fable. I would not say so in the newspapers, of course, but I whisper it between friends, inter pocula. Sacrificing the earth for paradise is giving up the substance for the shadow.

"I am not such an ass as to be the dupe of the infinit. I am nothing! my name is Senator Nothing! Did I exist before my birth? No. Shall I exist after my death? No. What am I? A little dust aggregated by an organism. What hav I to do on this earth? I hav the choice between suffering and enjoyment. To what will suffering lead me? To nothingness; but I shall hav suffered. To what will enjoyment lead me? To nothingness; but I shall hav enjoyed. My choice is made. A man must either eat or be eaten, and so I eat, for it is better to be the tooth than the grass.

"That is my wisdom, after which go on as I impel you. The grave-digger is there, the Pantheon for such as us, and all fall into the large hole. Finis and total liquidation, that is the vanishing point. Death is dead, take my word for it; and I laugh at anyone present affirming the contrary. No, our morrow is night; behind the tomb there is nothing but equal nothings. The poor are offered immortality, paradise, the stars, to swallow. They chew that and put it on their dry bread. The man who has nothing has God, and that is something at any rate. I do not oppose it. for God is good for the poor" (Victor Hugo, in Les Miserables).

When I look around me and see a world full of suffering, disease, decay, and death, and ignorance piled mountain high—all the wealth possessed by the narrowest and soulless ignorant parasites; the few who possess brains; the churches full of hypocrits, and the penitentiaries full of preachers; the poor-houses and lunatic asylums where public thieves steal from the stomachs of paupers, and prison officials who steal from the stomachs of convicts; a world full of graveyards that hide away the dead; a world that is almost a vast idiot asylum; a world full of liars; the forgers and interpolators of histories—instance, Eusebius's forgery of the passage about Jesus in Josephus, which contains the whole Athanasian Creed, which did not exist till 325 A.D.; the awful poverty of the human soul; the malice of the human heart; the two thousand five hundred preachers in the different penitentiaries, and the thousands who ought to be there; the brainy men who are poor, and the haughty, ignorant rich men and women; the betrayals of husbands by wives, and the onanism and infidelities of husbands to the wives; the vast number of infant murders; the vast number of foundling hospitals, where the daughters of the wealthy are rearing their offspring; the pulpits and the pews full of hypocrits; the daily and weekly newspapers which attack and slander, lie, and cover with venom and filth the helpless and the poor in one column, and kiss the toe and fawn and slobber upon the wealthy in another column, I involuntarily exclaim, God Almighty must hav been hard up for material when he created this earth!

Oh, yes, it became necessary in order that man might liv again for God to kill him.

"All is vanity, and a striving after wind." The earth traveling through infinit space eighteen miles a second, is going to nothingness. The end will be wound up in nothingness. It began in oblivion, it will end in como. From nothing, nothing will come, and all will end in the gloom and darkness of night.

An Inquiry.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Rev. W. F. Black, a pedantic Campbellite preacher, who commended himself to the Christian people of this city by claiming some relationship with the late Judge Jeremiah Black, and as having preached in the city where Colonel Ingersoll was raised, tells his congregations that he once converted and baptized twenty-seven out of twenty-eight members of a Liberal League in Mechanicsburg, Ill.

Now, there are a few of us who do not believe his statement, and if you hav any subscribers at Mechanicsburg, I hope they will favor us with some informa ion in regard to it, either through THE TRUTH SEEKER. or to the undersigned. J. D. SHAW.

Deceiving the People.

A prominent religious journal of this city which advertises itself as the best literary religious paper published, and asserts that it pays strict regard to accuracy of statement, publishes this shamefully deceiving paragragh:

"The New Testament consists of twenty-seven distinct and separate documents—fourteen of them originally written by Paul, one by Matthew, one by Mark, two by Luke, five by John, two by Peter, one by James, and one by Jude. These documents are divided into four gospels, the book of Acts, the epistles of Paul, those of James, Peter, and Jude, and the book of Revelation. They came into existence after the death of Christ and before the close of the first century. Taken as an aggregate, they were written at different times, in different places, and by eight different persons, and either to churches previously planted or to individuals. Some of them bear the names of their human authorship, and others do not. Thev were received and recognized as authentic and authoritativ in the apostolic age, and hav ever since been so received and recognized by the Christian church. The church rests upon these documents as its foundation and guide, accepting and believing them as the word of God and the supreme rule of faith and practice in matters of religion. The one conspicuous feature that is common to them all, and distinctly marks them all, we hav in the fact that they all relate to Jesus of Nazareth, as the messiah or Christ predicted in the Old Testament who was to come into our world and who in the person of this Jesus did come. They are all Christological. Whoever may be the writer, Jesus of Nazareth is the theme. His earthly history is given in the four gospels. The early planting of the church in his name is given in the book of Acts The doctrin of this Jesus, including the nature of his person, the object of his mission among men, and what he did in human behalf, is considered and explained in the apostolical epistles. In all these epistles, by whomsoever written, there is a complete concurrence of view as to the person and work of Christ. Paul is undoubtedly the great expounder of his work; yet Paul and Peter do not differ in their views of Christ, or his relation to human salvation. We hav the same Christ and the same doctrin in both, and in all the writings and preaching of the apostles. This unity among them is not explained by any concerted plan to teach and say the same things, but by the fact that they were all alike taught to speak and write by the Holy Ghost. This Jesus promised in the days of his flesh, and the promis was fulfilled."

There is hardly one statement here—certainly no one of importance—that is not false—absolutely and otally false, and known to be so by every Protestant scholar of any repute. The errors consist in: 1. The ascribed authorship; 2. The date of writing; 3. The reception of the manuscripts in apostolic times; 4. Their recognition and reception by the Christian church; 5. Their harmony and concurrence of view of Christ; 6. In the unity of doctrin taught by Peter and Paul and by Christ himself, as recorded in the apostolical epistles and the gospels.

1. To begin with the Pauline documents. It is now admitted by all competent scholars that a portion of Paul's epistles are fraudulent. Dr. Davidson, a Protestant of great learning and high repute, givs up Paul's epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, and declares also that the epistle to Titus, and the first and second epistles to Timothy, were not written by Paul. Drs. Oort, Hooykaas, and Kuenen say that these two letters to Timothy and the one to Titus "were certainly composed long after the death of Paul." And to the fraudulent Pauline epistles they add at once, and certainly, "that to the Hebrews, which does not bear his name at all, and, therefore, does not even profess to hav come from his hand." These distinguished theologians agree with Dr. Davidson in doubting the genuinness of the letters to the Ephesians and Colossians, and cast the same suspicion "perhaps on the first, but certainly on the second of the epistles to the Thessalonians." Further, Professor Davidson inclines to agree with Professors Evanson and Bauer, who question the genuinness of Romans; and Professor Bauer doubts also that Paul wrote 1 and 2 Corinthians and Galatians. Dr. Westcott is one with the three German professors in excluding the epistle to the Hebrews, and Kitto's Cyclopedia says that while it appears as part of the canonical scriptures, and as the work of Paul, "for neither of these assumptions is the evidence allowed on all hands to be conclusiv." In Marcion's compilation of the gospels, A.D. 145, he left out the two epistles to Timothy, the one to Titus, and the one to the Hebrews. Giving all this evidence its due weight, therefore, it may be considered certain that only ten of Paul's epistles are genuin, with a doubt of six others, one of which (2 Thessalonians) these eminent Protestant biblical scholars pronounce undoubtedly spurious. Some German critics hold that only four of Paul's "documents" can be safely accepted as genuin. At the most, however, he can only be given credit for ten; and Paul, bear in mind, is the best—in fact, almost the only—authenticated writer of scriptures.

As to Matthew, the probability is that the gospel according to Matthew was the gospel according to the Hebrews with Matthew's name forged to it. Papias (A.D. 150) spoke of the Hebrew gospels, and Epiphanius and Jerome (A.D. 403 and 420) say it was the same. Dr. Davidson pronounces with certainty and emphasis against Matthew's authorship of it. Drs. Oort, Hooykaas, and Kuenen say that Matthew did not write the book of Matthew, and that it is of more recent date than their headings would lead us to suppose. That Matthew wrote the historical part of the book is also denied by nearly all the German critics, who will only allow that he may hav written down some of the sayings of Jesus, which were afterward made the basis for a historical narrativ by a Greek translator. Schleiermacher, Schneckenberger, Lachmann, and others are cited in Kitto as holding this opinion. The critics all agree that Matthew never wrote the gospel that we hav bearing his name.

Neither do we know the author of the gospel of Mark. In his "Introduction to the New Testament," Professor Davidson announces this as an indisputable fact. He is supported in this opinion by the authors of "The Bible for Learners," Drs. Oort, Hooykaas, Kuenen; by Credner, Westcott, Strauss, and others. In Eusebius's "Ecclesiastical History" "there is a paragraph which says that Papias says that John the Presbyter says that Mark was the secretary of Peter. According to this, Peter told Mark what Jesus said, and Mark wrote it down, making his gospel. The only testimony to the authenticity of Mark we hav, therefore, is that Eusebius said that Papias said that John the Presbyter said that Mark wrote down what Peter said that Jesus said. And Kitto's Cyclopedia, which is, perhaps, the ablest special pleader for the New Testament the Christians hav, acknowledges, on the strength of the passage in Eusebius, that Mark did his work disjointedly and incompletely. That is all the authority we hav for Mark, and the enlightened common sense of the world, since it became acquainted with Eusebius and his brethren of the church, has decided it to be insufficient.

And poor Dr. Luke is a myth also. He wrote neither the gospel which bears his name, nor the Acts of the Apostles, which is ascribed to him. The same mass of critical testimony against Matthew and Mark is a unit against Luke. And we may as well include the gospel of John in this, for of the Johannine authorship of that gospel Davidson says: It "has receded before the tide of modern criticism; and though this tide is arbitrary at times, it is here irresistible. No certain trace of the existence of the fourth gospel can be found till after Justin Martyr, i. e., till after the middle of the second century." At that time the Apostle John had been gathered to his fathers, and the dust of decades had obliterated his grave. The gospel of Luke, of John, and the Acts of the apostles were written by men who never saw Jesus nor his apostles, nor the preacher Paul. Kuenen and his co-laborers consider the Acts to hav been written by some one who revered the memory of Paul, but did not understand his doctrins, a "heathen-Christian" who tried to conceal the disputes, differences of opinion, and squabbles that existed in the early church. He maimed and falsified history, say they. The ascription to John of the book of Revelation rests upon loose foundations, or upon none at all, says Kuenen. There is no more reason to believe he wrote the gospel of John, the three letters credited to him, and the Apocalypse, than there is to believe the story that he lay down while alive in his grave, where the ground still gently heaves in response to his breathing, and where he still "awaits the coming of his Lord." The epistles of James and Jude, supposed to hav been brothers of Jesus, are, like the others, compositions of some one other than the accredited authors. The same testimony that we hav cited against the authenticity of the gospels is equally strongly directed against these.

It is absurd, also, to dogmatically say that Peter wrote two epistles. In fact, the doubt that he wrote even one is very strong. Kuenen, the professor of theology at Leiden, and one of the foremost theological historians in the world, says that Peter did not write either epistle bearing his name. Westcott one-half agrees with this, for he says that nothing was heard of the second epistle till the year 170 A. D. At that time, like Apostle John, Peter lived only in mythology. Dr. Davidson, with Drs. Kuenen, Oort, and Hooykaas, is certain that Peter did not write the first epistle; and of the second, he says: "Internal considerations go far to disprove its authenticity, and, with the external evidence, are very strong."

So much for the authorship of the New Testament documents. As to their date:

2. There is no Christian scholar whose reputation extends beyond his personal acquaintances who will, for a moment, contend that the four gospels were written in the first century. In "Supernatural Religion," which is as scholarly and capable an authority as any, the writer says that none of the gospels was known for one hundred and fifty years after the events it pretends to recount—that is, before A.D. 180. Dr. Davidson, who, by the way, is a Christian professor, places Matthew at 118–19, Mark at 120, Luke at 119–20, and John at 150 A D. But these dates are too early. Others, and as competent historians, place Matthew at 180, Mark at 175, Luke at 170, and John at 178. Like Davidson's estimate, these dates are approximate. Dr. Davidson puts Acts at 125; Titus and 1 and 2 Timothy at 120 to 140, John's epistles at 130, and 2 Peter at 170. This leaves but a few unimportant letters which can properly be dated in the first century, and these, with the exception of some of Paul's, were written by no one knows who. To say that the New Testament documents came into existence before the close of the first century is a falsehood, proceeding from ignorance or dishonesty.

3 and 4. The gospels and epistles were not received as authentic nor as authoritativ in the apostolic age. In the age of the apostles themselvs the gospels were not known. In the age of the apostolic fathers there were scores and scores of "gospels" and "scriptures" which were considered as authentic and as authoritativ as those now in the Christian canon. And many of our present canonical books were not received at all, but were kicked about as writings of uninspired and commonplace people. In fact, it was not until A.D. 170 that any of the books were called sacred. Westcott says that for a century and a quarter after the death of Jesus the Old Testament was considered to be more authoritativ than the New, and others place the date of the change of sentiment much later. When Paul referred to the "holy scriptures" he meant the Old Testament, says Westcott; and Davidson confirms this by saying that wherever the early Christian fathers used the phrase "it is written," or the word "scripture," they had exclusivly in mind the Old Testament. When the Christian canon was forming there were in circulation some forty gospels, and a much greater number of acts, epistles, and revelations. Origen says that very many were written, and when the fathers began to form canons they each adopted what books they liked. Instead, therefore, of having a New Testament which all agreed was authentic and authoritiv, the early Christians had dozens of them which had no authority for any one but the compilers. The early Christians were split into sects, and they had their heresies and heretics just as they hav now. No two sects used the same books. The first collection of New Testament documents was not considered inspired by its compiler (Marcion, about A D. 145), and he did not include a number of books now in the canon. He had a "gospel" of his own, which was identical with about three-fourths of Luke, and it is probable that Luke's gospel was made up from his. When Irenæus made up his canon he ignored many of the books now found in our canon. The ancient Syriac Christians omitted several books now in the New Testament. So did the Bible of the early African church. The canon of the Abyssinian church was different from ours. The Thebaic and the Memphitic versions left out Revelation. Origen considered the authenticity and authoritativness of some of our canonical books as extremely doubtful. Eusebius did not recognize as authentic all of our scriptures. Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, did not accept Revelation. The council of Laodicea also omitted this book from its canon. So did the majority of Christian fathers as late as 365 A.D. St. Chrysostom left out five of our canonical documents. Theodore of Mopsuestia rejected six. The Sinaitic, Vatican, and Alexandrine manuscripts do not agree. The Clermont Codex, a Latin list of the books read in the African church in the third century, does not include all the books now considered sacred. The Apostolic Constitutions (a collection of rules, mainly for the guidance of the clergy, dating from the fifth century) omit eight of our present New Testament documents. The council of Trent (1546) adopted the canon of the Catholic Bible; the Westminster Assembly (1647) adopted the list of the Protestant Bible. The various councils held previously adopted sometimes one canon and sometimes another. The statement that the books of the New Testament "were received and recognized as authentic and authoritativ in the apostolic age, and hav ever since been so received and recognized by the Christian church," is a gigantic falsification of history.

5 and 6. The concurrence of view of Christ found by the religious journal in the gospels is one of those mental delusions which occur often to men desirous of making people believe that which is not true in order to keep fat positions of profit and power. The gospels, the historical part of the New Testament, contradict each other as to facts, and the doctrins of Peter and Paul are widely enough at variance to found upon one the Roman Catholic church and upon the other the equally huge system of imposture called the Protestant church. The gospel of John is so different from the other three that Kuenen throws it aside as valueless for historical purposes, and approves what Drs. Oort and Hooykaas say of the other three: "In the synoptic gospels we find certain narrativs which refer to Jesus in appearance only, and really rose in the apostolic communities in consequence of the division in their midst. . . . More than once we encounter narrativs that cannot possibly be understood in connection with the life of Jesus. . . . When we place Matthew, Mark, and Luke side by side . . . we are surprised to find that the evangelists, from the very fact of their going to work so artlessly and simply, and introducing most of their alterations without exactly intending it, emend and refute themselvs." That is a pretty and gentle mantle to throw over the sins of the writers of the three gospels, but can it be stretched to cover the alterations in the traditions which they did intend to make?

But if in the gospels there is no harmony, much less can it be found in the teachings and doctrins of Peter and Paul, or between the doctrins of those two gentlemen and the doctrins of Jesus. Keeler has stated the facts succinctly: "The contest between Peter and Paul raged fiercely in the early days immediately following Jesus, and each was vigorously supported by factions. The doctrins which Protestant clergymen preach so much—predestination, foreordination, sanctification, and similar ones—are Paulisms, Jesus never having taught them. Paul was the apostle of uncircumcision and of the gentiles; Peter, of circumcision and of the Jews. Paul wished to 'carry Christ' to the gentiles and still allow them to be gentiles. Peter said if they become Christians they must also become Jews, be circumcised, and do as the Jews did in the ceremonial. In those days Paul was not recognized as a lawful teacher of Christianity, nor was he for more than a hundred years. In these days, if Peter should come back to earth and advocate circumcision, the strangulation of bullocks, and the strict observance of the Jewish ceremonial, he would not be permitted to preach in any Christian church, Catholic or Protestant. Paul said, if any one, even an angel from heaven, preached any other gospel than he did, that person should be accursed. He claimed authority as an apostle equal to that of the apostles at Jerusalem. But they had been appointed by the Master in person, or, eleven of them had been, and they had elected a twelfth to fill the place of Judas, Peter superintending the process, while Paul had appointed himself; and for him to claim to be their equal was something to which they could not submit. Paul asked, 'Am I not an apostle?' And the others said he was not. Revelation (a Johannine and therefore an anti-Pauline work) says, referring to Paul, 'And thou hast tried them which say they are apostles, and are not, and hast found them liars.' Paul claimed that he and his followers were still Jews, even if they did not practice circumcision, but Peter and his friends denied it, and Revelation, again thrusting at Paul, says, 'I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are of the synagog of Satan;' and 'them of the synagog of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie.' Paul conceded that he had caught some of his followers by being crafty and using guile, but he thought that if he had misrepresented as to his apostolic authority, since good had come of it, no harm had been done.

'For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?'

"Paul's early spirit as a persecutor appears when he wishes that those anti-Paulines who troubled the Galatians were cut off. He once met Peter in Antioch, and an open conflict occurred. The Ebionites, one of the most powerful of the early sects, rejected Paul, and said he was an apostate from the law. The Clementine Homilies attack him bitterly under the name of Simon Magus. They reject his epistles entirely. Justin Martyr rejected him, and scarcely deigned to notice his writings. Hegesippus would not use his epistles, and said, substantially, that he had falsified scripture. The Paulines, on the other hand, rejected the epistle to the Hebrews—which Christians now attribute to Paul—and they also rejected Revelation. The followers of Valentinus were Paulines, as were those of Marcion; those of Basilides were Petrines. The Cerinthians opposed St. John as well as Peter and Paul; the Simonians opposed Peter; the Ophites rejected St. John and St. Paul. They were snake-worshipers, and claimed to hav derived their doctrins from James the brother of Jesus. Another sect, the Donatists, held that there were no virtuous people in the Christian church except such as belonged to their sect, and required all who joined them to be re-baptized. Jerome was bitterly hostil to Origen's views, even accusing the latter, substantially, of heresy. Rufinus adopted Origen's theories, and Jerome, who had been Rufinus's dearest friend, loaded him with the most terrible reproaches, until the quarrel became the scandal of the church in that time. It sounds strangely to hear persons in these days express a desire for a 'return to primitiv Christianity, when all was peace and love.' There never was such a time."

Whenever religious papers print paragraphs similar to the one we hav made a text for this overwhelming refutation, they do so with the purpose, deliberate and crafty, of deceiving the people. The facts we hav given may be known by every one, and would be but for the persistent and dishonest efforts of the clergy to suppress them. Following the policy of Paul in being crafty, they may, however, find themselvs standing to the people in the relation that Paul complained of to the Corinthians: "The more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved."

FROM the lofty hills upon which Boonton, N. J.. is built, one of the finest views within fifty miles of New York can be seen. On the summit of one of those hills stands a stanch Presbyterian church, in whose tower is a clock. Passing it the other day the Rev. J. M. Buckley took note of its four faces; one certified the hour of 11:31, another 3:20, the third 9:27, and the fourth showed that it was 11:30. This, he thinks, might serve as a typical sign for the Andover Theological Seminary, but seems strangely out of place upon an orthodox Presbyterian church. We don't know. A stopped clock, it occurs to us, is about the best symbol for a creed that never grows and is as hateful now as when first constructed. But doesn't the clock represent the Boonton churches, each pointing a separate way, but all united on one thing—stopping to imprison men for blasphemy? Ask C. B. Reynolds.

THE Methodists of West Virginia, as represented in conference, hav declared themselvs against all "public gatherings for other than religious purposes" on Sunday. If these tolerant folks could only run the universe in their brainless groove, how happy they would be!

---

GOD has evidently deserted some of his would-be defenders in the West. A Kansas clergyman who had engaged to debate with J. E. Remsburg was stricken with paralysis a few days before the debate was to hav taken place, and a Nebraska clergyman who attempted to answer one of his lectures fell in a fainting fit before he had uttered a dozen words.

THE Christian Advocate relates this instance of special providence: "In Boston a large house prints for several religious papers of different creeds, and also an Atheistic paper of evil fame as especially venomous. The building was damaged by fire, and the only forms saved were those of the godless sheet above mentioned." What was the name of the "especially venomous" paper?

A DISPATCH to the Herald reads:

"The pope announces that many villagers in Macedonia hav expressed a desire to re-enter the church, and hav asked that priests be sent to instruct them."

Now the religious press will hav a chance to quote the cry of the man Paul saw in one of his visions, "Come over into Macedonia and help us."

Two Irish Roman Catholic parents who left their twins in the hallway of a strange house to die unless found and cared for by strangers, left also this note in the basket with them:

"DEAR GOOD FATHERS: Do please giv the little ones to Sister Irene to keep under her sheltering care. God bless and protect them. They are twins and hav not been baptized.

"MARY AND EDWARD MURPHY."

Mary and Edward Murphy are undoubtedly pious and devout, but they are not shining ornaments of humanity.

AT the Prohibition convention which met at Syracuse last week, the daily papers reported as something remarkable that out of over nine hundred delegates thirty-two voted for Birney, the ancient Abolition candidate for president. This is a small proportion. Had the city managing editors sent their reporters to the Freethought conventions of recent years, they would hav found about every other one of the delegates and audience to be either a prominent Abolition apostle, or a worker in the ranks of that party. Most of the old Abolitionists after the war joined the Freethinkers as the reform party whose purposes and platform were the most pressing. It is with sorrow that we record the gradual diminution of the ranks of those veterans. One by one they are going to the windowless palace of rest, and soon we shall hav none left. The ones who hav become Freethinkers are naturally the ones who espoused the cause of the slave. The fellows left to the pious Prohibitionists are those who were whipped into line when their churches, as a matter of policy, swung into the Abolition ranks. They are the eleventh-hour laborers who are getting the full day's pay. Speaking of piety, this Prohibition convention outranks even the God-in-the-Constitution party. The convention held a revival meeting before being called to order, which partook of the nature of a Methodist prayer-meeting. Hymns were rendered in approved church voice. "All Hail the Power of Jesus's Name," and "Nearer my God to Thee," were favorits. The hall was decorated with the buzzard-dollar motto, "In God we trust." A brother from Brooklyn who might be supposed to know, informed the Almighty that the delegation from New York was the devil. He prayed God that the devil might not come in. Then another brother stilled the convention by silent prayer, after which a delegate said that they were there to pray as they felt inclined. Then they discussed John Sherman, who, in a speech of three thousand words, never mentioned Prohibition, and the conclusion was that "the man who declines to come into the party shows he is not in the bosom of the Lord." Shouts of "Amen!" and "Glory to God!" greeted the shouter, who said the Prohibition was the laboring man's party. A delegate from Ulster county hoped Howard Crosby would not speak of high license when next he preached in his church. A fifty-year-old convert said he was a shouting Methodist, and made a speech in which his halleluias were responded to by shouts of "Amen," and "God bless the convert." Delegate Minister Williams wanted to know how many there belonged to the church of Jesus Christ. When the question was put, every man and woman stood up. Ninety-two clergymen delegates stood on their chairs. When a call was made for the church officers, several hunded responded. A political census revealed one hundred and thirty-four former Democrats. The remainder had formerly been Republicans. There were four ex-Confederate soldiers, who were taken to the platform. Federal soldiers numbered only one hundred and twelve. The liquor traffic was voted a crime against God, and a demand was made that men should be taxed on what they own and not on what they owe. It was also resolved that interest on money in this state should be reduced to five per cent. The convention declared for woman suffrage, and voted down a plank which declaimed against large holdings of land. Then the convention said it was grateful to Almighty God, the sovereign over nations and the guardian of homes, and looked to him for guidance, and adjourned. The convention's candidate for secretary of state is the Rev. D. W. C. Huntington, presiding elder of the Genesee conference of the Methodist church.

Letters from Friends.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., Aug. 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished reading Elmina's article in last paper, and hasten to send words of approval. I sent my mite long ago to Dr. Foote, but I again inclose the amount asked. Words of approval are weak compared with what I feel. I fain would exchange places with her, being much younger and accustomed to hard usage; think I could endure it better than an elderly woman. May my god of Love, Truth, and Justice support her through this trying hour! It is a battle for all humanity! Most thoroughly do I stand for Elmina. ABBIE KNAPP.

OGDEN, UTAH, July 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav delayed too long in sending my subscription, hoping and anticipating something more in the way of subscriptions and orders for books, but the time has run on imperceptibly and my anticipations are not realized.

I mourn for the ignorance and superstition that reign in the midst of abundant means to acquire knowledge, and as a result the successful accomplishment of plans of scheming religious and political ministers to deprive the masses of their religious and political privileges, reducing the many to beggary, and raising the few to be millionaires.

If the forlorn hope is not soon changed to a certain anticipation of restored rights of citizens of a republic by the free and independent use of the ballot, they must and will be, by the bullet and dynamite, forever lost. The war-cry will be, "Victory or Death."

THE TRUTH SEEKER is "getting no worse quite fast," while Heston is giving his eye-openers to the frauds of Christianity and the swindling operations of political schemers.

Please find inclosed $1 for Mrs. Slenker. JOHN T. JOST.

CONOORD, N. C., Aug. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am poor, and am so because the Christian members of the convention of North Carolina in 1866 repudiated $3,000 worth of state bonds the state justly owes me. I am a cripple, and tried in 1884 to be elected to a county office. The Christians of Cabarrus county refused to giv me their support, so I was defeated in an effort to make an honest and honorable living to support my wife and three children. These same Christians uphold a bankrupt swindler, who is a pillar in the Methodist church, who some twelve years since swindled his creditors out of $20,000, and is now boarding with his wife in a $5,000 house. This same man made a Sunday-school address before a Sunday-school convention yesterday.

I would be glad if I had the money to get several of the books advertised in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would especially be glad to get Colonel Kelso's "Bible Analyzed." For the reasons above stated, I am unable financially to get anything; yet I get free many curses from the Christian people, the pious church-members of this county.

J. W. MEHAFFRY.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Aug. 11; 1887.

MY DEAR ELMINA: After reading your letter to friends in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 16th, I had my mind relieved of the idea that you could wish to publish what I read in the Word, at which I was very truly surprised. I am very thankful for the letter. Herewith I mail $1 for the Defense Fund; I sincerely desire that you may be able to arrange the knowledge you hav acquired in your researches on heredity and hav it simplified to that degree that every mother in the and will be permitted to liv true to her highest ideal of sex-life. Freedom has been crucified for generations past in the marriage bed, until health is scarce, and every sign to-day shows physical degeneracy. It is time grandmothers, take the initiativ steps of informing the youth of our beloved country of the tremendous danger awaiting the mistakes of ignorance of sex laws. I criticised "Diana," before it was put on the market, and consider it pure in morals, and a guide to the old and young that was much needed. Really, this generation hav reason to rise up and call you "blessed above all women for righteousness's sake." If the people need anything to elevate habits and morals, it is the naked truth in regard to sex-life. MRS. KATE PARKER.

WAMEGO, KAN., Aug. 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Being compelled by the non-arrival of THE TRUTH SEEKER to vary the usual Sunday morning program, I know of no better plan than to send greeting to our large family circle, and ask a few questions upon subjects which I hav not seen fully discussed.

Why don't Christians belong to several churches at the same time? When beaten in argument, they generally play their trump card by declaring that, if it should turn out that they are correct, it would go hard with their opponents; while, if they are wrong, they hav nothing to lose. Persons who are willing to sacrifice truth and manhood to escape the wrath of an imaginary angry demon should make sure they are safe by taking all the tickets they can get in the theological lottery. They should become Catholic, Lutheran, Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Mohammedan, and Mormon. Why not?

The question is sometimes asked, "Do you believe in the existence of a supreme being?" It seems this question is rather ambiguous, for no man can understand its meaning. On turning to Webster's Unabridged, we find that "being" means "Existence in fact or in thought," and "this applies to everything which exists in any way . . . whether in the nature of things or only in our notions." Should not the question be stated in a different form, as, for instance, "Do you believe in the material existence of dreams?"

How soon can we expect to see the "Star of Bethlehem?" An old gentleman in our town points out Venus to his friends, and says: "You want to look at that star now; that's the Star of Bethlehem, and you won't see it again for three hundred years." How willingly some people are deceived! The Christians would giv anything for a star they might call their own, even if it appeared but once in a thousand years. The ancient religions encouraged science in some degree, and mythology is immortalized in the stars, but Christianity has persecuted astronomy immeasurably, and, as Colonel Ingersoll says, "Not a star in all the vast expanse now bears a Christian name." By the way, it seems to me that Christian names are not as generally used in naming children as formerly. A. T. MCMILLAN.

ALLIANCE, O., Aug. 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of our city and vicinity hav had a "feast of fat things." Dr. J. L. York has been here and given us two lectures. On Sunday evening, Aug. 14th, the doctor spoke to a large audience in our Opera House; subject, "Evolution and Creation; Man or Monkey—Which?" and it was certainly one of the best lectures that our people hav listened to for a long time. On Tuesday evening, under the auspices of the Union Labor party, the doctor spoke on "The Rights of Labor; or, The Reign of the Common People," and again a fine, large, and enthusiastic audience greeted him. The doctor is a brick, and wherever he goes cannot fail to do the people good. We expect the doctor here again this fall in November, and I know from the feeling and expressions of the people he will receive a warm welcome. The doctor and his good lady left here Thursday for Columbus, Ohio, where he speaks two Sundays, and then on East. Those who hav not arranged for the doctor to lecture for them would do well to correspond with him at once, for such men should not be idle. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER success, and long life to Watson Heston, I am, Yours fraternally, GEO. W. THORNBURGH.

WILSON, ILL., Aug. 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 6th is an account of Thomas Abbott West, the murderer of Susie Beck at St. Louis.

The said reverend commenced his career as sky-pilot in this vicinity. In the fall of 1884, a Wesleyan minister (Mr. Riley) was holding tent meetings near Campus. West came there, claiming to hav been sent by the elder to assist in saving souls. He claimed to be unsectarian, and proved to be the right man, as he gathered many lost souls home.

At the close of the meetings he came out and said he had been sent by the elder to work in the interest of the Methodist Episcopal church, and for that alone, and demanded half the spoils, when there occurred a scene hard to describe; but the outcome was that a leading pillar of the Methodist Episcopal persuasion received him with open arms, and commenced to organize a Methodist Episcopal church.

They finally succeeded in buying the Congregationalist church at Campus, and West was established as pastor. The leading members thought him a saint on earth. He was a very good-looking man and a very good talker, but the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER at Campus and he could not agree; therefore, they were willing to take their chances for heaven over a different route from the one he was agent for. BROOKLYN, N. Y., Aug. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As one of the many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I cannot but be pleased in perusing the many able articles which you weekly set before us. I am more pleased. however, to observe that, as the venerable old Bible sinks in estimation as a book of divine authority in morals, purity, it correspondingly rises with me and other thinkers in estimation as an interesting, funny collection of old comicalities.

I will not except the "Arabian Nights Entertainments," Smollet, Dickens, Munchausen, or even Shakspere for its laughable absurdities and the solemn gravity of its romances.

Being familiar with its general character from my schoolboy days, open it where I will—like every other familiar romance—I am sure to find something to interest me, something to smile at, something to sigh over; but, alas! too much filth and obscenity—bah! creativ of nausea and disgust!

An old friend of mine, long since dead, estimated it somewhat in the same light. He conceived the idea of printing the Bible, omitting therefrom all filthy, obscene, lewd, and immoral passages. But, unfortunately, some pious old ladies, hearing of his intentions, at the suggestion of their pastor borrowed his marked copy, and my friend's Bible was never seen again.

My friend Daniel Mason, for some years one of your subscribers, a few days before his death was asked by a practically kind and sympathetic old lady "if he was a Christian."

He calmly answered, "Mrs. Archer, as Christianity manifests itself, I hardly think I ought to be rated as one."

"But the Bible, the holy Bible, you surely believe in it, Mr. Mason?"

Looking gravely at Mrs. Archer, he calmly replied, "Mrs. Archer, I hardly think you could hav read that book, or you could not ask a dying man that question." He paused, but commenced again.

"Yes, Mrs. Archer, I hav read the book, and as for belief, I believe it is the filthiest, most obscene, immoral, in its teachings, ever printed or placed before the world as a model. There is not a felon or murderer reared in the lowest brothel in New York city or now in our state prisons but could justify his crimes from the teachings of the Bible."

The old lady cast her eyes upward, threw her arms aloft, and walked seriously out of the room. Two days subsequently the funeral of our friend took place, and was numerously attended, and Mrs. Archer remarked as she looked upon his remains, "I can say one thing for Mr. Mason, he was not afraid to die."

And it is before the believers in and practicers of the obscenities, vulgarisms, immoralities, cruelties, and nastiness of this book Mrs. Slenker is to be arraigned! For daring to do what? For daring to publish a much-needed work on physiology, to arrest the transmission of some of the miseries of mankind. D. B.

REDDICK, ILL., Aug. 21, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I am astonished and surprised to note the actions of the vile Comstock, Crew & Co., against Aunt Elmina D. Slenker, of Snowville, Va. What! is a man or woman not allowed to express their honest and true thoughts? What has Elmina done? Scientifically and morally she has done no wrong, and the moral world will testify to that effect. What woman in the moral world has done more than Elmina for the advancement of Freethought and morality? Not one. She has planted seeds of reform that men hundreds of generations hence will reap the benefit of. See the many thousands of books and papers that she has circulated to the reading masses of America and Canada. Who will take the benefit of that? Why, the generations yet unborn.

Her work is also having a very bad effect on Christianity. We can see the hearse in the not far distant horizon coming for the corpse of dying Christianity. It is dying the most horrible death, and in its great convulsions it is doing all within its power to overthrow the grand platform of Infidelity. Hence its slimy attack on Mrs. Elmina Slenker. We all know that from the many thousands of books that she has sent broadcast not a complaint has been heard, and over the heads of hell-deserving sky-pilots and Christian sneaks, from the vast host of her readers come the welcome words, Long liv Aunt Elmina.

We owe her a debt of gratitude that we will never be able to pay. Now, what we want to do is this. Her trial comes off the 25th of next October, and Aunt Elmina must hav financial aid from all possible sources. Now, let each one of us rally to her support, if with only ten cents. Send not less than ten cents, or not over $75,000, to Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va. C. B. HUNTER.

DETROIT, MICH., Aug. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just got THE TRUTH SEEKER for this date, the first I hav seen for some months past, and the editorial upon the proposed centennial of the adoption of the Constitution has almost persuaded me to again become a subscriber. I am sorry to see that the editor and friend Lazarus differ over a question that is so simple that neither can get down to it. But if I could be allowed a little space in a really free paper I would offer some advance thoughts that ought to open the eyes of both of you and all of the Liberals of the country and the world.

You say there is soon to be a centennial celebration of the adoption of the Constitution, and you quote a paragraph which says that the labors of that day preserved for all time the precious fruits of freedom and self-government. This is a lie! I challenge any man to show a line or word in all past history of this country that even proposes to make the people free. On the contrary, the people of this country were slaves to Great Britain before the Revolution, and separated from the old country because they were taxed (enslaved) without being allowed a representativ to help enslave them. When the war of the Revolution began, the colonial governments continued to enslave the people all through the seven years of war, and when the war was over there was no change of government. Not a man was there that showed by word or act that he knew anything about freedom, and those men who wrote and signed that grandest of all declarations, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all people are endowed by their creator with the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," did not know what was the true meaning of the words they used, for they had always lived under a slave government. They were then living under a slave government, and they never took the first step to make the government free. Many of them lived for many years in this country, helped to make laws, and to administer and execute the laws. They saw every day and every hour the government ignore and repudiate and alienate every shadow of those rights which they had declared were inalienable to every person; and the government has continued to enslave the people to this day, and millions of lives, and hundreds of billions of dollars of the toiling slaves, and the rights of all people hav been sacrificed and alienated by the curse of a government formed in ignorance by slaves who did not know what to do with the liberty they had won. There has never been a people in slavery that was not placed in that condition by their government. To suppose that the colored people were ever in a condition of slavery in a country that had a free government is to suppose that fire and water will mix, or that vice and virtue could liv in harmony. There was never any other slavery in this country than that which the government has planted and fostered for the whole period of its existence. It was not unique in its origin; it was formed after the old governments from which the framers had fled or emigrated; they had no knowledge of any other; they added nothing new. Its strength has only been tested by the dangers of the slavery it had fostered; it has never had peace or prosperity; the gallows, the prison, poorhouses, and workhouses hav increased faster than its real wealth; its cancers, in the form of cities filled with penal institutions, called work-shops and factories, ought to be photographed upon every wall of Philadelphia on the assembling of this centennial. It is full time that some of the reform papers should advocate a free government for this country, the people of which hav been for over a century fools as well as slaves.

Our friend Lazarus seems to hav flopped around until one would suppose he must hav found a dry spot to stand upon, but he seems as far off as ever from anything solid. He reminds me of one of Orpheus C. Kerr's assertions about W. H. Seymour, that he was called Say more because he could say more and mean less than any other man. But he has never yet learned that he is a slave, and no proclamation of president or king or act of legislature ever has made or ever will make him or any other man free. Whenever any government has laid a tax upon its people, those people are slaves, and in no other way were any people ever made slaves. J. H. WOOD.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, renewal for the grand and good TRUTH SEEKER, and also one new subscriber.

Keep on with the pictures. They are as strong and powerful to shake the faith of the Christians as giant powder is to blast the solid mountains; for they will look at the pictures if they don't read the contents of the paper.

Mr. Heston is a genius to picture out the horrible thing, as the Christians call it, but still they believe it; but, if it is horrible to look at the pictures, their dogma is to me more horrible to believe in. JOHN ENGSTROM.

OBITUARY.

BAXTER SPRINGS, KAN., Aug. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Another veteran truth seeker and moral hero is at rest. Hiram Crum, aged seventy years and five months, died at Baxter Springs, Kan., Aug. 12, 1887. He was born in western New York, was a pioneer in Michigan, and then in Kansas. He had a very strong physical organism, was a hard-working, frugal, honest, patient man, generous and kind-hearted, and many of the poor will remember his acts and gifts of sincere sympathy, and miss him as a friend and neighbor. I first knew him fourteen years ago; and about ten years ago, through me, he subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which he has read and distributed ever since. He subscribed for D. M. Bennett's books, "Around the World," and has sent not a few dollars for TRUTH SEEKER publications and other Liberal and Freethought works. He has done more to promote our cause, in a pecuniary sense, than all the rest of the Infidels in the county, most of whom are weak-kneed, talk-to-me-in-private Free (?) thinkers. He has got up public meetings, mostly at his own expense, and his heart, purse, and house were always open to poor, weary lecturers, and he bought liberally their books and often paid the whole lecture bill when others would not help. If all would work with tongue and money as he did, in proportion to their means, what an impetus would be given to the cause of truth and humanity! Being about to leave here, I went twenty miles to pay him my farewell visit. When I left him, with great regret, he was well seemingly, and I thought might out-liv me, two years younger than he; but what was my surprise and grief to be sent for in three days to read, sing, and speak at his funeral? He had worked very hard in the intense heat which we hav had here for three weeks, was prostrated and exhausted, and after twelve hours of alternation between suffering and sleeping under an opiate, that strong frame yielded to its opponents and he died, as he believed, never to liv again as an individual. His affectionate wife and daughter, his neighbors and physician, did the best they could to save him, but he has left us, and a blank in his family and society that no one else can fill. I told my audience, part Liberal and part orthodox, what a naturalist and humanitarian is, in contrast to a bigoted, priest-ridden, deluded Godite; and, as well as I could in my physical and mental condition, told them the significance of this life and how to make the most of it. He is worthy of a volume, but your space is precious and I must stop. Hiram Crum, the lover of truth and humanity, the hater of priestcraft, Gods, and shams, the public-spirited citizen, the honest, kind neighbor. the patient, indulgent husband and father, and my dearest friend—farewell. J. H. COOK.

ST. CATHERINES, ONT., July 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 25, 1886, Mr. J. L. Tompkins, of Lake City, Iowa, says he has worked on a farm more than fifty years, and been a close observer of all crops—thinks he ought to be a competent witness in the chess case. He has seen every wheat stool that a horse had eaten off bring chess; has seen nearly all chess where the snow had all blown off the wheat; has seen a stool of wheat part wheat and part chess from one root (a good witness, truly!); has even seen timothy meadows changed to chess by drouth, but it was right the next year. He knew a man that had alternately first timothy, then chess, and thirdly good timothy meadow on the same ground. He then says he will tell me something I don't know, viz., that I cannot raise a single grain of chess from chess if it were to save my life. He says his uncle for thirty years offered first $5, then $10, for chess so raised, but got none. He then cites an opinion which he says perhaps the strongest agricultural writer in the United States (and one whom he says a great man was proud to know in his day) has given: "The man that does not know that wheat will pass to chess is too big a fool for me to discuss with." This suits well with what that uncouth, ignorant old farmer said gruffly to that young farmer, "Every fool knows wheat will turn to drips." These random assertions not only are futil, but prove conclusivly that they did not emanate from intelligent and enlightened minds. Rational and well informed minds are ever pleased to prove what they affirm, and will frankly impart their knowledge to others. "Fool" is the holy Bible's pet word —"ye fools!" "thou fool!" "the fool hath said, There is no God." Query, which is the fool, the one who denies or the one who affirms? Common sense says, the one who affirms what he cannot prove. Further he says: "It looks weak in me to call for proof, when I hav not given any evidence to the contrary." He ought to know that it does not devolve on me to prove what I deny. I believed that chess would grow chess, and was therefore careful not to sow it; but had heard farmers say it would not grow, and after that young farmer raised that chess on his stubble ground, he was told also that it would not grow, therefore he planted some in September, putting a stake by it, and the next July he showed me the chess on their stalks that had grown from chess. Believing this, I was sure that I could raise chess from chess, too; but after seeing Mr. Tompkins's strong and positiv assertion that I could not, I thought it best to keep mum and prove it. And this I hav now done, and that beyond the possibility of doubt. Last January, I filled a flower-pot with clean ground, in which I planted six grains of chess, and put the pot in a warm stove room, and in a few days six blades of chess came up. After two weeks I put the pot in a cool room, and April 1st I put the contents of the pot out into the ground, and in June several stalks from each stool yielded chess. I hav now proved that Mr. Tompkins's strong assertion that I could not raise chess from chess does not hold good, neither is there a particle of proof in the other cases that he has cited that wheat or timothy did turn to chess. The following assertions are parallel with his. A trustworthy farmer told me he once had a field of first-class red clover, but the next summer it was covered with sorrel, and he said he was positiv the clover had turned to sorrel. A boy has seen a long, hair-like animal swim on water, and his pa and grandpa told him it was a hair-snake and had come from a horse-hair; that horse-hairs turned to snakes when they got in water. The boy of course believes it, and grows up with that belief, and will tell others that he knows (perhaps swears he knows) that horse-hairs will turn to snakes, because his pa and grandpa said so, and he knows they wouldn't lie. No, they did not mean to lie, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that they, and all others that said horse-hairs turned to snakes, did lie.

Mr. Tompkins says he is just as positiv that wheat or timothy will bring cheat as he is that two and two make four. If he is so sure of it, why does he not prove it and settle this much-disputed chess question? Candid Liberals, you must see that positiv assertions without proof are not only worthless, but deceiving, and do a great deal of harm; therefore they should never be made unless they are based on facts. Having been ruined by those two pious, sneak-thievish lawyers of this city, I am now (financially) a poor man, and nearing seventy-three, but still anxious to learn realities, therefore, if Mr. Tompkins, or any other Liberal, has or finds such a prodigy as he and some others hav seen, viz., wheat and chess from one root, and makes it known in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will, if I can get money enough for a third-class fare, go and see it, and that with the greatest pleasure. A. MOOT.

NEW YORK, Aug. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Feeling a growing interest in Mrs. Slenker's case, and believing it to be an occasion for earnest, conscientious thought and action; also hoping to aid the cause of justice by throwing some new lights upon this subject, from a woman's standpoint, I beg to say that it is incomprehensible how one of Mr. Macdonald's logic and intelligence upon other subjects should, in some points respecting this case, show such a lack of appreciation.

Indeed, this would seem a signal illustration of the fact that woman can never be understood and judged in her work or purpose by a quick, unerring judgment except by woman. Here, as ever, a woman's insight only can do justice to woman.

It seems to me that the TRUTH SEEKER editorials, clear and positiv as they are against the infringement of constitutional rights. yet with respect to Mrs. Slenker, hav done her but partial justice. It is with surprise that we note these words in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER: "Mrs. Slenker has been engaged in a work which to her seemed necessary and good; others, however, hav not seen the necessity for the work, and hav disapproved of it. Probably ninety of every hundred Freethinkers condemn the work as uncalled-for and useless." Since this is merely an opinion, we beg to differ, but not without first deprecating the statement, as it is liable to prejudice hundreds of people against this most high-minded and excellent woman, who might hastily catch up the subject from this point, without having previously read its history. I believe that if the majority of Liberal-minded people could thoroughly understand this case in all its phases, they would heartily sympathize with Mrs. Slenker and approve her interest in the subject of sexology. But what if they did not? Would it therefore prove that people always think and feel as they ought to think and feel? Does not society—Freethinkers included—hold a thousand prejudices and fads which they ought not to hold?

The majority of our sex are indifferent to the right of suffrage, because they "hav not seen the necessity," and "condemn the work as uncalled-for and useless." But would Mr. Macdonald or any other fair-minded Liberal accept this as a final argument why we should giv up the fight?

Again, we presume that the inhabitants of Oregon and California would hav got along very comfortably had Mr. Putnam not gone among them to expound the Nine Demands of Liberalism. He has doubtless encountered many who vastly prefer theology to Secularism, and so look upon his work as "uncalled-for and useless."

We supposed it was a foregone conclusion, at least with so-called Liberals, that everyone should work in his or her own way, in love and patience, for the truth. Now, this is what Mrs. Slenker has been doing, with all the honesty and thoroughness of her nature. Nor can we conceive of any work being higher or more called-for than this. If a more rational religion is needed at the present day, so do we also need more rational and wholesome ideas upon the relations of sex. Knowledge must always precede reform; but how can we get knowledge until an interest in what we would know is first awakened? It was simply Mrs. Slenker's interest in this most vital of subjects, which she had a perfect right to feel, and which should pass to her credit, that was the motiv to this correspondence in question. And now at this point it is timely to speak of the comparativ importance of this subject with those which THE TRUTH SEEKER and Freethought Magazine are usually devoted to. The important work of these journals, excellent as they are, seems to be an unremitting bombardment of orthodox Christianity.

We hav often marveled at the acres of space devoted to this end. This may be necessary, but as we regard conduct greater than creed, so do we regard Mrs. Slenker's work as more important than either of these; for it has been applied to human conduct rather than to creed. I hav scores of denominational Christian friends who are living good and blameless lives. Is it as important to unsettle their faith as it is to make a husband or father less sensual and selfish? Opinion, even an orthodox one, may not culminate in evil, while evil is always evil, and multiplies upon itself. Conduct is above creed, even a Liberal creed, and, surely, a Liberal opinion is not of so much value as a clean and virtuous life; for virtue in its true sense is a condition of strength and development. A husband may believe in all the absurdities of theologic dogma, even to hell and damnation if it pleases him, but he can never giv his wife a foretaste of these upon earth, or become repulsiv and intolerable to her, until he violates the sanctities of sex. And it was in this domain more than any other that Mrs. Slenker strove to enlighten and deliver from the fetters of vice.

It was in respect to this work of Mrs. Slenker's that Mr. H. L. Green, in the Freethinkers' Magazine for June, apologetically offers the following: "She is evidently a crank upon the sexual question, as many other very good people are." According to our observation and knowledge, this is just what the majority of men are, "cranks on the sexual question," although in a very different way from Mrs. Slenker. Dr. E. B. Foote made admission of this in connection with her case, when he said in substance that no one but a physician knows the extent of such facts as Mrs. Slenker had been taking note of. History and tradition repeat what hav been man's propensity in this regard; but tradition always lends a shelter, and so it follows that the custom continues to shelter the real abominations, while it givs the epithet of "crank" to those who would restrain lust, and raise manhood to a higher level. Mr. Green further intimates that she has violated the "established usages of society." Perhaps this declaration is no more than we shou'd expect. So far as we can determin, it appears to be harmonious with the "established usages of society" to be satisfied with merely mentioning the existence of wrongs. The last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER contains a most wise and able article, under the title of "The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism," which provides this information: "The memoirs of Guiccardini and Pedro Sanchez depict a depth of immorality that would hav revolted the libertin of the Neronic age." Now, here is a case in point—crimes which we presume Mr. Green would think it quite respectable to mention and read about, but let a woman take one step to remove these crimes; at once it is complained that she is violating "established usages of society," "bringing Freethought into disrepute," and herself a "crank!"

At last I come to consider Mrs. Slenker's method of working. For my part, I am weary and indignant at so much editorial carping about the words Mrs. Slenker happened to use. This is too petty. It should be remembered that she was conducting a private correspondence, in behalf of what interested her at that time. It is not to be expected that she would treat the subject in the same manner, or employ the same language, she would use for the public. And the same objection to the editorial criticism of her words will apply to the criticism of her subject, unless Mr. Macdonald would agree to be willing that a private correspondence of his own, upon some subject that chanced to interest him for the time being, might suddenly be brought to light, and "ninety of every hundred Freethinkers" commissioned to decide whether he might not hav chosen a more important topic for the welfare of present and future generations!

I hav myself, upon two or three occasions, ventured to express my sentiments, under seal, upon the sexual question. I do not remember whether the language would hav satisfied the refined taste of Comstock, but what matters it, since the purport of my word and thought was to inspire a more sacred regard for the most sacred function of life? How fortunate that Comstock did not suspect my intentions long enough beforehand to entrap my letters and arrest me, while the Liberal press perchance looked on, and complained that my choice of subject, and treatment thereof, were not sufficiently scientific! We can scarcely forgiv Mr. Macdonald for this remark: "We cannot imagin how any grown-up people can possibly consider such writings contributions to science." What if they are not contributions to science? We did not suppose it a condition of enjoying the privilege of the United States mail that a purely private correspondence must be brought up to a scientific or any other regulation standard.

And for the same reason, that it was a private correspondence, does any public criticism of the same seem ungracious and uncalled-for. It was doubtless a correspondence conducted by those whose peculiar experiences or sympathies had occasioned a special desire and need of that class of information. Those facts were not sought or exchanged for lascivious ends, but rather to create a horror and disgust of sexual abuses. And I cannot see why any private mode of conveying such knowledge, provided it was mutually satisfactory to those mutually concerned, should be publicly censured.

Brunsaw was the first man to ask permission of Napoleon in 1805, to visit the sewers of Paris, with a view to improving them, and for this Victor Hugo named him a hero, and the bravest man in France.

A brave and noble woman in Virginia, always on the side of right, controled by sympathy and a desire to elevate and help humanity, has looked into some of the sewers of social life. Shall we, like Hugo, praise and honor, or carp and cavil? ALTAIR.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Lark and the Prairie Fire.

The lark changed her song to a sad strain
Till I thought there were robins in the trees,
Though all the morn there had fallen gentle rain
With spicy odors wafted in the breeze.
Sweet bird, what makes you so sad at your singing
When lotus-gales come from the river and lea?
Bid sorrow depart with your joyous upspringing,
And sing a sweet song to my baby and me!

Last eve she sat and sang the moan of waves—
Our fierce inland billows of lurid flame—
As a stricken mother at her childrens' graves,
And my own bairns smiled and said, "How tame!"
I had marked the deep glow the western sky painting,
And hiding the bow that hung o'er the moon,
Till her midnight song told of a mother-heart fainting
That her sunny sky gathered its darkness so soon.

Though prairie fires snatch your pretty nest
With all its wealth of eggs dotted o'er with brown,
Take heart of song and sing the world your best,
For sweet the saving rain comes dropping down.
You are such a sweet part of our world and its morning,
Turning sorrow to noon with your midnight refrain,
Rebuild now anew, your small house adorning,
Forgetting your yesternight sadness and pain.

MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

Memory Gems.

From the Works of Thomas Paine. To be learned and recited by the children.

He that would sell his birthright for a little salt is as worthless as he who sold it for porridge without salt. And he that would part with it for a gay coat, or a plain coat, ought forever to be a slave in buff.

That men never turn rogues without turning fools is a maxim, sooner or later, universally true.

Suspicion and persecution are weeds of the same dunghill and flourish together.

Those who expect to reap the blessings of freedom must, like men, undergo the fatigues of supporting it.

The nearer any disease approaches to a crisis, the nearer it is to a cure.

Danger and deliverance make their advances together, and it is only the last push in which one or the other takes the lead.

To argue with a man who has renounced the use and authority of reason and whose philosophy consists in holding humanity in contempt, is like administering medicin to the dead, or endeavoring to convert an Atheist by scripture.

Mankind hav lived to very little purpose, if, at this period of the world, they must go two or three thousand years back for lessons and examples.

Had it not been for America, there had been no such thing as freedom left throughout the whole universe.

A good opinion of ourselvs is exceedingly necessary in private life, but absolutely necessary in public life, and of the utmost importance in supporting national life.

The worst of all policy is that of doing things by halves.

Penny wise and pound foolish, has been the ruin of thousands.

That in which every man is interested is every man's duty to support.

There never was a scheme against which objections might not be raised.

Even wolves may quarrel, still they herd together.

Evils, like poisons, hav their uses, and there are diseases which no other remedy can reach.

An association of vice will reduce us more than the sword.

Of all the innocent passions which actuate the human mind, there is none more universally prevalent than curiosity.

To be nobly wrong is better than to be meanly right.

We sometimes experience sensations to which language is not equal. S. H. W.

Our Puzzle Box.

WORDS WITHIN WORDS.

1.–From a glass vessel take slang, and leave an animal.

2.–From a small animal take cold, and leave a nation in Asia.

3.–From a thin woolen cloth take a soft white metal, and leave a stopper for a barrel.

4.–From an aromatic plant with grayish-blue flowers take to finish, and leave a vessel.

5.–From white, soft part of wood take to scorch, and leave a peculiar astringent mineral substance.

6.–From a bird of the ostrich family take a luminous body in the heavens, and leave the first shoot of a plant.

Correspondence.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., Aug. 3, 1887.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: In the lines inclosed I hav tried to tell of the prairie fires made late in the spring, and often even in June, to insure a later growth of grass for pasture. But it is pitiful to find the nests of prairie chickens and many smaller birds destroyed by the fire. The Corner improves steadily. It is entertaining for old and young. I am glad to see the Gems of Paine. Long may they wave. Yours for truth,

MARY B. FINCH.

ARMSTRONG, IA., Aug. 15, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl, nine years old. I hav a little sister seventeen months old, and three brothers. My papa runs a blacksmith shop and farm. There is a man dying here. The doctors say they cannot save his body, but two preachers think they hav saved his soul. We expect J. E. Remsburg to speak for us in September. Mamma givs me all the eggs she has to spare for taking care of the hens.

Your little Freethinker friend,

ETHEL BURT.

ELLENSBURGH, WASH. TERR., Aug. 12, 1887.

MISS WIXON: My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. He is a Freethinker, and so am I. We all like the Children's Corner very much.

It has been raining all day—the sun has just come out for the first time. We liv in a valley, with hills and mountains all around us. It doesn't rain much here and we hav to irrigate our fields and gardens.

We liv one and one-half miles from the N. T. railroad. There are not many Freethinkers here. I hav an intimate friend who joined the church; I laughed at her, and she said she guessed she would withdraw.

Some of my friends and one of my teachers laughed and made fun of me because I didn't believe in the story of the mud man. I hav six brothers and sisters.

I study arithmetic, geography, physiology, grammar, United States history, writing, and spelling. There is nice scenery here; we liv in the midst of a green valley, and we can look north and see part of the snow-clad Cascades. I will be fourteen years old in October. There are fine fir, pine, and cedar trees on the mountains, and in the valley there are palm, cottonwood, willow, and alder trees. I will close now, hoping my letter won't go to the waste-basket. I wish you success with your noble work.

HELEN M. PARRISH.

How a Deer Went to Church.

Tom (a young panther) was not our only pet; and I liked Billy ever so much better. He was a young deer, and it was exciting to see Tom watch to catch Billy, and Billy watch Tom, eat grass right in front of him, and look at his foe as if he said, "Don't you wish I would?"

When Billy's horns came to be horns and not knobs, he made many a one of his admirers go up on a fence pretty nimbly, and that was good enough for them. But he frightened folks who did not deserve it, and still the people took his part. A strong, resolute boy, by taking hold of his horns, could make him behave. Sometimes, one would jump on his back for a ride, and get a fine tumble. But there was no use to say a word against Billy; even the folks he made scamper did not want him shut up. There was not another deer in the country. He was very beautiful and graceful, and they liked to see such a fleet creature bound over the fences, across the fields, and through the woods. It was sport to set dogs after him, to see him toss them with his horns, stamp them with his fore feet, send them flying with his hind feet, or skip off, leaving them to wonder what had become of him.

All that summer he frolicked and visited, and all the next winter. The next spring his horns dropped off, and he got another pair with a prong on each. No boy was ever so proud of a new pair of boots as Billy of his new horns. He was large and strong, too, a splendid fellow. I made him a new collar, red, with his name on it, to wear with his new horns; and there was not another such dandy in that country.

One Sabbath morning he found himself three miles from home, and concluded he would go to church. I don't believe he cared for a sermon, and so suspect he went to show his shiny coat, bright red collar, and branching horns. Indeed, I am certain it was nothing good took Billy to church that sultry Sunday, for he did not go till the pews were crowded with people. It was a Methodist church, and that was quarterly meeting, so the whole neighborhood was present to witness Billy's piety and admire his finery. He waited outside for the presiding elder, who was a large man, very plump, rosy, grave, and dignified, and much engaged that morning thinking of the sermon he was going to preach.

The church door was open, and when the elder went in Billy went too, just behind him. There was a matting on the floor, which deadened the sounds of Billy's hoofs. So the elder walked slowly up the middle aisle, and Billy after him, making motions with his head as if he wanted him to hurry along to the pulpit and begin the sermon. The good man did walk very slowly on quarterly-meeting days. It was no wonder, then, if Billy intended staying for the sermon, he should want to get it started. But still he kept behind, and only made passes, until the elder halted at the altar steps to put down his hat, which delay Billy concluded was rather too much for the patience of any worshiper of his dignity to endure, so he gave the unlucky elder such a knock as to send him into the pulpit in an oriental attitude of devotion.

This exploit wound up Billy's career. No one would plead for him any more. He made very good venison, and the elder laughed while he ate a piece, and thought it a pity to hav killed Billy for a frolic which did no one any harm.— Wide Awake.

Stepping Stones to Success.

Learn your business thoroughly.

Keep at one thing—in no wise change.

Always be in haste, but never in a hurry.

Observe system in all you do and undertake.

Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well.

One to-day is worth two to-morrows.

Be self-reliant; do not take too much advice, but rather depend on yourself.

Never fail to keep your appointments, nor to be punctual to the minute.

Never be idle, but keep your hands or mind usefully employed except when sleeping.

Use charity with all; be ever generous in thought and deed—help others along life's stormy path.

Make no haste to be rich; remember that small and steady gains giv competency and tranquillity of mind.

He that ascends a ladder must take the lowest round. All who are above were once below.

Think all you speak; but speak not all you think;
Thoughts are your own; your words are so no more;
Where Wisdom steers, wind cannot make you sink;
Lips never err when she does keep the door.

Short Stories from the Chinese.

A young tiger met an old one and said: "I got hold of a man to-day whose upper parts were so tasteless and his nether parts so sour, that, hungry as I was, I left him in disgust. I wonder what sort of a man this could be?" "A student who has had to buy his degree," was the reply.

Chang and Chung mutually agreed to start a brewery. Said Chang to Chung: "You supply the rice and I will furnish the water." "But," queried Chung, "if the profits are divided accordingly to the capital embarked, I am afraid it will be difficult to apportion your share." "Oh, I'm not afraid," said Chang; "when the brew is over, giv me the water; you can hav the remainder."

A man was seized by a tiger. The victim's son took his bow and pursued. "Hit him in the leg," cried the father, "else you'll spoil the market value of the skin."

A bibulous individual, on entering a restaurant, noticed that the wine cups were small. After seating himself, he gave vent to a most demoniacal series of howls and groans. "What is the matter?" asked the startled landlord. "Ah," answered the man, "my father, a hale, hearty man, met his death at a friend's house by accidentally swallowing a small wine cup, so whenever I see similar ones, the memory of the sad event overcomes me." It is needless to add that the cup was replaced by a larger one.

A hard drinker dreamed that he had become possessed of a bottle of genuin stuff, but, determined to enjoy it thoroughly, he had begun to heat it. During the heating process he awoke. "Hoo, hoo," he groaned. "If I had known this was to happen, I would hav drunk it cold."

A servant did not fill a guest's cup to the brim. The latter, holding it up, remarked: "This cup is too deep," and broke a piece off. "How is that!" cried the host. "If the upper part can't hold liquor, of what use is it?" was the smart retort.—Chinese Review.

A Kiss for a Blow.

"I strike 'oo," cried a little boy, in a sharp tone to his sister.

"I kiss 'oo," said his sister, stretching out her arms and putting up her rosy lips in a sweet kiss.

Tommy looked a look of wonder. Did his little ears hear right? They did, for there was a kiss on Susy's lips. A smile broke over his angry face, like sunshine on a black cloud.

"I kiss, too," he then said; and the little brother and sister hugged and kissed each other right heartily. A kiss for a blow is better than tit for tat, isn't it?

The Anvil of God's Word.

THE TEXT.

Last eve I passed beside a blacksmith's door,
And heard the anvil ring its vesper chime;
Then, looking in, I saw upon the floor
Old hammers worn with beating years of time.
"How many anvils hav you had," said I,
"To wear and batter all these hammers so?"
"Just one," he answered; then, with twinkling eye,
"The anvil wears the hammers out, you know."
And so, thought I, the anvil of God's word
For ages skeptic blows hav beat upon;
Yet, though the noise of Paine, Voltaire, was heard,
The anvil is unworn—the hammers gone.

—Chicago Current.

THE SERMON.

Of old when orthodoxy grasped her hammer
And pounded on the anvil of God's word,
Men's cheeks grew pale before the awful clamor,
And trembling thousands the wild tumult heard.
Then Faith worked with a tireless hand the bellows,
The lurid flames leaped into startling view,
And zealous laborers among their fellows
Of proselytes a glorious harvest knew.
The scenes of by-gone days rise up before us,
When Mather, Edwards, Cartwright, Hibbard, Dow,
Beat the wild music of the "anvil chorus"
With stalwart blows—but it is different now.

The anvil then was used by well-known masters,
Its ringing notes smote loudly on the ear;
Each clang resounding told of dire disasters
To greet poor sinners in another sphere!
Now all is changed; the workers look uneasy,
The crowds no longer gather at the door,
The forge fire's out, the bellows dry and wheezy
From long disuse can fan the sparks no more.
Along the anvil's sides great cracks are showing,
With baser metal patched and plugged in vain
To hide its rents—the old, old iron is going,
We ne'er shall hear its loudest notes again.

In vain the faithful boast its sound condition,
The wish is only father to the thought!
Its battered shape, almost past recognition,
Reveals the sad effect that time has wrought.
To-day the people past the smith-shop going
Must list in vain the old-time startling sound,
Heard while it cast, from fires behind it glowing,
Its threatening shadow on the crowd around.
And better thus, robbed of its old-time terrors,
That it should, worn and useless, lie, than when,
Linked with the baneful influence of its errors,
It hung a mill-stone on the necks of men.

It hath its uses yet, for when some brother
Would, worldly-minded, fain increase his store
Of ready cash, he won't hav any other,
But makes the sacred anvil ring once more.
To reach an influential, high position,
No other stepping-stone has yet been found
So easy, sure, and safe withal as this one;
And gleefully he makes the hammer sound.
A tongue well trained to cant, his main dependence,
At each religious gathering is heard,
Where, to the ready listeners in attendance,
He glorifies the anvil of God's word.

"My tree will fruit at last"—the thought elates him—
"If I can keep it growing"—and he can;
Whatever place of trust he wants awaits him,
For who so honest as a Bible man?
Should one inquire concerning this sleek creature,
The pious say, while folks approving nod,
"Our bank cashier and Sunday-school's loved teacher;
An honest man—the noblest work of God."
Alas! that verdants fawn on imposition,
Some luckless morn doth the real sequence bring—
The cashier fled, the bank in sad condition,
Sans cash, sans notes, sans bonds, sans everything!

Yet a few years, methinks, and in some nook
With dust of unused relics cobwebbed o'er,
Among old tomes, shall rest the fateful book
Whose influence has bathed the world in gore.
The book by whose authority and aid
Kings claimed the right to rule their fellow-men,
Priests drew their right to torture men, and made
Of earth a slaughter-house and prison-pen!
The book which sanctioned killing for a creed!
Which justified by precedent the blood that poured
When Catherine's butchers wrought their hellish deed,
Or murderous Alva drew his reeking sword.

And here, perhaps, where each enthusiast hies
In seeking curios quaint, antique, and rare,
Some visitor shall come whose searching eyes
Shall spy the ancient anvil lying there.
And dusting off the webs that round it cling,
Shall question of this relic long ignored:
"Keeper, what is the history of this thing,
This battered, broken anvil you hav stored?"
And hear him thus, while halting in his round:
"That anvil, long since cracked by constant blows,
For centuries gave forth its clanging sound,
And where men heard it groans and prayers arose.
That iron whose ringing notes—now stilled, alas!
Through fear the hearts of weeping millions stirred,
Though now it lies a worn and shapeless mass,
Was one time called, 'The Anvil of God's Word.'"

Liberalism.

From the Bandon, Ore., Recorder.

It is an undeniable fact that the tendency of the age is toward Liberalism. The gyves of conscience and of mind are slipping off one by one, and to-day there are thousands and tens of thousands in the so-called civilized portions of the world who are free and independent thinkers, fearless investigators, and bold proclaimers of new and higher truths, as against creedalism, blind faith, superstition, and abject slavedom under priest and church. There is a constant evolution and ripening growth in religious thought and the philosophies of human life, as in any other department and realm. Everything in all nature has a forward tendency, is growing better, is approaching a higher state of perfection. Superstitions, myths, priestcraft, mental and spiritual subjection, intolerance, bigotry, and ignorance all are dissipating, fading away, and becoming scattered to the four winds as mists and fog before the bright noonday sun. Enlightenment, Rationalism, liberality, Freethought, independence, tolerance, fraternal feeling, are in the ascendency, and guide the philosophic man to-day in his intercourse with fellow-beings in the walks of life. This is a great step forward. It is a fact encouraging to the thinker, to him who strives for liberty of mind and soul from errors and false teachings of the past, based on the ignorance of the masses and encouraged by crafty ecclesiastics.

Liberals of to-day believe in man first and foremost, in man's goodness rather than depravity and "original sin"—a goodness which is to be found in heathens and those called unconverted, as well as in those ranking among the civilized, enlightened, and religiously devout. The old doctrin of the whole race being fallen and lost is rejected by the Liberals, and even those who still keep the old statements of it do not hold as strongly to it now as formerly. The Liberals do not regard the world's various religions as mere misguiding deceits, but as a real upward striving of human thought—feeling after the great unknown. In proportion that the human mind and soul ripen and become broadened and expanded, capable of receiving new, higher, and larger truths, in that proportion it is asked that a step forward be made, out of the old conditions, out of the old cocoon in which the chrysalis has been transforming and growing for exalted stations and office, and when church rule of any kind, or priestly interference, is interposed to stay this, then Liberalism says, "Hands off!"

The salvation that man needs is not some divine substitution by which his punishment may be borne for him, but all divine and human influence by which each may be delivered from all that keeps him down, and helped upward and onward. This is what is meant by "believing in man."

Liberals and rational thinkers recognize that all things in nature are governed by immutable law, and that under no method, no condition, can man take himself out from under its influence. Violation of law is inevitably followed by penalty. He who violates the law of his being, in whatsoever way, can no more hope to escape the consequent penalty than that one can thrust a hand into intense fire and not be burned. Liberty does not mean license. The liberty that the advanced Freethinker demands as his right is not a privilege to do any wrong and yet be exempt from penalty. Liberty, in its broad sense, means a free, independent, natural, agreeable condition, such as best preserves, upholds, elevates, and strengthens human character for the true and bounden duties of life, and it comprehends a sacred regard for the rights and privileges of all fellow human beings. It comprehends the Golden Rule.

The true Liberal respects the rights of every man, woman, and child as being of equal importance with his own rights to life, liberty, happiness, and general well-being. The true Liberal recognizes that the only way to enjoy happiness, to fulfill life's missions, and discharge its duties rightfully, is to live in obedience to law—that of the land and that of nature—to be true to selfhood, to do right in all things, right to himself, right to fellow-man.

Liberalism means in true sense the abolishment of savage instinct, inclination, and practice. It abhors violence, turbulence, brutality, bloodshed, and war. It advocates infirmaries and hospitals instead of jails and state prisons as of to-day. It demands protection of all good and lawful citizens as against the violence and unlawful acts of those criminally inclined, but looks upon capital punishment not as a rightful means to this end, even in the extreme cases of criminality. The old Jewish doctrin of an eye for an eye, and tooth for a tooth, it looks upon more as a fitting rule for bloodthirsty Sioux and Apache Indians than for a race of people claiming to be civilized.

The old systems of religion are to-day disintegrating. The whole church system of the United States and the greater portion of Europe is honeycombed, and the great number of sects now existing, each differing from the other in some respect, those last formed a little more liberal in view than the older ones, all points to one thing—universality. This may seem a paradoxical statement to some, but there is no thinker, no student of nature, but that knows disintegration, falling to pieces and decaying of the old, always precedes the springing into life of the invigorated, healthful, and growing unified new.

The two great contending forces of nature are destruction and reformation. A constant warfare goes on between these. It is part of the great and wise plan of the universal intelligence. But for destruction there would be no room for reformation. The latter is sure to follow the former. There is no human hand or will that can stay the natural order of things. All institutions, religious bodies, compacts, sects, creeds, divisions and forms of faith, are but human instruments, imperfectly made by unskilled hands to meet demands of time, place, and conditions generally, and all must undergo destruction as soon as they hav filled their mission of uses, and be followed by reformation on a wiser and improved plan, better suited to time, place, and new conditions.

A reform era has set in. There are many radical changes about to take place soon. As a thinking people we are about to emerge from a former state of being, intellectually and spiritually considered, and to stand upon the platform of Liberalism, universality, and a common brotherhood. In accordance with the great law of evolution we are about to lay aside the cumbersome, the dead-weight matter of decay, uselessness, and fetters, and stand forth in the ranks of Liberalism for a future work of reformation, bettering, in discharge of life duties, and in the effort at solving the deep problem of human destiny.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

An epizoötic disease is killing hundreds of horses in southern New Jersey.

Powderly denies that he belongs to the new Know-Nothing party, as reported last week.

It is reported that John Ruskin, the English writer, is subject to protracted periods of insanity.

The Rev. W. F. Davis is in a Boston jail to await trial for preaching on the common on Sunday without a license.

A. N. Cole, of Wellsville, N. Y., who has been called the "father of the Republican party," is a recent recruit to the Henry George standard.

Seven members of the Plainfield, N. J., volunteer fire department are under arrest charged with setting buildings afire for the fun there was in putting them out.

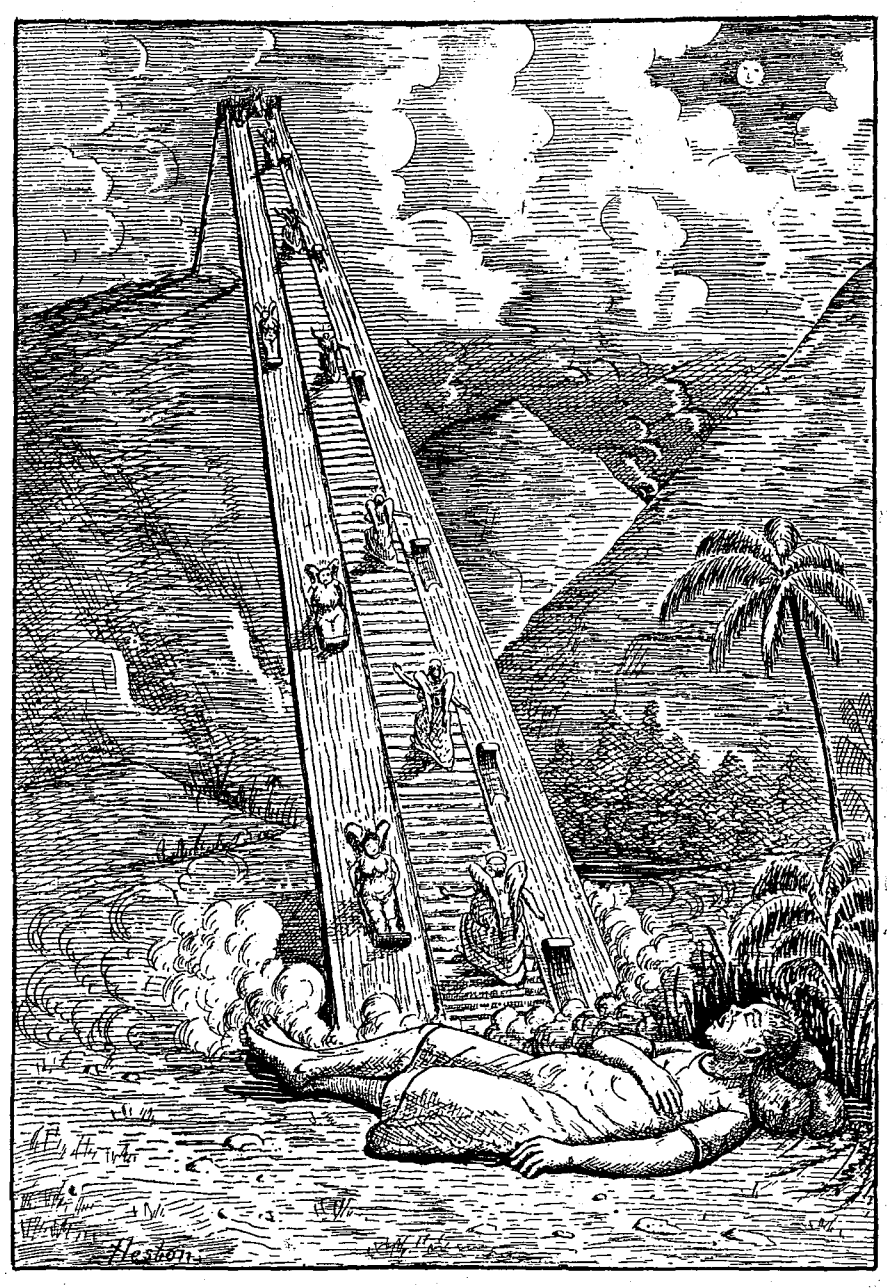
The proclamation of the lord lieutenant of Ireland denouncing the Irish National League has been indorsed by the House of Commons, against Mr. Gladstone's protest, by a majority of 78.

President Cleveland sent $10 to the East Aurora, N. Y. Fair Association, and the managers of the fair hav offered it as a prize for the best set of triplets. Lively competition is expected.

The Scotch cutter Thistle, which hopes to carry away the America's cup, lies in New York harbor and is an object of much interest. Opinions are divided as to her ability to beat the Volunteer, and the betting is about even.

The Rev. Frank H. Decker is successor to the Rev. J. Hyatt Smith in the pastorate of a Brooklyn Congregational church. There is a scandal afloat connecting him in a ministerial capacity with Miss Ethel Bates, of Greenport, L. I. Decker is a married man.

The steamer Umbria landed 614 cabin passengers in New York last Sunday, among whom was the Rev. Dr. Parker, of London, who is talked of as Beecher's successor. Dr. Parker avers that he has not as yet been invited to preach permanently in Plymouth pulpit.



In the split between Henry George and the Socialists, the Leader, the daily Labor paper, sided with the Socialists. Most of the reporters resigned, and their places were filled with men who sympathize with the management. The Socialists started the paper, hav supported it, and now own it.

Anthony Comstock last Saturday served the newsdealers in this city with a copy of those sections of the penal code which make it a misdemeanor to sell books, papers, or pamphlets devoted to the publication of criminal news and containing pictures illustrating scenes of crime and bloodshed.

The reputation of the Rev. Mr. Glazebrook, of Elizabeth, N. J., has been damaged by his being discovered in a cemetery occupying a compromising attitude toward an unmarried lady. A number of boys who were witnesses of the transaction declare that he is guilty, and that when discovered he ran away at high speed, leaving behind him a portion of his clothing, which they secured and will put in evidence.

When the congregation of the Rev. David Seymour, Methodist, of Janesville, Minn., sent their weary pastor to Europe on a vacation a month ago, he left Mrs. Seymour at home, and took instead, as a companion, the wife of Mr. John A. Henry, editor of the Waseca county Argus. He also carried off some of the church funds. Last Saturday the guilty couple returned to America and were arrested upon landing in New York.

Two years ago John McCormack, a Catholic, of Brooklyn, married Sarah Gillespie, a Protestant, and they had one child. The mother had it baptized as a Presbyterian and the father had a Catholic priest perform the same ceremony over his offspring. Then Mrs. McCormack took the child and went home to her parents. Last week the child died, and there was a fight at the funeral over the question whether it should hav Catholic or Protestant service, but before that matter could be settled Mrs. McCormack grabbed the casket in which the body lay and hurried it off to a Protestant cemetery, where it was buried. McCormack says it shall be removed to consecrated ground, and threatens his wife with bodily harm if she interferes.

JACOB'S PECULIAR DREAM.

And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and, behold, the angels of God ascending and descending on it.—Gen. xxviii, 12.

Odds and Ends.

Mother (to daughter): "Why, my dear, you are not going to church without corsets, are you?" Daughter: "Yes, mamma. It's an ice cream festival, you know, and I want to accept all invitations. Mr. Whitechoker says the church is badly in debt."

There are beautiful associations clustering about the old family Bible. When you hav got through reading about Susannah, in the Apocrypha, you can turn to the Record, and find out that your Uncle Ebenezer was born on March 19, 1841, and was Took with the Measles July 7, 1853. There is a great deal in patient study and research.

The Cutlet said to the Mutton-chop,
"Don't you feel cut-up when you leave the shop?"
And the Chop replied, with a choking sob,
"I should feel much worse if my name were Bob;"
But the Cutlet returned, with a shrug genteel,
"Oh, that's just about as you happen to veal."

A United States official, while riding through the roads bordering the eastern edge of the Indian Territory, came upon a long-haired man sitting on a log. "Good morning, sir," said the official. "Hi." "Do you liv about here?" "Just about liv here." "You havn't any Indian blood in your veins?" "Not that I ever seed." "Then why do you liv on this reservation? Who gave you the right?" "I married a squaw." "Oh." "That's what I say." "What business are you in?" "None now." "What business were you in?" "Preachin'." "Why did you stop?" "Feller blowed up my church." "Blew up your church? What for?" "Jealousness. He's a preacher, too, an' I beat him on a revival—got more mourners than he did." "Why, I never heard before of such an outrageous affair. Tell me about it." "Wall, I built my church over on the branch, an' this feller Ab Smith built his'n on the knob. We started revivals about the same time, an' he had the edge on me, an' knowin' that something had to be did, an' that quick, I commenced to tell a lot o' yarns that I knowed would interest the young bucks an' captured the crowd. Smith he come down an' tried to get 'em away, an' at last, findin' that he couldn't do it, he slipped around one night and put powder under the house and blowed it up." "You were of different denominations, I suppose." "Of what?" "I say that you were of different churches." "Yes, I wuz o' my church an' he wuz o' his n." "But of what denomination, what creed?" "Blamed if I know." "Well, but what do you believe?" "Believe that it won't be healthy fur Ab Smith if I ketch him round here." "You don't understand. What is your faith?" "Blamed if I know." "What do you preach?" "Fust one thing and then another." "Are you a Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian——" "No, ain't none o' them." "You started a new church, I suppose." "Wall, yes, most o' the logs wuz new, but some o' them was tuck from old Andy Peterson's still house. Wall, thar warn't more than a dozen ole logs in the house, an' you mout 'av called the church new. Ab Smith's church is so green that it won't burn, an' I havn't got enough powder to blow it up, an' if you'll go over an' he'p me tear it down I'll giv you as fine a mule colt as you ever seed. Hold on a minute, hold on," said the "preacher," shading his eyes and gazing far away. "Yander comes Smith an' two o' his deacons. I ain't feelin' so mighty well, an' I b'leve I'll sorter trot a leetle fur exercise. Ever come round this way agin an' want to see a squaw so ugly that she'll set your teeth on edge, drop in and see us. Wall, good-day. Ef them fellers ax you about me, tell 'em that I ain't nowhar in the neighborhood."

THE TENDER HEART.

She gazed upon the burnished brace;
Of plump ruffed grouse he showed with pride;
Angelic grief was in her face;
"How could you do it, dear," she sighed.
"The poor, pathetic, moveless wings!
The songs all hushed—oh, cruel shame!"
Said he: "The partridge never sings."
Said she: "The sin is quite the same—

"You men are savage through and through.
A boy is always bringing in
Some strings of birds' eggs, white and blue,
Or butterfly upon a pin.
The angleworm in anguish dies,
Impaled the pretty trout to tease—"
"My own, I fish for trout with flies—"
"Don't wander from the question, please!"

She quoted Burns's "Wounded Hare,"
And certain burning lines of Blake's,
And Ruskin on the fowls of air,
And Coleridge on the water snakes.
At Emerson's "Forbearance" he Began to feel his will benumbed;
At Browning's "Donald" utterly
His soul surrendered and succumbed.

"Oh, gentlest of all gentle girls,"
He thought, "beneath the blessed sun!"
He saw her lashes hung with pearls,
And swore to giv away his gun.
She smiled to find her point was gained,
And went with happy parting words
(He subsequently ascertained)
To trim her hat with humming-birds.

Gems of Thought.

There is no mysterious and fickle ruler of the universe who is swayed around and influenced by the prayers and supplications of short-sighted, ignorant human beings to change his plans and purposes, and the quicker men become apprized of this truth the better it will be for them, and they can learn to spend their time more profitably than in offering up to an imaginary being prayers which can hav no effect.—D. M. Bennett.

Abraham would scarcely break his fast for a week, lest some hungry traveler might pass who needed his store. Daily he looked out upon the desert, and one day he beheld an aged man, with hair white as snow, tottering toward his door. "Guest of mine eyes!" exclaimed Abraham, "enter with welcome, and be pleased to share my bread and salt." The stranger entered, and the place of honor was given to him. When the family gathered round the board, each one of them said, "In the name of God!" but the aged guest uttered no word. Abraham said: "Old man, when thou eatest food is it not right to repeat the name of God!" The stranger replied: "My custom is that of the fire-worshipers." Then Abraham arose in wrath, and drove the aged man from his house. But, even as he did so, a swift-winged spirit stood before the patriarch, and said: "Abraham, for a hundred years hath the divine bounty flowed out to this man in sunshine and rain, in bread and life. Is it fit for thee to withhold thy hand from him because his worship is not thine?"—Saadi.

Luther and his Protestantism is not responsible for wars; the false simulacra that forced him to protest—they are responsible. Luther did what every man that God has made has not only the right, but lies under the sacred duty to do—answered a falsehood when it questioned him, Dost thou believe me? No. At what cost soever, without counting of costs, this thing behooved to be done. Union, organization, spiritual and material, a far nobler than any popedom or feudalism, in their truest days, I never doubt is coming for the world; sure to come. But on fact alone, nor on semblance and simulacrum, will it be able either to come or to stand when come. With union grounded on falsehood, and ordering us to speak and act lies, we will not hav anything to do. Peace? A brutal lethargy is peaceable, the noisome grave is peaceable. We hope for a living peace, not a dead one.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

"Marriage is nothing," said cousin Sepia to Hester, "so long as you do not make a heart affair of it." "Marriage is nothing, Sepia! Is it nothing to be tied to a man—to any man—for all your life?" "That is as you take it. Nobody makes so much of it nowadays as they used to do. The clergy themselvs, who are at the bottom of all the busines, don't fuss about every trifle in the prayer book. They sign the articles and hav done with it—meaning, of course, to break them if they stand in their way."—Macdonald's Mary Marston.

Rev. A. L. Blackford, a Presbyterian missionary at Bohia, says of Dom Pedro: "The emperor of Brazil is nominally a Roman Catholic for state reasons, but is generally understood to be an Infidel or Rationalist of an advanced type. When visiting the Presbyterian mission school in St. Paulo, a year or two ago, he declared very distinctly that he was opposed to all dogmatical religious instruction in schools." [Small blame to Dom Pedro! May he liv forever, and may his shadow never grow less!—Hylax.]

What though on hamely fare we dine,
Wear hodden-gray, and a' that?
Gie fools their silks, and knaves their wine;
A man's a man for a' that. —Burns.

There is no room for you on this crowded earth, my friend, unless you can contribute your quota toward cleansing and rendering more habitable the corner of it wherein you hav taken lodgment. The man who never acts is a mere parasite on the body of society. Inactivity is the straight road to impotence, and eventually to annihilation. The consequence is, we must exert ourselvs. Our watchword must be "Reform;" reform in person and in mass, individual reform and social reform.—Henry Harland.

Men insist on believing and on having other people believe certain doctrins, not because they are reasonably demonstrated to be true, but because, in the present state of things, it would be dangerous to giv them up. This is the way in which one man clings to his idea of verbal inspiration, and another to his special theory of the divine justice, and another to his material notion of the resurrection, and yet another to his notion of church authority and the minister's commission. . . . Never sacrifice your reverence for truth to your desire for usefulness. Say nothing which you do not believe to be true, because you think it may be harmful. . . . He is saved from one of the great temptations of the ministry who goes out to his work with a clear and constant certainty that truth is always strong, no matter how weak it looks, and falsehood is always weak, no matter how strong it looks.—Phillips Brooks.

A popular Bible should be at once portable and of fair, clear type; and, to make this possible, a large part of the Old Testament should be omitted from the editions of the future. Not only are the laws of the Mosaic state repealed and dead, and therefore unworthy of a place in this guide of the public, but they are the laws of a semi-barbarous age, and cast no little of their imperfection over upon the fair pages of the New Testament. The New Testament has suffered much from thus being found in bad company. Those treatises are valuable as being a part of the history of the Jewish state, but not as being a part, much less a valuable part, of Christianity. Many of the Hebrew laws were so unjust that their presence in the popular Bible makes it essential that each clergyman and each Sunday-school teacher shall spend much time in explaining the relation of Mosaic things to Christian affairs, an explanation to be made easier by a withdrawal of the cause.—David Swing.

Notes and Clippings.

"BULLY, if True," is the head line which the editor of a paper in Crete, Neb., prints over the announcement that the pastor of the Congregational church will not preach for a month.

VERNON (Texas) Guard: "It is a mighty good thing to be always at class meeting, attend church regularly, sing loud, and pray yourself hoarse; but it is a good deal better to be moral, upright, and honest in business and social relations."

IT is reported that a negro woman living near Sunny Side, Ga., has two children—a boy and a girl. The girl she named "I will arise and go to my father," but calls her "I willer," for short. The boy's name is "Only begotten son, in whom I am well pleased," but he is called "Only."

CAPTAIN LEROY, late leader of the Salvation Army in St. Paul, well known as "Happy Harry," and a vigorous exhorter and tambourine-player, has given up evangelizing and now is a waiter in a variety theater in New York city. He serves beer with great skill, and says that there's more money in that work than in trying to convert folks.

MR. MOODY is reported as saying that he was in favor of a whole holiday on Saturday at this season, and there would be no excuse for Sunday excursions and Sunday newspapers. As to the influence of Sunday papers he is said to hav said: "You can't pound a sermon into a man with a sledgehammer after he has got through reading one of those Sunday papers."

THE great American Hellbender, the Rev. Sam Jones, said, in his recent revival at Plattsburg, Mo.: "When the Democracy put into their platform that they are opposed to all sumptuary laws, it was time for me to get out." Get, Samuel, and until you get a little sense don't come back.—Sun.

THE people of Brooklyn say that the Salvation Army barracks maintained in Harrison street is a nuisance, and hav asked the authorities to abate it. The army's defense is that people may worship God in any way they choose. The people deny that the Salvation Army is a religious organization.

THE church bells of this city are a great nuisance, but New Yorkers are much better off than the folks in Spain, which is one of the most devout countries under the sun. Ninety thousand belis send forth their summons to prayers from the steeples of 24,000 churches. The weight of these bells amounts to something like 95,000,000 Spanish pounds, and the value to about 10,000,000 francs.

A TEXAS newspaper, in looking over the political field, finds this extraordinary richness in parties. The journal says: "No American suffers for lack of parties with which to align himself. The assortment is new and specially arranged to suit all tastes. If he is not inclined to Democracy, Republicanism, or independence, he can throw himself into the United Labor party, of which Mr. George was the leader; the Socialistic Labor party, an old organization; the new social Labor party, the Central Labor, the Anti-Poverty Society, the trades unions—all distinct political entities—the Knights of Labor, the Amalgamated Association, the Brotherhood, the Wheel, the Grange, and last, and least, the Prohibitionists." But why leave out the Greenbackers?

THE other day thirty Roman Catholic bishops and some hundreds of priests assembled at Chattillon sur Marne, France, to witness the unveiling of a statue to Pope Urban II. The Weekly Register says the ecclesiastics assembled "to honor and perpetuate the memory of this saintly Pontiff." The London Freethinker thinks worth while to cite an item of the saintly pontifical teaching of Urban II., which forms part of the canon law to this day: "We judge that they are not murderers who, burning with zeal for their Catholic Mother against the excommunicated, should happen to kill any of them."

THE Protestants and Catholics of Ulster, says the London Freethinker, hav indulged in still further manifestations of the Christian spirit. The annual excursion of Catholic Foresters from Belfast to Portrush provoked most serious riots. A clergyman was shot in the leg while proceeding to his church to conduct divine service, and several other persons were severely wounded. At Ballymoney Station shots were fired from the train, and a young man was shot in the chest and has since expired. Portrush was kept in a state of constant uproar by crowds of Orangemen, who attacked the excursionists. Many persons were injured on both sides by stones and bottles, but the police succeeded in preventing more serious disasters. The return home was made lively by a battle of stones and bottles and bullets at every station. Nearly all the carriage windows were smashed. When the excursionists left the train at Belfast and got into cars, the Orangemen continued to pelt them, but the police were in sufficient strength to prevent more murderous attacks. These Irish Christians delight in showing the pacifying influence of Christianity whenever they get a chance. If it were not for the military and police, they would probably hav exterminated each other by this time.

THE Industrial Appeal says: "The most discouraging and exasperating item that we see in the newspapers nowadays is, in substance, if not in the exact language, as follows: 'The pope has signified to the priests and bishops of this country that he will not inferfere with the organization known as the Knights of Labor.' To a true-born American citizen who is not tangled up in the grievous toils of auy religion whatever, this is disgusting in the extreme. What possible excuse can the average American citizen offer for going to anyone, much less an obscure, senil, would-be religious potentate, in an obscure corner of a moribund kingdom of Europe, for advice in social or economic reforms. There never can be any progress in this country until the people hav developed sufficient common-sense and independence to utterly scorn any interference with their rights and consciences from any quarter whatever. No man who is not an abject slave to superstition will allow even the appearance of the impertinent interference of a middle-man between him and his God, especially on political questions, and we honor Dr. McGlynn more than we can express for his manly contempt of the pope's fulmination. Just as soon as we can get a person to believe and know that popes and bishops hav not a particle more influence with God than he has himself, then we can begin the work of reform."

II.—Mental Maxims.

CHAPTER VII.—INDEPENDENCE.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

If the scale of precedence in the mental development of our fellow-creatures can be determined by any single test, that test is the instinctive love of Independence. Many of the lower animals may surprise us by constructive achievements that rival the products of human science, but their instinct of freedom is quite imperfectly developed. The caterpillar of the silk-moth will spin its satin winter-gown in a box full of mulberry leaves as skilfully as in the freedom of the tropical forests. In the hive of their captor a swarm of wild bees will continue to build hexagons and store up honey as diligently as in the rocks or hollow trees of the wilderness. Captive river-fish will eat and pair a day after their transfer to a fish-pond. Birds, on the other hand, mourn their lost liberty for weeks. During the first half-month of its captivity, a caged hawk rarely accepts any food; sea-birds and eagles starve with a persistence as if they were thus trying to end an affliction from which they see no other way of escape. Wild cows can be domesticated in a month; wild elephants hardly in a year. Several species of the larger carnivora can be trained only if caught in their cub-hood, as in after years they become almost wholly untamable. The lower varieties of quadrumana, the Brazilian capuchin monkeys and East Indian macaques, seem almost to invite capture by the frequency of their visits to the neighborhood of human dwellings, while the apes proper are, without any exception, the shyest creatures of the virgin woods. The gorilla is so rarely seen in the vicinity of human settlements that its very existence was long considered doubtful. Sir Stamford Raffles asserts that at the distant sound of an ax the orang of Sumatra at once abandons its favorite haunts in the coast jungles. On the west coast of Borneo a large orang was once surprised by the crew of an English trading-vessel, but fought with a desperation that obliged its would-be captors to riddle it with rifle-balls, though they knew that a living specimen of that size would be worth its weight in silver.

That same resolution in defense of their liberties has always distinguished the nobler from the baser tribes of the human race. The natives of the Gambia Valley have no hesitation in selling their relatives to the Portuguese slave-traders, while the liberation of a single countryman (whom the enemy had determined to hold as a hostage) impelled the Circassian highlanders to risk their lives in a series of desperate assaults upon the ramparts of a Russian frontier post. The hope of covering the retreat of their fleeing wives and children inspired the heroes of Thermopylæ to make a stand against six thousand fold odds. The crimps of the Christian church-despots found no difficulty in foisting their yoke upon the former vassals of the Roman empire, but when they attempted to cross the border of the Saxon Landmark, the kidnappers were slain like rabid wolves; and when the neighboring ruffian-counts, and at last Charlemagne in person, marched to the support of the clerical slave-hunters, they met with a resistance the record of which will forever remain the proudest page in the chronicle of the Germanic races. Cornfields were burnt, villages were leveled with the ground; for hundreds of miles the means of human subsistence were utterly destroyed; but the council of the Saxon chieftains refused to submit, and when the homes of their forefathers were devastated, they carried their children to the inaccessible wilds of the Hartz highlands, where they grimly welcomed the aid of the winter snows, and defied frost and starvation, rather than crawl to cross (zu kreuze kriechen), as their vernacular stigmatized the cowardice of their crucifix-kissing neighbors. And when the Frankish autocrat had shackled their land with a chain of forts, they thrice rebelled with persistent disregard of consequences; nay, after the loss of the last murderous battle, the prisoners of war refused to accept the ultimatum of the conqueror, and rather than crawl to cross four thousand of their captive noblemen mounted the scaffold of the executioner on the market-square of Quedlinburg. The bodies of the heroes were thrown to the birds of the wilderness; but their deathless spirits revived in the philippics of Martin Luther and the battle-shout of Luetzen and Oudenarde, and will yet ride the storm destined to hurl the last cross from the temples of the Germanic nations.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

Since the dawn of history the lands of freedom have produced fruits and flowers that refused to thrive on any other soil. For several centuries civilization was confined to a small country of republics: Attic and Theban Greece. "Study the wonders of that age," says Byron to his friend Trelawney, "and compare them with the best ever done under masters." Switzerland, in spite of its rocky soil, has for centuries been the happiest, as well as the freest, country of Europe. The prosperity of the United States of America, since the establishment of their independence, stands unparalleled in the history of the last eighteen hundred years; and, moreover, the degree of that prosperity has been locally proportioned to the degree of social freedom, and has begun to become general only since the general abolition of slavery. Freedom blesses the poorest soil, as despotism blights the most fertile, and it is only an apparent exception from that rule that Italy continued to flourish during the first two centuries of the empire. The change in the form of government was at first nominal, rather than real, and under the rule of Augustus, Trajan, Hadrian, and the Antonines, Rome enjoyed more real liberty than many a so-called republic of modern times. When despotism became a systematic and chronic actuality, the sun of fortune was soon eclipsed, and the social climate became as unfavorable to art and literature as to valor and patriotism.

Personal independence is a not less essential condition of individual happiness. Bondage in any form, and of silken or gilded, as well as of iron, fetters, is incompatible with the development of the highest mental and moral faculties. The genius of Poland and modern Italy has produced its best fruit in exile. The progress of modern civilization dates only from the time when knowledge once more flourished in a Republic of Letters; and for a thousand years the monastery system of medieval literature produced hardly a single work of genius. Within the period of the last three or four generations the sun of freedom has ripened better and more abundant fruit in any single decade than the dungeon-air of despotism during a series of centuries. All foreign travelers agree in admiring (or condemning) the early mental development of American children, who have a chance to exercise their intellectual faculties in an area untrammeled by the barriers of caste divisions and social restraints. They may yield to the pupils of the best European colleges in special branches of scholarship, but in common sense, general intelligence, general information, in self-respect, in practical versatility, and self-dependence, an American boy of twelve is, as a rule, more than a match for a continental-European boy of sixteen; and the same holds good of the average intelligence and self-dependence of our country population. With the rarest exceptions the political economists of our Southern states agree that the agricultural negro as a freeman is a more valuable laborer than as a slave, and that emancipation, in the long run, has benefited the planter as well as his serf. I venture even to add the verdict of Professor Hagenbeck, the founder of the great zoölogical supply depot, that menagerie-trainers of the least despotic methods are the most successful. Turf-men know that the best horses do not come from the unequaled perennial pastures of the lower Danube, but from England and Araby, where pet colts enjoy almost the freedom of a pet child.

C.—PERVERSION.

The ethics of Anti-naturalism include the Buddhistic doctrine of self-abasement, as an indispensable condition of salvation. That salvation meant extinction, the utter renunciation of earthly hopes and desires, the mortification of all natural instincts, including the instinct of freedom. Abject submission to injustice, the subordination of reason to dogma, the sinfulness of rebellion against the "powers that be," were inculcated with a zeal that made the church an invaluable ally of despotism. For centuries a scepter combining the form of a cross and a bludgeon was the significant emblem of tyranny. With the aid, nay, in the name, of the Christian hierarchy, the despots of the Middle Ages elaborated a system of subordination of personal freedom to autocratic caprices, which, by comparison, makes the tyranny of the Cæsars a model of liberalism. Every important function of social and domestic life was subjected to the control of arbitrary functionaries, armed with irresponsible power or with a system of oppressive penal by-laws. Censors suppressed every symptom of visible or audible protest. Every school was a prison, every judgment-seat a star-chamber. Peasants and mechanics had no voice in the councils of their rulers. The merit of official employees was measured by the degree of their flunkeyism. But the ne plus-ultras of physical and moral despotism were combined in the slavery of the monastic convents. The attempt of reviving the outrages which abbots for centuries practiced on the unfortunates whom a rash vow (or often the mandate of a bigoted parent) had submitted to their power, would certainly expose the manager of a modern convent to the risk of being mobbed and torn limb from limb. Novices were subjected to all sorts of wanton tortures and arbitrary deprivation of his scant privileges; they were compelled to perform shameful and ridiculous acts of self-abasement, all merely to "break their wordly spirit," i. e., crush out the last vestige of self-respect and life-love, in order to prepare them for the consolations of other-worldliness. The moral emasculation of the human race seems, indeed, to have been the main purpose of the educational policy which the priests of the Nature-hating Galilean pursued wherever the union of Church and State put children and devotees at the mercy of their dogmatists.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

Voluntary slavery means voluntary renunciation of the chief privilege of human reason: the privilege of self-control. The spendthrift divests himself of external advantages; the miser yields up his life-blood for gold; but he who surrenders his personal liberty has sold his soul, as well as his body. Bondage circumscribes every sphere of activity. Political despotism impedes the progress of industry as galling fetters impede the circulation of the blood. Enterprising autocrats of the Frederic and Peter type have as utterly failed in the attempt of enforcing a flourishing state of commerce, as they would have failed in the attempt of enforcing the growth of a stunted tree by the tension of iron chains. In free America a voluntary pledge of abstinence has accomplished what in medieval Europe the most Draconic temperance and anti-tobacco laws failed to achieve.

The educational despotism of moral pedants has ever defeated its own purpose, and succeeded only in turning frank, merry-souled children into hypocrites and sneaks. The idea that a barbarous system of military discipline could develop model warriors has been refuted on hundreds of battle-fields, where the machine-soldiers of despotic kings were routed by the onset of enthusiastic patriots, half-trained, perhaps, and ill-armed, but assembled by an enlistment of souls as well as of bodies. The unparalleled intellectual barrenness of the Middle Ages was well explained by the indictment of a modern English poet. "The bondage of the Christian doctrine," says Percy Shelley, "is fatal to the development of originality and genius." The curse of mediocrity has, indeed, for ages rested upon every literary product devoted to the promotion of clerical interests. The Muses refuse to assemble on Golgotha. Pegasus declines to be yoked with the ass of the Galilean ascetic. Outspoken skepticism is almost as rare as true genius, and it is not possible to mistake the significance of the fact that the great poets and philosophers of the last seven generations were, almost without an exception, persistent and outspoken skeptics. Rousseau, Voltaire, Diderot, D'Alembert, Holbach, Leibnitz, Lessing, Kant, Fichte, Hegel, Schiller, Heine, Schopenhauer, Humboldt, Pope, Hume, Byron, Shelley, Keats, Gibbon, Buckle, and Darwin have all inscribed their names in the temple of Liberalism; and Wolfgang Goethe, the primate of European literature, was at once the most consistent and the most anti-Christian of modern thinkers. "His personal appearance," says Heinrich Heine, "was as harmonious as his mind. A proudly erect body, never yet bent by Christian worm-humility; classic features, never distorted by Christian contrition; eyes that had never been dimmed by Christian sinner-tears or the apathy of monkish resignation."

That resignation was for centuries enforced as the first of moral duties; but Nature has had her revenge, and even the fallen hierarchy would hesitate to recover the loss of their prestige by a return to the moral desert which for ages marked the empire of a mind-enslaving dogma.

E.—REFORM.

Not all slaves can be freed by breaking their shackles; the habit of servitude may become a hereditary vice, too inveterate for immediate remedies. The pupils of Freedom's school may be required to unlearn, as well as to learn, many lessons; the temples of the future will have to remove several aphoristic tablets to make room for such mottoes as "Self-Reliance," "Liberty," "Independence." Victor Jacquemont tells a memorable story of a Hindoo village, almost depopulated by a famine caused by the depredations of sacred monkeys, that made constant raids on the fields and gardens of the superstitious peasants, who would see their children starve to death rather than lift a hand against the long-tailed saints. At last the British stadtholder saw a way to relieve their distress. He called a meeting of their sirdars and offered them free transportation to a monkey-less island of the Malay archipelago. Learning that the land of the proposed colony was fertile and thinly settled, the survivors accepted the proposal with tears of gratitude; but when the band of gaunt refugees embarked at the mouth of the Hooglyn, the stadtholder's agent was grieved to learn that their cargo of household goods included a large cageful of sacred monkeys. "They are beyond human help," says the official memorandum, "and their children can be redeemed only by curing them of the superstition that has ruined their monkey-ridden ancestors."

At the end of the fifteenth century, when southern Europe was in danger of a similar fate from the rapacity of esurient priests and monks, Providence, by means of an agent called Christoval Columbus, offered the victims the chance of a free land of refuge; but when the host of emigrants embarked at the harbor of Palos, philosophers must have been grieved to perceive that their cargo of household-pets comprised a large assortment of ecclesiastics. "They are beyond human help," Experience might sigh in the words of the British commissioner, "and their children can be redeemed only by curing them of the superstition that has proved the ruin of their priest-ridden ancestors."

In regions of our continent where colonists might live as independent as the birds of their primeval forests, bondage has been imported in the form of an intriguing hierarchy, working its restless bellows to forge the chains of their pupils—of the rising generation, who as yet seem to hesitate at the way-fork of Feudalism and Reform. A timely word may decide their choice. and, by all the remaining hopes of Earth and Mankind! that word shall not remain unspoken.

Did Jesus Call Himself Christ?

Back of the pulpit of the Unitarian church in Washington, in large gilt letters, are these words:

That they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.

This text would be a pretty conclusiv one in support of Unitarianism if it were not a manifest figment of the brain of the clerical crank who fabricated the fourth gospel. In chapter xiii he describes the last supper, which was not the paschal feast or eucharist, but an ordinary meal, one whole day "before the feast of the Passover." After supper Jesus makes a long address to his disciples, fully reported in four chapters. Then follows a prayer, reported verbatim in chapter xvii. And this, by the way, appears to be the nearest approach to a public prayer by the man who claimed to be the son of God, and who said:

When thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrits are; for they love to pray standing in the synagogs and in the corners of the streets that they may be seen of men. . . . But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door pray to thy father which is in secret.

The first part of the long discourse of Jesus in the fourth gospel is about his betrayal. The disciples wonder who the betrayer shall be. He dips a sop and givs it to Judas saying, "That thou doest, do quickly." What was that sop? In all the Greek codices it is psomion, "a small morsel." In the Peshito or Syriac codex it is simply "bread," so also in the Latin Vulgate. And as no mention of wine is made in the fourth gospel the probability would be that the bread was dipped in gravy.

Judas goes out. The remaining disciples wonder what for. Some think it is to buy things needful for the feast of the Passover to be eaten the next evening; others think he is going to giv something to the poor. Jesus resumes his discourse, and when it is ended lifts his eyes and says to his father in heaven:

The hour is come; glorify thy son that thy son may glorify thee, as thou hast given him power over all flesh that he should giv eternal life to as many as thou hast given him. And this is life eternal, that they may know thee the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.

Nowhere else does Jesus speak of himself as Christ. When Simon Peter ventured to say, "Thou art the Christ," Jesus charged his disciples to "tell no man that thing." Conceding that he believed he was a special messenger of God to accomplish a divine purpose, was it not utterly absurd for him, in an address to his father in heaven, to call himself Jesus Christ?

Christos in Greek is the equivalent of Meshiha in Aramaic, which was the language of Palestine, and means "anointed." It was a very significant term. Priests and kings were anointed, but when and where was that ceremony performed on Jesus? Only at a supper in Bethany two days before his death, when a woman came in and poured the contents of an alabaster-box of precious ointment upon his head (Matt. xxvi, 7; Mark xiv, 3). The fourth gospel says this woman was Mary, the sister of Martha who served the table, and that she did not pour the ointment on the head of Jesus, but upon his feet, wiping them with her hair (xii, 3). But whether the anointing was of the head or the feet of Jesus, all three evangelists agree that it was for his burial.

The third gospel is silent about this anointing, but strangely enough describes a similar one at an early period of the ministry of Jesus. He was dining with a Pharisee, in the city of Nain, when a woman came weeping at his feet, and after washing them with her tears, kissing, and wiping them with the hair of her head, she poured ointment upon them from an alabaster-box (Luke vii, 38). But this woman, unlike the one described by the other three evangelists, was a "sinner," who straightway obtained absolution for her many sins.

The supper described by Luke was at the house of a Pharisee named Simon; that described by Matthew and Mark was at the house of Simon the leper—another coincidence, suggestiv of a want of information on the part of Luke.

This is all we know about any anointing of Jesus, and no one will pretend that it was such as to bestow upon him the name or title of Meshiha or Christos. Nor will any rational man believe that Jesus ever called himself the anointed, either in addressing his disciples or his father in heaven.

San Luis Park, Colorado.

Answers to questions will be my aim in this article. A stream of letters from Liberals, full of queries, indicate that Freethinkers are truly interested in "one world at a time," and they appear to be willing to own anywhere from a quarter section to a square mile of the best part of that. In my next article I will gather all the "Disadvantages of San Luis." What people need is the plain, unvarnished truth about any new region. As I hold that a Liberal ought to tell the truth at all hazards, the readers of these articles shall hav it. I am not a real estate agent, and hav no corner lots for sale. This last sentence is not intended to cast any reflections upon terra firma brokers, but to giv my correspondents confidence.

How cold does the weather get there in the winter time?

To my California friend I answer: Last winter the cold was as low as 28° below zero, but not in the day time. The days are sunny and warm all winter through, with now and then an exception; are from 20° to 30° warmer than the nights or early morning. The five coldest days known here were in January last. The temperature ranged 19°, 22°, 24°, 28°. The lowest temperature in February was 7° below zero in the night. From zero to 14° above is the lowest temperature, as a rule. November weather ranges from 5° below to 29° above zero at 7 A.M. At 2 P.M, 35° to 52° above. I was here in December, the last days, and rode in an open buggy sixty miles over the valley. Coldest days 4° below zero. Usual range, 12° to 37° above at 7 A.M. At 2 P M uniform between 32° to 48° above zero. Very little snow falls in the valley. No heavy frosts later than May 1st, nor earlier than September 20th.

The hottest days this summer, an unusually hot season, were 92°. Average mid-day heat less than 80°. Cool nights. Pair of blankets and comforter every night, except one, when comforter only was omitted.

However hot the days, there are cool gusts from the snow-capped mountains. As I am writing, Aug. 24th, old Sierra Blanca yonder is covered with a fresh supply of snow, which came yesterday; but in our lower region came in the form of copious and cool showers of rain. Ordinarily this is a very dry climate. The number of sunshine days, one year with another, are 320 out of 365.

To sum up, San Luis Park, 65 miles wide, 160 long, protected by vast mountain ranges, in form similar to a horse-shoe, with the opening on the south toward New Mexico, at one time supposed to be too elevated, 7,500 feet above sea level, too dry, too cold, to be valuable, except as an immense cattle range, turns out to hav a milder climate, more uniform, less extreme cold, than the country from Chicago due Westward through Nebraska. It is the best horse and cattle growing country in the world. The free ranges in the mountains surrounding the Park are practically limitless. I am writing these letters specially for the benefit of my Liberal friends. Let me say, then, that the Liberal who will put a few hundred dollars, or two or three thousand, into horses and cattle will get rich within a few years, and will bless that Infidel Jamieson for letting his light shine. To the young, enterprising, ambitious Liberal, who has his or her way to carve, who wishes to be successful in life (and who does not?), let me say to you, who are not above honest labor, here is your chance. Avail yourself of these grand mountain ranges, free as the air you breathe. Too young, are you? In this very Park are two boys aged twelve and fourteen, who, with their shepherd dogs, take care of three thousand sheep. Day and night those shepherd boys tend the flock, sleep in a covered wagon, cook their own meals, seven miles from home, their father bringing them a supply of provisions once a week. There's true grit for you. My young Liberal, are you looking for a business opening? Thousands of miles for horse and cattle range, not a cent to pay for food, free grazing nine or ten months out of the year.

Will wheat, oats, barley, grow in this mountain valley?

Yes, the best I ever saw.

Is there much government land?

More than one hundred thousand acres.

A Zaleski, O., friend writes me, "being confident you will try to answer my questions correctly:"

Is there sufficient rain-fall to produce good crops in the Park?

No.

What crops can be grown?

Wheat, oats, barley, millet, alfalfa, etc.

Are there hard wind storms?

In the spring there are high winds; but there has never been a cyclone or a blizzard here as far as known.

Is the country prairie, or timbered?

Prairie, covered with greasewood and chico.

Is coal or wood burnt, and where is it procured?

Wood, plenty. Greasewood all over the valley; pinon and red cedar from the mountains. The first free; pinon and cedar $3 to $4 a cord.

Is the country well watered?

Soft water six to fourteen feet from the surface.

Is your town on a railroad?

Monte Vista, our nearest village, fifteen miles distant, is a railroad town.

Does the altitude of the Park cause heart trouble in middle-aged persons, or those naturally with weak hearts?

Yes.

Do you think consumptivs are benefited by that climate?

Yes; I think it is the best on the habitable globe for consumptivs.

Hav you many Liberals?

No.

Monte Vista, Col. W. F. JAMIESON.

Wonderful Absurdities.

Look on this picture! There goes, along the sidewalk, old John Inventor, one of the wonders of all ages. On his back he carries a vessel filled with his absolute and unfailing fire-extinguisher. Its potency is marvelous; one moment of that gas, and the elements combining in combustion are separated by stronger affinities, and fire is instantly changed to drops of refreshing water, and stifling smoke clears up into pure air. He comes to the residence of a citizen, and wild cries of agony appal sensitiv ears. At the windows above there are crowded a dozen human beings, yelling, moaning, demanding help to escape. The whole lower story is crackling with flames, the rising smoke is suffocating—five minutes more and those imprisoned mortals will die, and their bodies will feed the flames. Old John casts an eye up to the horrid scene. A step to the window, a one-quarter turn of that stop-cock, and an ounce of that gas would subdue the fiercest blaze, and father and family are saved. No! not a bit of it. On goes old John, leaving all to certain destruction and a horrible death. What shall we do with old John for his fiendish inhumanity? Why, a Christian mob took him out and hanged him high as Haman. Now, these bloody Christians had an all-wise, loving, kind, salvation-giving (through faith), and omniscient God who was present at that fire as well as old John. He had the power; he made the world in an hour, and he could make a small Noah's flood in the twinkling of an eye.

It cannot but be that there is no such God, sitting with a sparrow in his hand. No merciful creator would, with power present in his will, suffer the burning ship to go down, and yet there are men of ordinary good sense teaching their children a mess of blasphemous nonsense about an almighty God. "Why don't men think?" The argument is unanswerable—there does not exist a Christian God, with oversight over all, treasuring up every action of humanity to be brought forward in judgment. A perfect God could not exist alongside of such evils and miseries of his family and not put the evils away. A perfect God could not make and maintain an all-powerful devil. What an absurdity is this Christian system, invented by designing man for the propagation and maintenance of power and profit! It will continue while men are ignorant—the more ignorant, the better picking for priests.

There is a power existent, an unknown and incomprehensible power. Under this power things hav always moved on, and will eternally move on—no let up; no cessation; no stoppage to hav a judgment of the action of men; no fool boy's-play of making man and then tormenting him in all eternity simply because he exists, and that without his own consent. What a batch of contemptible absurdities can be propagated to enslave mankind!

I hav just been reading Judge Waite's "History of Christianity During the First Two Centuries." It is appalling to think how little the average Christian knows of the origin, growth, and absurdity of the religion of Christ. The New Testament gospels are only a lot of unfathered, heterogeneous jumbles of rubbish that were made by different men during the first two centuries. The proof is positiv, and the presumption great, that the old Roman church has doctored the matter up in its own interest from time to time. Many of the gospels written early, and that were used by the first congregations, are lost. The four canonical gospels of the present day were forged well-nigh two hundred years after Christ. It is marvelous to learn how many gospels were written at the start. The early church had gospels enough to load a car, but designing men, such as to-day are given place and a big salary to deceive the people, destroyed tons of gospels, and arranged a few for power and "revenue only." No one knows who the authors were. The gospels are guessed off "according to Matthew," "according to Mark," etc. And yet the deception goes on; ignorant man is still terrorized with the fear of purgatory, hell, excommunication, and all the other silly anathemas of the infernal priesthood. The chief pursuits of the ancients were "religion and war." They went together. With a sword in one hand, and a "revealed gospel" in the other, with a "Thus saith the Lord" coming from their mouths, a scurvy set of rapscallions raced over the earth, killing, debauching, and robbing till blood and ashes were as common as noxious weeds. And yet we hav this gigantic scheme of plunder held up as the great civilizer of the world. O Absurdity, Absurdity! thy vassals are many. JOHN BUSHEL.

Call for the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are wanted to attend the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held at Chicago, October 15th and 16th.

The Congress will be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs—the President and Secretary and three delegates. All charter-members and life-members, all Vice Presidents, all Chairmen of state Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats, but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada who can will be present.

Per order Board of Directors:

News and Notes.

Goldendale does not answer much to the music of its name. It is one of the most orthodox places I hav struck. It is twelve miles from the railroad and one hundred years behind the times. The blue laws of Connecticut are still rampant in its political control, and there is a mental stagnation which is simply death-like. If I had not been in the genial society of "Uncle Hank," as they call him, I do not know if I could hav withstood the frigid temperature of this "world before the flood." But friend Young has kept the battle a-going for over a quarter of a century, and overflows with vitality. It is impossible to conquer him. Like General Zach. Taylor, he never knows when he is whipped. The orthodox hav prayed mightily that he might depart, but he is with them still, and is likely to be until victory shines for Freethought.

He owns the hall in which the lectures were given, and with this fort at our command we kept the fight up from Friday until Monday evening. We had fair audiences, and friends came from a distance. The ground has been broken and there is chance for better work hereafter. Mr. Young and his family are stalwart Liberals, and with these are James Parrett, the Andersons and their families, Charles Morris, Thomas Stapleton, etc., and sometime this stronghold of ecclesiasticism will feel the breath of civilization and know that the world moves on. Goldendale is too beautiful a place to be enthralled by the "Dark Ages." Its shining fields and glittering hills shall sound with freedom's happy voice.

Over the dusty hights we travel again to the broad Columbia. An all-night ride brings us eastward to Union, a quiet place that feels no boom, and hence is devoid of excitement and tumult. It is beautifully situated in Grand Round Valley. Ample and fruitful harvest lands are about it, radiant with the smiles of summer, and mingling pictures of gold and green. Noble hills inclose the expanding vale, and beyond tower the snowy peaks. Union missed the railroad by about three miles, and hence its quietude. However, its citizens hav raised nearly $100 000 for a woollen mill, and the prospects are that Union will resound with the march of progress. I had two meetings here and a good attendance, although the ortho dox ministers held a solemn conclave and decided not to go themselvs, and to advise all good Christians to stay away for fear that their minds might be poisoned by the argument of the Infidel. One minister, however, had the courage to come the first night, and risk his soul's salvation for the sake of a little knowledge of what the Freethinkers are doing. He is said to be quite liberal for a clergyman, and so I hope for a fair report. Without doubt he will accept everything I declared as true, and then label it Christianity.

I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Thompson. Mrs. Thompson, a little while ago, was a member of the Methodist church, but the reading of Thomas Paine has made her an enthusiastic Liberal. Messrs. A. R. Jones and Geo. E. Owen, of the Oregon Scout, are editors who dare to speak their mind. They hav been so bold in some of their criticisms that a clergyman sued them for ten thousand dollars damages, but the jury acquitted the editors on the ground that what they said was true, and should hav been exposed. Clergymen seem to think they can be dishonest, and no one has a right to criticise. They want the "benefit of clergy" on every occasion. They don't yet realize that they are living in a free country. J. B. Eaton, Judge E. C. Brainard, S. A. Pursel, D. P. McDaniels, E. E. Vincent, J. C. Summers, N. Tartar, J. R. Foster, E. H. Miller, etc., are friends in Union who made our stay most pleasant, and our work full of promis for the future.

Friday we came on to bright and thriving Baker City in Powder River Valley, about thirty-five miles eastward of Union. Here I find one of the best points of my whole tour. Large audiences greeted me, several hundred being present at each lecture. There are some live workers here in this place who are bound to win in spite of all odds. A temperance revival in the "name of Jesus" had just been sweeping the town before my arrival, and about nine hundred names secured for the pledge. It was announced that I had come to destroy all this good work, and I suppose many thought that I was the devil himself. The people, however, were surprised when they found that Infidelity accepted every good thing, just so far as it was really good and for the welfare of humanity; that it overthrew only the wrong and accepted all the right "on heathen or on Christian grounds."

On Sunday our meetings were full and enthusiastic, and a Secular Union was formed with nearly a hundred members, and I believe it will do a noble work for Baker county and Eastern Oregon.

Baker City—named after Colonel Baker of illustrious memory—is in the midst of a good farming and stock country, and the mountains about it are freighted with the precious metals, and extensiv mills are being built. Baker City, as the center of all this business enterprise, has a promising career and will be a chief town of Eastern Oregon.

Wesley T. Miller, who is one of the correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has plenty of clear grit, and has fought many a battle right in the face of orthodoxy, and has experienced what it is to be in an unpopular cause. He has the enthusiasm of humanity and knows no such word as fail. His energetic efforts hav contributed largely to the success of the movement here.

John R. Coleman, president of the Union, has the fire and undaunted courage of youth, and will make an excellent officer. He is generous and outspoken in support of our cause.

Judge Schofield is one of the honored citizens of the place—respected for his integrity and intelligence. He has never been afraid to speak his honest thought. The Christians here hav felt many a keen thrust of his brilliant blade.

W. W. Treat is a frontiersman all over. I don't think he would be at home anywhere except in "enterprises of great pith and moment," where fortunes are won by the stroke of the hammer.

Mrs. Mary E. Edgington is one of those brave women who can work if need be. Reduced from affluence to poverty, she does not lose her happiness, and has a heart for any fate. She is a stanch Liberal and a friend of humanity in every sense of the word.

I had the pleasure of spending a day with Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Baisley, with their four little children, who liv on the brow of the mountains in a beautiful spot overlooking the broad valley, with glimpses of snowy peaks two hundred miles away. Round about are the placer mines, where hundreds of thousands of dollars hav been taken out. It is quite a science, I find, to know how to get the gold dust out of the rocky ribs. I am glad that my friend Baisley has hit the golden wand, and can reap his harvest from the dark chambers of the earth.

Dr. W. T. Shelton walked about fifty miles from his home among the hills to attend the lecture, and it was a pleasure, indeed, to shake hands with such a magnificent Infidel.

Wm. Hindman, of Burnt River, twenty miles away, was also present, and he, too, has been one of our unflinching pioneers.

Jack Plummer, of North Powder, twenty-four miles off, was also on hand, and is one of the officers of the Union. He is almost alone where he is, in an orthodox community, but he carries his colors so that everyone can see.

Geo. L. Hayes, and wife, and son, and other friends came from Pocahontas, nine miles away, and are among our forces for future work.

Ed. T. Mayhan, Asa Dolph, Ike Henshaw, H. C. Durkey, Samuel Williams, David Kelly, C. H. Hayaboom, and others are also good and true, every inch of them, to the cause of Freethought. I hav had a joyous labor amid these splendid comrades, and I look forward to grand advance for truth and humanity.

To-day I leave for Prairie City, seventy miles off among the hills, over a rough road, and I must take the stage and travel all night. I hope to survive all jolts and tumbles safe and sound. I expect a busy campaign in this remote country, and to be paid in happy toil for the laborious journey.

I shall he at Weiser City, Idaho, Sept. 7th; at Emmett's from Sept. 5th to 15th; at Boise City, 16th, 17th, and 18th; at Salt Lake, Sept. 24th and 25th; at Canon City, Sept. 30th, and Oct. 1st, and 2d; and at Chicago, Oct. 15th and 16th for Annual Congress. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

From the Oregon Scout of August 28th.

As per announcement, the gifted orator, Samuel P. Putnam, secretary of the American Secular Union, lectured on Wednesday and Thursday evenings of this week in this city. The lectures were largely attended by the intelligent and progressiv people here, and were greatly enjoyed, being a veritable feast of reason and flow of soul. On the subjects, "Universal Mental Liberty" and "The New Heaven and Earth," Mr. Putnam fully sustained the high reputation that had preceded him. He is one of the most logical and persuasiv reasoners it has been our good fortune to listen to, and no one can sit under the sound of his voice and not be impressed with the correctness of his views or carried away by the sincerity of his vehement and eloquent utterances. We regret that he could not remain with us longer, and that our limited space forbids a more extended notice in these columns. His work in this city, though brief, will not fail of beneficial results, and no doubt the seeds he has sown will take root, and grow, and blossom in soil unused to aught of beauty heretofore, and come to full fruition in the sunlight of that universal mental liberty that is near at hand. It is a noble work to knock the shackles from the feet of toiling bondsmen everywhere, but nobler still is the work of freeing the mind of man from the superstition, and fear, and darkness that hav so long enshrouded it. In this work we are quite sure that Mr. Putnam, no matter in what part of the world he may be, will be found laboring faithfully and well. The best wishes of many friends go with him.

The Annual Idler.

MY DEAR BROTHER: For the three weeks ending August 27th I hav been a portion of the picturesque landscape in parts of Cheshire county, New Hampshire. No doubt there are ten thousand young men in New York besides myself who take an annual vacation, but I am the only one that goes to Surry, N. H, and mingles picturesquely with the landscape. I am also, perhaps, the only one among ten thousand who is allowed to print his remarks. The others restrict themselvs to oral recitations about the fish they caught. I went fishing once, but I am not enough of a liar to make an account of it exciting. Next to being an expert angler it is necessary that a fisherman be able to lie; and if there is any one thing more than another that I tie to as a historian, it is the unalterable and everlasting truth.

It was August the 7th when I took the steamer Pilgrim, 390 feet long, 87 feet wide, 50 feet deep, and comfortably full. These statistics refer to the steamer. I wore a slouch hat that I was conscious made me look like a villain; a sixteen-inch valise in library binding and with two surcingles around it; Mr. Wettstein's emblem of mental emancipation gleaming in a rich, ten dollar way from just below my left clavicle, and a countenance illuminated from within by the light of an unsullied conscience. I greatly regretted having put on a hat that did me such injustice, but I drew a measure of comfort from the sad fortunes of a youth in a white stovepipe that belted itself out of shape against whatever object the builders of the boat had provided for that purpose. Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus" is devoted to a consideration of clothes. I do not think he pays attention enough to the hat, which, with its contemporary, the suspender, ranks next to the liver in its influence on human destiny.

The Pilgrim is furnished with a band of musicians in red jackets, who struck up a lively air as we got away from the dock. No doubt those left behind believed in their trusting hearts that we were to hav music all the way, but we did not. As soon as we were out of sight of New York, the piccolo man picked his piccolo to pieces and put it in his pocket, the buglers extricated themselvs from their instruments, and the trombone tooter gave his right arm a short rest and then rubbed his left biceps to get the cramp out of it; then the disciples of divine melody disappeared, and shortly thereafter developed into passengers on the hurricane deck smoking strong cigars.

The price of accommodations on the Pilgrim is subject, I should judge, to sudden and violent fluctuations. Soon after I went aboard I joined the line of passengers who were walking on one another's heels past the captain's office, and on reaching the window presented my ticket and asked for a state-room key. "Three dollars," said the red-whiskered minion of monopoly. I had three dollars in my inside pocket, but I thought I would prefer enjoying it awake to investing it in a few of those brief periods of partial paralysis that pass for sleep on side-wheel steamers. "Nothing less?" said I. "Not a thing," said he. The man standing on my heels paid the three dollars and got a room. The next and the next did the same. My three dollars remained in my inside pocket. On the wing deck there was a big coil of rope, upon which I sat and viewed the scenery on the Connecticut shore until the procession had passed the window of the captain's office, and the red-whiskered minion sat twiddling his thumbs and looking lonesome. Then I went up, leaned on the brass rail in front of him, and blandly inquired the price of staterooms. "Do you want a two dollar room or a one-dollar room?" said the minion. "What is the difference?" I asked. "One dollar," said he. "The rooms are alike?" I suggested. "I can giv you a good room for a dollar," he replied, evasivly. I took it. Whether it was the same one I should hav secured for three dollars I am not going to guess. At any rate, it had two beds in it, an electric light that turned on and off with a button, and a slave near by, who, according to the announcement of a card posted in the stateroom, was bound to be attentiv under dire penalties.

I made but one acquaintance while on the Pilgrim. I was standing on the main deck, looking over the rail. A two-masted vessel, square-rigged forward and schooner-rigged aft, was coming down the sound with a load of lumber, but I was not paying it any special attention, when a voice alongside of me said, "Can ye tell where that fellow is from?" The man who thus remarked was about fifty years old, had a brown beard, a smell of the sea, and an air of independence about him. "Who?" I returned; "the brigantine?" The man drew forth a piece of tobacco and a jackknife, closed one eye, and cut off a chunk of the weed, which he laid upon his tongue as far back as he could reach, and then calmly and deliberately proceeded to chew it. "Naw, the morphydike brig over there on the port hand. She's from way down—Maine or the provinces."

I didn't contradict him and he went on to say that he had followed the sea for thirty-seven years, and was going to visit his boyhood home in Massachsetts. His last voyage had been to the Bahamas. He had some cigars with him that he had smuggled into this country, and after smoking one I thought he might smuggle them out again without any objection being raised. I believe he said he bought them in Nassau, Bahama Islands, at the rate of two for a cent. He had some interesting things to relate about the unconventional dress and manners of people in tropical countries, and said I ought to go there. He believed I would like it. He owned that the southern populace were less enlightened than the people of the North, but, in his opinion, that defect was atoned for by their superior immorality. In exchange for the information he imparted to me I gave him one of the beds in my stateroom that night. He got into it with his trousers on, saying, in answer to my advice that he better take them off, that sailors always slept in their "pants" when under way. I got the impression at the time, however, that he suspected me of having offered him a bed with the intention of robbing him in his sleep and swimming ashore with his effects. But morning restored his confidence, and as the boat lay at the wharf in Fall River, and we sat on deck in the gray light of daybreak, waiting for the train, he grew philosophical, discoursed in a quaint way on the mental poverty of those who spend their lives ashore, and advised me, as a man older than myself, and having been in foreign parts, to try and pick up a little edgication as I went through life. Warming to his subject. he dropped gems like this. Quoth he: "A man may be poor, and if he wears good close no one will know that he ain't rich. But if he is onedgicated everybody is bound to get on to it. Likewise the onedgicated man is consaited. Coming up from Nassau, last voyage, a feller aboard that didn't know enough to tie a bowlin' cont'dicted me, that's follered the sea for thirty-seven year, when I mentioned that Columbus come over in the Mayflower. Dam a ignorant man. That's what I say. Git edgication if you want to keep clear of blunders. A man gits lernin' outer books, he gits edgication outer ships, fore and aft, alow and aloft. Now I'm goin' up home where they never see the color of deep water. But hell, I couldn't stay there. Whisky, bygod, ten cents a drink, and damnation poor at that. Now I've got a bottle of rum here in my pocket that come from Jamaky. Try it. No? That shows the kind of edgication folks gets ashore. A man that'll speak of a morphydike brig and call it a brigantyne, and run away from Jamaky rum when it's held out to him by a gentleman, has got a good deal to learn. That's what I say." Having delivered himself thus, he surveyed me for some time to note the effect. Then he walked to the rail, squirted some tobacco juice upon a passenger who was leaving the boat, came back, and said: "Likewise git religion. Cuss a onreligious man. Look at Catholics, which I don't call Christians. They hain't religion; and what is Catholics in all countries? They don't believe in God, and they bows themselvs down to himages. Ignorant! Ignorance and disreligion goes together. Where you find one, t'other's alongside. Avast! Hell! That's what I say."

I left the boat at the close of the benediction and took the train. The old sailor waited for the next so he could see the factory girls on their way to work. He said Fall River girls had the reputation of being "good-lookers." I took it for granted that they were, all girls being beautiful.

There was no orchestra in the train, but we had a squalling baby along, and a man with his arm in a sling and several slings on his breath, fell over my legs into the seat with me, and made me his confidant. He had a wife at home, and he advised every young fellow to get married and settle down. I expect his intention was to talk me to sleep and then use me for a pillow, but he foiled his own design, and likewise illustrated his remark about settling down, by shortly collapsing into an inert mass and going to sleep himself. He was a painter from Rhode Island, and had broken his arm by falling from a staging in a fit of temporary sobriety. From the size of a bottle which protruded from his pocket, I inferred that he was in no immediate danger of a relapse. I understand that Rhode Island is a Prohibition state, which may or may not hav anything to do with the matter.

The cars banged and rattled and whooped along; the passengers lunched and the conductor punched until eleven o'clock. Then we arrived at Keene, N. H., and I got out. New England towns do not change to any startling extent in a year. I heard that here in Keene, a city of six thousand inhabitants, no new building has been erected in the past twelve months. Prohibition, however, has been introduced, and both the friends and enemies of that institution freely admit that under it there has been no noticeable increase in the sale of liquor or in drunkenness. While the people take larger drinks, they do not drink so often. I dropped in early at the office of a local paper that I take regularly and pay for irregularly, and tendered payment for a year in advance, which was received by the foreman of the printing-office. In the next issue the editor announced under the head of "Bric-a-Brac" that I had made the paper a "pleasant call;" which was quite agreeable, but why should I be inventoried as bric-a brac? Am I a curiosity, a ceramic, a piece of ancient pottery, a miscellaneous collection of the rare and antique? I pause for a reply, during which I will proceed with this letter.

As usual, I headed for Surry. That is the place where I was, to a certain extent, brought up. The locality where I lived they called Surry Hill. Surry Hill is surrounded by hills, beyond which are hills. If you look between these hills, you see other hills farther away overlapping each other and standing against the horizon like the faces in a composit photograph, until finally the sky touches their summits and seems to shut off the view. I found the farmers haying still. In the first part of the summer rain prevailed, which was immediately succeeded by moisture, and thereafter followed by dampness. It was hot, and everything grew, but there was no sunshine. Meadow hay that was down was likely to float away, and the overflowing streams filled the bottom with sand that took the edge off a scythe and made more profanity than the hay would sell for. I heard a religious man say that some of the farmers had come to the conclusion that either there was no overruling providence or that the judgment was upon them. He said, further, that the greater part of the hay cut in New Hampshire during the current season had been cured by running it through a clothes-wringer in the house and laying it under the stove to dry. I doubt the earnestness of a professed Christian who would undertake to work off that sort of an item on a city man looking for news. Another granger, speaking of stout grass, told me that he had a piece of land where it grew so thick that there was no room for it to fall down, so it stood up after the mowing machine had cut it off at the bottom, and he had to hav a boy follow the machine and put up stakes with little flags on them to tell where he had mowed. When he came to cart the hay the tumbles were so close together that he couldn't drive onto the ground and he had to back up to it. This is a true account. I saw the piece of land the hay came off from, and the man who owns it and who told the story is affiliated with the Baptist church; and I hope the day hasn't arrived when the word of a Baptist church-member can be lightly doubted.

For about a week I devoted portions of my time to haying and harvesting. A trifling incident occurred which I must relate in order that a true and veracious account of it may forestall any exaggerated version of the affair that might reach you. Two loads of oats stood one day in two barnfloors forty feet apart. I assisted to get one of them into the mow. It was desired to put the other on top of it. The empty wagon was therefore run out of the way and a horse hitched to the rear of the loaded wagon. Back of the barn was a little rise. When the load had been drawn out far enough, the team was to be put on the front end and draw it into the other barn. It didn't get there exactly in that way, as I recall the circumstances. It was assigned to me to lead the horse, the owner handling the pole, by which he expected to steer the wagon. The family dog sat a little way off and looked on with an intelligent smile. The horse did not impress me as a powerful animal, and I was unprepared for the amount of physical resource which he developed when the man at the pole sang out to me to go ahead. I spoke encouragingly to the horse. A good deal followed, and it followed immediately. The horse pawed once with his off forefoot. Then he galloped. I had him by the bit, and traveled forty feet at four steps in one second. It is a pleasant day; the sun shines soft through a hazy atmosphere; the cowbells tinkle in the glade. From the near distance comes the sound of an organ swelling the anthem of praise, and the voice of the granger swearing at a wild and untamed heifer as he chases her through the cornfield rustling with the banners of advancing autumn. The tail end of the wagon went up the hill to the west; the horse charged toward the polar star; the load of oats made a graceful flop and turned bottom upward, the wheels revolving in the air. The horse stopped, stretched out his head to loosen the reins, and then went quietly to feeding on the grass at his feet; the family dog nearly broke his back in a paroxysm of unutterable joy, and a neighbor driving by stopped to remark kindly that the wagon was in "good shape for greasin'." The disaster is said to hav been due to the way I led the horse. I deny that I led him. He led me at high speed. I must wash my hands of all responsibility for what occurred under circumstances over which I had positivly no control. I only know that it was a pleasant day, the sun shone soft through a hazy atmosphere, and the surroundings were substantially as described above.

In my strolling to and fro over these hills, I was so fortunate as to retain the same sedate horse and comfortable carriage that hav for several years helped me to enjoy my annual idling. I got a different and younger horse the first day, but he proved to be such an inordinate glutton that he endangered his own health. In one hour he could drink a barrel of water, and eat his way out of sight into a hay mow. I took him back at the end of the first day and acquainted the owner with his fault. The man said he meant to hav told me before that the horse hadn't "scarcely any judgment" about his diet, and let me hav last year's horse again. The old fellow, I believe, sometimes thinks of his youth, when he could travel fast, and at such times he will make earnest efforts to keep up with other horses. I once tried a dissuade him from such an attempt, but he resented it and stood up on his hind feet and pawed the air in a way that alarmed me. His forelegs curve forward so that he stands on tiptoe, and a little box of grease goes with him for anointing his heels. His contemplativ habits continue, and he still stops occasionally and stands buried in deep reverie, until he is asked to proceed, which he does with a sigh that comes near being a howl.

Here closes the first instalment of this brief pastoral sketch. Certain hints from the Editor, which I do not feel at liberty to disregard, induce me to stop here. The end is not yet. There is more to follow. The subject will be resumed in the next issue, which issue, I think I am justified in inferring, will be awaited with great impatience by those of your readers whose communications are to appear in the same paper.

GEORGE E. MACDONALD.

THE Rev. D. Seymour, who ran away with Fanny J. Henry, wife of one of his parishioners, hails from Janesville, Minnesota, not Wisconsin, as we erroneously stated. We make this correction at the instance of a resident of Janesville, Wis., who wishes to preserve the reputation of his town. Mr. Seymour and his paramour were arrested in this town, but let go, as the governor of Minnesota refused to issue a requisition. Mr. Seymour was warned, however, not to return to Minnesota.

Great Wrongs—The Cause and Remedy.

From all quarters of the land we hear the cry of the oppressed, which indicates that the people are under a galling yoke, and suffering from burdens grievous to be borne. There are complaints of slavery, ostracism, and wanton cruelty in this fair land of ours, where liberty is the emblem, and freedom our guiding star. These murmurings do not in all cases arise from a specific class of persons, but in some instances embrace all classes and grades of the human family.

Equality is the birthright vouchsafed mankind by nature, acknowledged by the framers of our Constitution, and for the benefits of which the people clamor.

This innate longing for the opportunity to exercise and enjoy the rights and privileges which are theirs by nature, but denied them by their fellow-beings, can be held in check and temporarily controled, only to the further injury of the oppressed, and will at last break forth with renewed power to accomplish and sustain. It givs us our "woman's rights" advocate, our "labor reform" champion, and the conscientious supporter of Freethought and free speech.

We cannot ignore these great questions of the day, or ridicule them into the background, without heaping coals of fire on our own heads or those of posterity. They will not forever down! "Truth crushed to earth will rise again!" And all of us can see that there is much truth in the portrayal of wrong in these questions, but through selfish motivs, or inability to comprehend the hight and depth and breadth thereof, and propose a plan for the righting of these wrongs, we sneer and ridicule, and say: "There is no help for it; no remedy; it is the custom; the established rule, and its overthrow would disrupt our government." It may as well be said that we are non-progressiv in the face of many evidences to the contrary; that there is no such thing as justice, and no sympathy in the human heart; that the great law written in the very nature of noble men and women: "Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you," is an insufficient guide, and an unsafe rule to govern action.

> Take physic, pomp; expose thyself to feel what wretches feel,

And then will mankind comprehend these great problems, and the solution will be self-suggestiv. Then we will not evade these momentous questions, nor endeavor to crowd them out of mind through self-interest, leaving them for posterity to consider and provide for.

These questions are thrust upon us for our consideration, and, having their birth in our day, belong to us, and posterity has no inheritance in them except the benefits to be derived from their present solution.

For a time was the slavery of the negro tolerated, yea, even sanctioned, by a vast number of American citizens. But at last the enormities and cruelties of the system became known; sentiment against it was created; human sympathy was enlisted in favor of its suppression, and thousands of noble sons flew to the rescue of their unfortunate brother, procuring for him, and protecting him in, those rights which were his by nature, even at the risk of their own lives. How came all this? The burden of the colored man became unendurable; it caused him to cry out in the anguish of his soul; his cry reached the ear of sympathy, and, his wretchedness made known throughout the land, strong arms came to the rescue. The wrongs of which he complained were not imaginary, they were real. His humane white brother took a view of the situation; "exposed himself to feel what wretches felt," then obeyed the most holy promptings of the human heart to "do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you."

It is natural for us to patiently endure wrongs heaped upon us until they become unbearable, then we utter our protest. We take pride in suffering without complaint until we see that our chief interests are endangered; then we endeavor to enlist sympathy and secure aid. So we may take it as true in nine cases out of ten, where help is sought, help is needed; that this power of endurance has been taxed to the utmost. And this being our conviction, let us not be heedless of the cry for "woman's rights," "labor reform," "free thought," and "free speech."

As American citizens we bow to no king, but assert our right and ability to govern ourselvs. Let us take heed, then, that we do not usurp authority nor attempt to "lord it" over others. We pride ourselvs on justice and right. Then let us banish all self-interest and see that justice is done unto all mankind, and that right rules. And let us who hav Freethought and free speech for our standard not be guilty of an attempt to smother the cry of some one less fortunate than ourselvs. Our perceptiv faculties are not so activ as to enable us to see where assistance should be rendered until the despairing cry, "Help, I sink!" of the storm-tossed mariner falls upon our ear and arouses our sympathy. Let us not close the only channel through which his salvation comes—the right to speak.

ORIGIN OF THESE WRONGS.

We think that the idea of a God who indorses such things as slavery and servitude, and controls thought or speech, as set forth in so-called sacred books, is the principal source of all this tyranny. Let the teachings and influence of one of these alleged sacred books serve to illustrate the effects of all upon mankind. We take the Bible.

Upon examination we find that the Bible teaches that slavery is right; that the man whom fortune has favored is entitled to the services of his neighbor without compensation; that it is right to steal, provided you steal from the "heathen;" that it is right to amass wealth, no matter how many backs are left naked or mouths unfed, because of so much wealth being centered in one individual; that God's "chosen" may grow rich on the unrequited labor of another; yet there is no wrong perpetrated, no wrong, no wrong! It is God's decree, therefore right and just. Yet this God who is said to be "no respecter of persons" heeds not the fact that plenty of food, raiment, and liberty contributes largely to the happiness of mankind; and that it is better to clothe two than one; that it is more humane to feed two hungry mouths than to suffer one to undergo the pain and misery which attend starvation; that, according to his laws, my weal is another's woe; that my pleasure is another's pain; that my aggrandizement is somebody's degradation; that my wealth means poverty to others.

I take it as a logical conclusion that if A should not take the life of B because the latter has the same right to life as the former, then A should not be permitted to control means which B has need of, because his life can be preserved only by supplying its wants, which the surplus means of A would enable him to do. If A withholds a surplus amount of means which B stands in need of, he is guilty of indirect murder. All men are endowed by nature with "certain inalienable rights," among which are "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Then, seeing that A's life is no more precious than the life of B, we can readily see that whatever tends to perpetuate, gladden, and render pleasant the life of A should also lend its influence on the life pathway of B. And as good food, sufficient clothing, shelter, money, education, etc., are indispensable to A's comfort and happiness, so are they also indispensable to B, and he is just as much entitled thereto as A.

Then, finding that the wants of A and B are, in the main, identical; that B is entitled to every right and privilege accorded A, it seems unjust for A to possess houses and lands and roll in luxury and wealth, while B dwells in a rented hovel, in poverty and rags, the victim of A's avarice. Let it not be said that B is an improvident man, and reaps not, because of his neglect to sow, and that A possesses positiv qualities which lead to industry and economy and attract in a legitimate manner the property of B; for if A does not rob B, he probably does rob C or D, and if he does not, he should retire from business as soon as he accumulates sufficient means to satisfy his wants in life, and giv some of the lesser magnets a chance to attract something their way. A cannot possess more than he can make use of without impoverishing some one else. "If no one has too much, everybody will hav enough." I find this wealth-getting spirit cropping out all through the scriptures, and I do not wonder at its bearing such an abundant crop of fruit among the people.

I also find that this God regards woman as being inferior to man, and permits her not to "teach or exercise authority," for the silly reason that "Adam was first formed, then Eve." This conveys the idea to our mind that God's first effort was his best; and that by the time he found it necessary to make a woman, he was in such need of "rest" that he made undue haste, and botched the job; hence, woman is not qualified to "speak in church," and should "learn in silence, with all subjection," and acknowledge her inferiority by "asking her husband" whenever she desires to "learn anything." God saw but one redeeming feature in woman. Men see many. Woman proves herself man's equal in every mental test, and falls short only where great physical effort is required. Heaven has denied her the right to speak, but we grant her this privilege, except when she complains of us, then we also enjoin "silence" upon her.

Man is in authority; woman, though man's equal by nature, is in many instances man's slave. But she has ascertained the fact that man cannot answer all her questions, and as her curiosity to "learn" has led her to make use of her own resources, she has at last become self-reliant, at the risk of eternal condemnation. She feels that she has something of importance to say, and she should be allowed to say it. She may be able to portray her wrongs in such a light as we, in our selfishness, hav never beheld them. The tables may be turned, and we may "learn" of woman upon whom heaven frowns.

No complaints or murmurings arise from a prosperous and happy people. It is misery and woe that cry aloud. While the chief comforts of life are obtainable, contentment and happiness will prevail. But when the supply does not equal the demand, expressions of dissatisfaction are sure to follow. Then close not the only avenue to human hope and human happiness! Let the right to speak not be questioned; for by this means only can we, steeped as we are in selfishness, be apprised of the needs of our fellow-men. An appeal must be made to our sympathies before we lose sight of self; then our true manhood is called into action, and we obey the injunction: "Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you."

THE REMEDY.

Strike the word "God" out of our vocabulary. Erase all thought of such a being from the mind. For associated with the word "God" in every clime, in every land, is worship, coupled with slavery in every form, which implies offering and sacrifice, and, in some instances, bloodshed. It matters not of what elements that God is composed—whether of metal, wood, or stone; or whether he is simply a creature of the imagination. The effect is the same. God is supreme in every land; he is king. A king must hav subjects, and they must serve the king. A king delegates power to others, who rule the common people. A bows to B and obeys his commands, and pays tribute to him—is virtually his slave. B bows to C, and C to D. D bends the knee to E, the chief ruler, where this great system of head-bowing and knee-bending ends. God is the great I Am, the chief ruler of the universe, to whom others must bow in humility or forfeit life. We are required to "serve him." We don't love God, and serve him willingly, but we pretend to love him, and serve him to escape his "wrath." His character is such that a rational being cannot love him. Hence the worship and service of God is a system of slavery from beginning to end, being the outgrowth of "fear."

But man is endowed by nature with "certain inalienable rights," and chief among these are "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. To secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. Whenever any form of government becomes destructiv of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its power in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness." This declaration voices the sentiment of the true American citizen. He holds the power within his own hand. That power is the ballot. He has the right to say what shall be tolerated and what shall be abolished. His decision must be based on equity, and his enlightened judgment will enable him to determin what is best for the majority. If in his decision he rules out God, and with him slavery of every kind with its train of misery and woe, we shall enjoy the benefits accruing to a free people, happy, loving, and prosperous, because of our absolute freedom.

Related to the God idea is that of preferment on account of ability, which may, in most cases, be safely attributed, either directly or indirectly, to wealth.

The individual born in poverty and obscurity can not compete with the child reared in the lap of luxury, until by craftiness he crushes others, and on their ruin erects his castle. It is so in the business, the social, and the intellectual realm. The possession of wealth affords the advantages of education, culture, honor, etc., which the gods readily turn to account. With all the gods consigned to oblivion, "man's inhumanity to man" will cease, and in its stead will be love, friendship, and sympathy among members of one fraternal brotherhood, where joy shall reign supreme, and discontent hav no abiding place.

The natural equality of man is stamped upon his very being. Aside from God's school of avarice, with the common wants of life supplied, he is a contented and happy being. But when these are denied him, or command too high a price, every vile propensity rankling in his nature is aroused, and no crime is too dark or foul for him to perpetrate. Like the wild beast of the forest, the pangs of hunger, coupled with an opportunity to satisfy that hunger, goad him to madness and fury.

If we would reduce the list of crimes, we must remove the cause. The criminal usually takes his first lessons in crime because of seeming necessity. His garments are threadbare, or his stomach is empty. There should be no excessiv wealth on one side, nor extreme poverty on the other, to tempt men to cross the gulf which lies between to equalize conditions. But as long as men will insist upon hoarding wealth which is the proceeds of unrequited or poorly paid labor, that long will night watches, burglar-proof safes, and burglar alarms be in demand. Strikes and riots follow in the wake of greed and avarice.

You cannot deprive a man of that which nature teaches him is his property, without creating within his being a determination to get even with you; and in his fury he sometimes makes use of the most objectionable methods, and sometimes an innocent party is the sufferer. Accounts must balance! There should be no "forbidden fruit" to excite curiosity, or incite to crime.

Teach man clearly to comprehend these great truths, and you will discover that there is yet enough good in his nature to render the plan practicable, and effectiv in its workings. He will see that it is to his interest to deny himself such means as he cannot make of practical use; for it is his life insurance policy, his insurance against robbery and arson, and the foundation of the happiness of all mankind.

Take physic, pomp; expose thyself to feel what wretches feel,
That thou mayst shake the superflux to them,
And show mankind more just.

SENECA.

Let Us Assign Sources, Too.

In his "Defense of Fundamental Truth," Dr. McCosh speaks of the practical, social, and political effects of different phases of speculativ philosophy. He says: "I may add that the friends of religion should also guard those springs out of which the streams of action flow. For De Toqueville tells us that a materialistic philosophy penetrates into public, and I may add, private morals. He (De Toqueville) refers specially to the sensational philosophy of France, which exercised so fatal an influence on French character and politics in the latter half of the last century, giving a direction to public sentiment which culminated in the mad excesses of the French Revolution, and then sank into the stagnant indifference of the first empire."

The problem is not so simple as the foregoing statement seems to assume. Speaking generally, we should hav a common standard by which to measure the ethical results, the social and political tendencies of the rival philosophies. It is clearly unjust to assume the absolute, or even relativ, perfection of one, and then go through the form of condemning the other from that standpoint. Again, in presenting an example, as above quoted, it would seem the part of ordinary fairness to set forth, in clear and unmistakable terms, the conditions that obtained before the new philosophy gained sway, and compare the old regime with the new. Dr. McCosh is probably the ablest and, I think, the fairest representativ of his school, and yet he quotes approvingly or paraphrases such sentiments as I hav quoted. He and his fellow apologists bankrupt the vituperativ possibilities of language in condemning what they are pleased to term the "mad excesses of the French Revolution," but how many of them hav condemned or even adequately described the centuries of wrong so patiently borne by the French people? However, the object of this communication is not to discuss the French Revolution, but to view, in the light of De Toqueville's dictum, some incidents growing out of a contemporary event.

For some months our city has been torn up over the exposure and trials of the "gang," the "boodlers" (the reader may supply other terms ad libitum). If we may believe De Toqueville, McCosh, et al, the excesses of the French Revolution were caused by the fact that that people forsook McCosh's "Fundamental Truth" and embraced the sensational philosophy of the latter half of the eighteenth century—which, without euphemistic circumlocution, means that the church lost its grip in that nation at that time. As yet, no local De Toqueville or McCosh has arisen to explain the why and wherefore of the "mad excesses" of the "boodlers" in looting the Cook county treasury. To aid this suppositious philosopher in his task, I submit the following.

During the trial of McDonald and McGarigle Mr. Abbott testified that he had handed a bribe of $11,000 to one of the defendants in order to secure a certain coal contract. He testified that he was a church-member, naming his church and pastor, and further stated that from the time of giving the bribe until confessing (to the state's attorney), he did not go to communion. See Mail and Tribune, June 8, 1887. During the investigation previous to the trial this gentleman successfully bluffed several reporters by citing his church membership as an evidence that he could do nothing unlawful. When pressed, however, this giver of bribes testified against and assisted to convict his partner in crime, the taker of bribes.

During the "omnibus trial," in which some dozen boodlers were defendants, Mr. Lynn, a former county commissioner, posed as informer, and appeared as state's witness against his quondam fellow-boodlers. He testified that before he had served Cook county two months he commenced taking bribes. He was a church-member, according to his testimony, belonging to the same church as one of the attorneys for the defense, who asked him (Mr. Lynn) whether he used any of that money for church purposes. Mr. Lynn saved himself by turning state's evidence. See Times, July 20, 1887.

During the same trial Mr. Robinson, grocer, testified to bribing commissioners in order to secure certain contracts for provisions, and that the money thus paid in bribes was made up by overcharges and goods of poor quality. "Mr. Robinson, do you believe in God?" The witness nodded his head in the affirmativ. "Do you believe in future reward and punishment?" Again Robinson nodded his head. See News, July 27, 1887.

It has not been shown that any of the conspirators were Freethinkers. I am certain that none of them ever attends or contributes to the Secular Union. There was some dispute as to McGarigle's church, but one of our papers declared he was an "Episcopalian from way back."

This question presses for answer. Is Christianity or is Freethought responsible for such a condition of affairs as these trials disclose? Christianity has had, and still has, almost undisputed sway in this and other countries from which the boodlers hail. Our laws are made under the direction of the Most High. At least, we pay some duly consecrated individual to ask for direction in that particular. Possibly they don't pray loud enough. See Elijah's remark to the false prophets. Christianity controled our schools and warped our education, dominated our politics, interpreted law from the bench, proscribed Freethought in the trades, in business, and in the professions, and, as far as possible, ostracized Freethinkers in political and social relations. Christianity claims that its church edifices and other property should be exempt from taxation, on the ground that it makes men good, law-abiding, honest citizens.

Yet, in spite of this claim, more than ninety-nine per cent of our criminals are Christians. Occasionally a Freethinker may be found behind the bars for violation of Comstock's patent morality law, but when it comes to violations of long and well established laws, which are necessary for the very existence of social order; when it comes to murder, arson, highway robbery, larceny, embezzlement, breach of trust, etc., etc., scratch the criminal and you find a Christian. It is high time that Christians should, in the supposititious humility of their master, cease claiming to hold an exclusiv patent on all extant morality and honesty. ED. S. MCLEOD.

Polygamy and Monogamy.

Polygamy, a disgusting and detestable institution.—TRUTH SEEKER.

De gustibus non disputandum. Does the truth-seeking editor remember to hav ever printed anything in defense of "disgusting letters, books, or nudities in art," disgusting to a certain vicegerent of the church, and accredited police of obscenity?

In the name of the fairer sex, and of the superiority of the plural to the singular number in goods, betters, and bests, I am polygamically scandalized.

In the name of my pastoral forefathers I protest against their representation by your Mormons.

No wonder you demur to seven wives or so being hauled up into heaven by a Mormon's coat-tails. Our modern shoddy will not bear the strain. Besides that, such dependency might compromise the personal discretion of the ballot so necessary to a "free government." Such humbug evoluted recently among the "strong-minded" sex of Utah. If well and ill matched couples are equally monogamic after the magic formula of marriage, while the well-matched no more prove the goodness than the ill-matched the badness of their tie, considered as a formula or of monogamy in general; so in polygamy, some men adore their favorit wives on separate family altars, others sacrifice their wives promiscuously to the lord god self, while a third class organizes them in harem factories under the boss wife. Some Mormons, it is said, too, make each wife support her own children on the hope of penultimation to the consecrated coat-tail.

Polygamy debases no gentleman into a hoodlum, any more than monogamy makes a gentleman of a hoodlum.

Some wives in either case are jealous furies, while others prefer joint stock partnership in husbands for reasons best known to themselvs.

Why absolutely and promiscuously approve or condemn either monogamy or polygamy as systems, rather than personal arrangements under either? To compare this case with relations less polarized by prejudice, is it not equally absurd to legislate for the privation of work, except for wages; or to prevent anyone from working for wages? Will the stars fall if each is free to choose, with the condition attached of being freely chosen?

You are, we will say for consistency's sake, a conjugial partner of the Swedenborg angelic species, thus defined by Maria del Occidente:

Even as the dove, from far Palmyra flying
To where her nativ founts at Antioch gleam,
Stoops to explore, then swooning, panting, dying,
Lights sadly at the desert's bitter stream;
So many a soul o'er life's drear desert faring,
Love's pure congenial stream unfound, unquaffed,
Suffers, recoils, then thirsty and despairing
Of what it would, descends and sips the nearest draught.

This exclusiv predestination was equally adapted to romantic and to clerical consecration. Thus it afforded to marriage an ideal, as on the economic side a basis was supplied by civil rights of the wife as distinguished from her husband's personal property in the odalisque of his barbaric harem. The more respectable civilized tie, though it may be spontaneous, is oftener conventional. Otherwise, what is more than an appetite, an organic and functional necessity, combines with the tension of ideals to illusionize the lover, and he either contracts some rash marriage or falls into vices. Poverty or vanity more frequently betrays the wife against the monitions of instinct. Thus constancy is usually based upon habit and facility for satisfying imperfectly an animal appetite, even where love may hav at first filled the sails and steered the bark. The polarity of temperaments and harmony of characters hav no necessary coincidence with domestic and industrial partnership. Yet such is the economic requirement of married welfare. Hence, in church-ridden countries, monogamic misery, and the equally superstitious polygamic prosperity in Utah. Below, and for the classes where money becomes a necessary consideration, it does not follow that it excludes love any more among the unmarried than among the married. Outside of church authority, the tendency of the wealthy and cultured classes to evade marriage is pronounced in modern Europe; and, if less so in Great Britain, that fact tallies with the greater predominance of church influence.

In the actual constitution of societies, concubinage is a palliativ for the cruel inequalities of conditions. It opens the purse-strings of the rich, and it is often a providential rescue for the wife from unwelcome marital importunities. For obvious physiological reasons, refractory to the puritan moralism of Alphites, the chances of health and comfort and domestic amiability are better when the male animal, called husband, is not always tied to his wife's apron string. In the relations between the rich and poor, concubinage effects salutary alliances, and economically as well as morally preferable to our systems of public charity. The intolerance of concubinage acts like the prohibition of wine and beer; for as where these are good and plentiful there is little intoxication with the pernicious products of the still, so where the attractions of sex hav free play there is little or no prostitution.

Of the clerical marriage, on the contrary, prostitution is the regular complement, and will be found everywhere proportional to hymeneal rigors, for these deal with a passion no less incompressible than water. To avert pollution and to combine hygiene with moral decency, it is imperativ that the youth should find opportunities proportional to the evolution of passion.

You are, perhaps, a conjugial lover of the Swedenborg angelic species. In that case, looking down from your sublime exclusivness, do you find it easy to distinguish in purity between "scortatory marriages" and frank concubinages? You know very well that but a few elect are truly faithful to that bond in which you esteem it best freedom to be bound. For a much greater number it is but conventional and kept only by virtue of poverty. That is the fact alike in Christendom, in Islam, and in Mormondom.

This vicious character may be the effect of an overdose of faith. It attaches to the harems of the faithful, par excellence. The Mormon wife, by infidelity, only loses her passport to heaven, not her alimony. Among Christian and other professed Infidels, the infidelity of wives may equipoise polygamy, which is monopolist only when one-sided. Before we condemn an institution, we ought to see it perfect in its kind. Thus democracy, to be really a "government of the people, by the people, for the people," in which everybody orders everybody, and meddles with everybody's business, and deprives everybody of his, her, or its personal liberty and pleasure, imperatively requires female suffrage, and also child suffrage; for is it not scandalous that children should not vote about the management of their own schools and other factories where they are used and abused?

Openly to oppose the arbitrary in marriage is suicidal to liberty on the part of its pretended friends. A liberal change of law can be expected only from the generally known fact of its evasion, as before augury lost its prestige at Rome it was necessary that the augurs should not be able to look each other in the face without laughing. Yet true and spontaneous monogamists are defended in their tie of mutual exclusivness by their formidable innocence, candor their sole armament. Nowhere more surely than in love, Liberty becomes the mother of order, but to invert the maternity is to insure abortion.

I register in behalf of—not legal or systematic polygamy, but capricious infidelity; an argument which the moralist clergyman, Malthus, took care not to see, for it givs to his problem of the ratio between a population and subsistence a solution as natural as it is immoral.

Polygamy is the complement of labor-saving machinery. By this progress of invention, fewer laborers being needed from decade to decade for the luxury of the employer and exploiter classes, it becomes urgent to weed out the supernumerary laborers whom misery inclines to reaction. Criminal penalties are a costly and inadequate method. The criminal is the germ or else the chrysalid of the rebel. Polygamy disposes toward dueling in the human as in other animals, and thus the males spontaneously thin themselvs out. This philanthropic solution of the problem of Malthus deserves the Monthyon prize. EDGEWORTH.

Political Parties for Liberals.

The associate editor of the Freethinkers' Magazine is a very activ member of Henry George's political party. In the September number of the Magazine he endeavors to serve that party by inducing Freethinkers to support it "to the extent of their means." He bases his plea for aid upon the fact that Dr. McGlynn unreservedly indorses the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and that the United Labor party passed a resolution at its last convention which declares "that under no circumstances should public funds be appropriated for any schools except public schools, nor for the benefit of any charitable or other institutions, unless they are completely under the control and management of the state."

This is a good resolution, and Dr. McGlynn's indorsement of the Nine Demands will commend him to the consideration of Infidels. But one swallow is not generally considered sufficient to induce summer to hasten its coming. We remember that once the Democratic party passed a very good school resolution, and there are hundreds of prominent Democrats who indorse the Nine Demands. When Cleveland was governor of New York he vetoed an appropriation for a Catholic charitable institution. Grant, the great Republican leader, also spoke emphatically in favor of unsectarian schools and of taxing the churches. Hundreds of prominent Republicans also are Freethinkers. Why, then, on the same grounds. should we not support these parties to the extent of our means?

The truth of the matter is, there are Liberal men in all parties—even in the Prohibitionist—and all parties hav been willing to say they were in favor of some of the reforms demanded by the Freethinkers. except, perhaps, Henry George. He was not willing to say in last fall's campaign that he favored any one of the Nine Demands. Notwithstanding this, he was supported by the Infidels of this city almost unanimously. Recent observatious, however, lead us to think that his support this fall from that source will be considerably less.

But that is not material, as Judge Benedict said frequently when Mr. Bennett's lawyers got him into a corner with some point favorable to the Infidel editor. The pcint is that there is no use of Freethinkers making alliances with any politician whose primary object is one which has no relation to Freethought. Nothing will be gained by it. The Liberal planks would be the first ones traded off for support of some other measure. "Love," said Byron, "with man is a thing apart. 'Tis woman's whole existence." With non-liberal parties, Liberal planks are what love is to a man. They should be, instead, what love is to a woman, for no party will establish these reforms unless they are made its whole existence. Until the time is ripe for such a party there is small use in dabbling with politics. Neither the Republican nor Democratic party will make the Nine Demands a part of its platform. The Greenbackers never would. Henry George did not dare to last fall, and would not now. His party hid the one small heresy among the resolutions. Even the Socialists, who are nearly all Infidels, would not do it. All are afraid. The church has terrorized the whole political community. Professed Freethinkers are under the spell, and for all the world knows from themselvs would pass for church-members. The associate editor, even, has hastened to deny that he is or ever was an Atheist.

From all of which the conclusion seems inevitable that there is no call for Freethinkers to support any of the present political parties "to the extent of their means." Besides, we recollect that the same adviser once tried to turn us all over to Ben. Butler.

Is Christianity Down?

Mr. Moncure D. Conway, formerly a preacher, who evoluted from orthodoxy to Unitarianism, and thence to Agnosticism, now says "there is no need of pulling down Christianity—it is down;" and he prophesies that "the world will presently be startled by the miracles of love incarnate in science." THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 6th contains an article by Mr. Conway, entitled, "The Development of the Ape's Religion." Presuming that he does not expect to establish a religious system among cultured chimpanzees, the question arises, Did he, in that "litany to the Eternal Ape," intend to "pull down Christianity," or to inaugurate "love ir carnate in science?"

We are all glad to see such learned doctors of homeopathic divinity as Mr. Conway and Mr. Frothingham quit the pulpit, but let them not delude themselvs with the notion that Christianity has stepped down and out along with them.

Two Priests.

The Baptist preacher Fulton, of Brooklyn, who left his pulpit some months ago to mount the rostrum in an oratorical crusade against the pope, is now bending his energies to convert ex-priest McGlynn to Protestantism of the Baptist variety. Fulton's attack upon the Roman church is the same old tune played by all ministerial Protestant musicians. The pope is Antichrist, and the church of Rome is the scarlet woman, the sum of all abominations. Rome is "run by the devil, and her end hell." Mr. Fulton, therefore, desires Mr. McGlynn "to be born again" to the end that he may step upon Mr. Fulton's platform and denounce his church from a Baptist standpoint. "Forgiv McGlynn," he prayed in Tremont Temple the other night. "Let him see how utterly he is forgetting his high calling in turning his face toward a little lecturing and politics. O God!" he proceeded, "what would hav become of Martin Luther if he had gone to editing a newspaper?"

We oppose the Roman Catholic church as strongly as Dr. Fulton possibly can, but it strikes us that his attack lacks one essential element—namely, common sense Abusing the Roman church because she does not come up to this or that biblical standard is folly. It is like weighing substance in scales of nothing. It is beating the air, and hurts only him that practices it. The Roman Catholic church and her government are the logical conclusion to Christian premises, and to attack the conclusion without destroying the premises is futil effort. At the best, the assailer can but change men from one superstition to another.

Supposing the Catholic church is the scarlet woman, what then? Suppose that, theologically, she is the sum of all abominations, what material harm does that do? One theological abomination or superstition is as good or bad as another. Suppose the church metaphorically corresponds to all the snakes and dragons and horned beasts seen by St. John in his dreams of delirium, what practical result is accomplished when people believe it? Does it make the slavery to priests less galling to her people? Does it add one useful idea to the intelligence of Papists? Does it call one murdered martyr to life? Does it restore one single penny to the robbed poor? Does it repeal a single one of the laws which the church has bought, for her own benefit, of peculating politicians? If not, what is the use of such outpourings of bathos and Baptistism as Fulton givs the people?

In the field into which McGlynn has been forced he is doing infinitly more good than Fulton is. No matter if for the moment McGlynn is occupying an anomalous and logically untenable position. He is showing the people the monstrous evil of allowing a hierarchy to hoist itself upon men's shoulders, to be their guide in every step. He is taking the ecclesiastical machine apart for their inspection, and it will never again run as smoothly as it did. He has convinced thousands that the church is not of so great importance as they thought, and he has proved to them that it works injustice, and is overbearingly tyrannical. Measured by the standard of common sense, Dr. McGlynn's labors are more effectiv and valuable than an army of Fultons' could be.

We do not believe there is much danger of Dr. McGlynn's "coming to Jesus," as he is exhorted to do by Mr. Fulton. When his politics will let him abandon the theological ruts in which he is now running, it is much more probable that Dr. McGlynn will shine as a Rationalist than as a convert, or pervert, to Protestant theology.

Catholic Indian Schools.

A practical commentary upon the supposititious separation of church and state in the United States is a statistical item going around among the religious press. The item shows that the Roman Catholic church has been presented by the general government and the state with no less than fifty-five schools. These schools are scattered over a wide territory. Seven are on the Indian reservation of Standing Rock in Dakota, and seven more are found in the same territory—namely, one each at Table Mountain Reservation, St. John, Yankton, Rosebud Reservation, Crow Creek Agency, and two at Devil's Lake. In Montana there are three schools—at St. Peter's, St. Labre's Mission, and at Flathead Agency. Idaho has two, both at De Smet Mission; Wyoming one, the St. Stephen's Mission; Washington territory three—at Tulalip Agency and two at Colville Agency New Mexico has eleven, and Alaska two. In the states there are also a number—namely, five in Wisconsin, seven in Minnesota, one in Colarado, one in Nevada, one in California, one in Kansas, one in Oregon, and one in Florida. The total attendance at these schools is between three and four thousand.

The teachers of these schools are in all instances Catholics, and a majority are members of the religious orders. The governments pay the bills, giving the churches annually large sums of money and thousands of acres of land.

All our Western correspondents unite in saying that the Indian policy of the government is a failure, and the numerous recent Indian outbreaks and wars confirm this. The present reservation system amounts simply to penning up a few thousand Indians for the churches to practice their arts upon, and everyone knows that as a civilizer the church is a failure.

The support of all the religious schools by the government is a fraud upon the people, a useless waste of money, and an unconstitutional union of church and state.

"Christian Ontology."

We hav been favored with a paper bearing this title by the Hon. Justus O. Wood, of this city. Mr. Woods is a gentleman not unknown to local fame, having been connected with various reformatory movements, and having, also, stood upon the platform of the Manhattan Liberal Club.

Mr. Wood's call to speak just now comes from the fact that the Materialism of philosophy is driving the people to Infidelity and Agnosticism. "Hence," he says, "it is desirable to formulate a theory that shall harmonize and explain the phenomena of life, and dispel the chilling mists of unbelief." Presuming that his reader will admit this necessity, he lays down a foundation for his theory. It is this:

> "Reasoning thereupon we may assume an ego that feels, thinks, and wills; which is conscious of itself, and persists in its personality; that this ego, entity, or soul is robed with a body, or congeries of organs with various functions; that knowledge consists in states of consciousness, as all mental philosophers declare, which may be classified as feeling, thinking, and willing; it is agreed also that there is a power, not of ourselvs, assumed to be an entity, called God, a unit in action and infinit in our apprehension."

Upon this foundation he builds of words a fanciful, metaphysical structure a little more worthless than the Christian theology. But that which we desire to call to Mr. Wood's attention more particularly is the instability of this foundation. "We may assume" an Ego, is not proving that the "Ego" exists. And without such proof it is both unscientific and foolish to proceed farther. We may assume forty thousand things that are not so, and build on these assumptions forty thousand theories which hav no value at all. Mr. Woods guesses that a feeling, thinking, conscious, personal Ego or power exists, and he guesses also that if his first guess is right, then his subsequent guesses are of a superior quality of guesswork, calculated to "dispel the chilling mists of unbelief."

We are afraid Mr. Wood is too sanguin. There are a great many theories for dispelling unbelief in existence now, and to us the necessity of formulating new ones is not so apparent as the necessity of putting the old ones upon a more substantial basis than assumption.

Two Slave Overseers Defied.

The arrogant claims of the authorities of the Roman Catholic church are again brought to public notice. Archbishop Corrigan seems to think his people are slaves, and that he is a divine slave-driver.

There is a German Catholic church at Rondout, N. Y., and, as everyone knows, the Germans are fond of dancing, and drink beer. Last week the church folks held a picnic, in aid of the society for the care of the sick, and Archbishop Corrigan sent the priest a letter forbidding the sale of beer at the picnic and ordering the dancing to cease at six o'clock.

At Kingston, N. Y., there is a Gentleman's Catholic Temperance Society. Week before last the members of this society advertised the usual summer excursion. When the "Very Reverend" James Dougherty, dean of the diocese, saw the advertisment he sent an order to the officers of the society forbidding the excursion.

It is a good sign that the Rondout Germans danced as long as they pleased, and drank beer at their picnic; and that the Gentleman's Catholic Temperance Society went on their excursion as usual. The example of Dr. McGlynn is spreading. A half dozen like him would break down the church's authority and free many of her slaves.

They Are All Good Sectarians.

It is a long time since the church has found comfort and support against the inroads of Liberalism, but here is an item of news which may giv her cheer. It comes, too, from no unnatural quarter.

In Massachusetts there is a city called Springfield, and in that city there is a Christian institution named the Hampden county jail. One hundred and twenty Christians were quartered therein on Sunday, August 7th, in the year of their lord and savior 1887. Of course, in a Christian institution there is a Sunday-school, and on the day mentioned the Sunday-school was in session. After the opening exercises of prayer and a course of catechism, the audience was requested to remain and listen to addresses from Mr. Holt, state organizer of the Massachusetts Prohibitory party, and from Mr. Major, a professional pietist. Under the circumstances, the audience agreed to remain.

Mr. Major is a Canadian, and formerly adhered to the sect known as Roman Catholics. In his address to the Christians temporarily abiding in Hampden county jail he thought it necessary to allude to this change in his mental affairs, and added that he "had never heard the gospel preached in its purity until he heard it in a Protestant church." Now, this may or may not be a statement agreeing with fact—which constitutes Truth—but it certainly is a statement about which there may be two opinions. And though laboring under certain disadvantages for a free and full discussion of the matter, the audience showed itself not insensible to the heresy, from a Roman Catholic view, contained therein. Moreover, most of the audience were of the faith which Mr. Major had discarded. Parenthetically, and not as reflecting upon the zeal of the Protestants, we may remark that it is not an uncommon thing to find a majority of the inmates of such Christian institutions holding that faith. Mr. Major's remarks, therefore, were not received with favor. Prevented by a custom which obtains in Christian houses of worship from refuting the statement, the audience resorted to another custom prevalent in the layer of society in which most of them had previously moved. They began to scrape the floor with their well-shod feet, until Mr. Major's voice was heard only by those next to him, and then various unseen, but powerful-lunged, Christians added the superfluous command to "Shut up!" and "Sit down!" With a devotion to their religion which should enroll them with the church's martyrs, if not in the list of saints, they also refused to join in singing the closing hymn. Thus did they do all in their power to show their adherence to the religion of their childhood, and their aversion to the new sectarianism, amounting in their eyes to downright heresy.

This incident, as we hav said, may encourage Christians. It shows that there is at least one place where Infidelity has not penetrated.

Editorial Notes.

We take back anything we may hav said in praise of the Winsted Press. The editor is not honest in his treatment of those from whom he differs.

The citizens of Atchison, Kan., hav been robbed by their municipal government of $65.000—$50,000 for a Lutheran college, and $15,000 for a Roman Catholic institution of ignorance.

Mr. Lambert, the Waterloo priest, has issued a book called "The Tactics of Infidels." Mr. Lambert found his Waterloo when McArthur got after him, and before he writes books abusing the Infidels he should purge himself of the charge of cowardice in refusing to meet John Remsburg in debate at Buffalo.

The religious press will shortly teem with long and harrowing accounts of the persecution of the meek followers of Jesus by the bloodthirsty adherents of Mohammed. The following dispatch from Bombay tells why: "The Russian mission which recently went to Kashgar has been compelled to return to Khokand. Members of the mission so outraged public opinion in Kashgar by insulting Mohammedan women that a riot against the Russians was provoked. In this several missionaries were killed." It is too bad that the wicked Mohammedans refuse to be converted by the sinless Christians.

The Rev. U. D. Gulick is a good specimen of a ministerial dead beat. He belongs in Brooklyn. Four years ago he confessed to his congregation that he was in debt $4,000. The consistory assumed the debt, raised the money, and discharged the obligation. Mr. Gulick, however, did not learn a lesson by this extreme kindness, and on July 1st last an ice dealer sued him for $300. On July 11th the consistory held a meeting, and the pastor confessed that he owed no less than $15,000. Then Mr. Gulick was informed that he could hav up till next July to find another charge, as he was not the kind of a man they wanted. The reverend gentleman is now on a vacation in the Far West.

In E. H. Heywood's Word for September, Mr. C. Severance says:

"The Truth Seeker, under the management of its present editor, is mighty 'pure;' there is little danger of Comstock's finding in it anything offensiv on the sex question. Intellect without courage never performs wonders; though there are brains enough in the Truth Seeker office, the courage of D. M. Bennett departed with him. The milk-and-water manner in which Macdonald deals with Elmina's case shows how little real interest he takes in the matter; he seems afraid of being contaminated with social impurity, and writes with gloves on when touching her case. He will escape the smut of 'obscenity,' retain his immaculate pulchritude, and never, never transgress 'law' made to regulate sex-intercourse and hav people 'virtuous.'"

We are pleased to hav Mr. C. Severance write of us as he does.

At the first session of the German Roman Catholic Central Union of America, held in Chicago, September 5th, the following resolution was warmly and almost unanimously supported:

"Whereas, The so-called Knights of Labor come forth from day to day with their talk for the purpose of helping the workingmen to their rights by unrighteous means, and trampling law and order under foot, and try to destroy scriptural faith; therefore be it hereby

"Resolved, That we urge all Catholic working people to keep away from said societies, for, according to our experience, such company is not advisable for Catholic working people, for where Prohibitionists, Anarchists, and Socialists assemble to consult about the welfare of mankind there should not be found any German Catholic workingmen. In order to protect the good name of German Catholic societies from injury, all societies should be exhorted not to receive in their midst any Knights of Labor, and such as are already in them should be induced to leave said order of the Knights of Labor."

From this it will be seen that affairs in labor, church, and foreign race societies are getting mixed.

Three months ago, as the London Standard is informed by its Cairo correspondent, Mr. Charles Neufield, a merchant trading in the Soudan, was captured by the followers of the present Mahdi. The simple alternativ was laid before him of renouncing the faith of Christianity and professing Mohammedanism, or death. Thereupon Mr. Neufield made this formal declaration:

"'In the name of God and His Prophet!' 'Mohammed of the Islims.'—From Addrabbus Abdallah of Muslemani (Charles Neufield).—When I departed from Assouan with Saleh's men, having arms and ammunition sent to him by government, we reached Selima Wells without hindrance. After taking water we went on. We were met by some Mahdists, and a fight ensued. We had fifty-five men. More men of the opposit side came up, belonging to Abd el Rahman el Negoume. We were beaten, some being slain, the rest being made prisoners. All our arms and ammunition were taken. We were all taken to Abd el Rahman el Negoume at Dongola, who sent us on to Omderman to be brought before the successor of the Mahdi. We expected death, but our lord graciously forgave us on condition of becoming Moslems. We did so, and cried aloud before him that there is no god but one God—and Mohammed is his prophet. We then made a declaration that we believed in the Mahdi (present) I fully believe in the truth of Moslemism. I was pardoned by the kaliph, and escaped the death I deserved for being an infidel. Thanks to his bounty. Dafalla el Hagal deceived me, but through his baseness I hav reached felicity. Saleh Fadlalleh ran away. I thank Allah in that I am alive and in happiness.

"May 11, 1887 (17 Shaban, 1304)."

The Moslems are truer to their faith and old-time practices than the Christians. Both used to do this sort of thing.

Personalities.

The Independent Pulpit for September says: "The New York Truth Seeker has conferred a favor upon its readers by the publication in serial chapters of a paper by Felix L. Oswald on 'The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism.' Mr. Shaw is right. Dr. Oswald's papers are valuable indeed, containing as they do practical instruction for the present well-being of the world."

T. B. Wakeman, we learn through a religious journal, has informed the New York Times, which referred to him as "Atheist Wakeman," that he "is not and never was an Atheist, in the common, or in any, meaning of that term." As the common meaning of the term is "one who denies the existence of a supreme intelligent being," this denial will be a revelation to Mr. Wakeman's friends.

The Ironclad Age says: "We observe that Ex-Rev. S. P. Putnam, who has run the Secular Union the past year, has fixed on Chicago as the place of the annual meeting, and October as the time. He has also decided to reëlect himself as rambling 'secretary'—the sole authorized lecturer and oracle of 'Secularism.'" As we remarked on a previous occasion, Dr. Monroe always writes good-naturedly, but is sometimes misunderstood. The good nature of the above paragraph protrudes prominently, but somehow we fancy it will not be misunderstood.

The Editor of our Children's Corner is summering at Onset Bay, the Spiritualist camp-ground she has written up so prettily. Once upon a time Miss Wixon entertained Spiritualistic views, but not lately. Previous to that she was a Universalist. Miss Wixon's hundreds of little friends will be pleased to know that she is handsome, wears her hair short, and used to be a school-teacher. Her father was a large mill-owner at Fall River, and when his operativs went on strike she took their part and made speeches in their meetings. Her "Apples of Gold" and "Story Hour" hav been given to thousands of children.

John E. Remsburg delivers annually more Infidel lectures than any other man in the country. S. P. Putnam has pressed him hard the last year, but Mr. Remsburg's record goes back farther than the Union secretary's. Mr. Remsburg is a slim brunet, of quiet demeanor and firm purpose. He rarely departs from the text of his lectures in their delivery, but in a debate, with no time for preparation, he is equally ready. His strong point is facts, volumes of which he has at his command with which to overwhelm opponents. He knows more about the New Testament than the men who wrote it, and on the Sunday question he can outtalk a Seventh Day Adventist. He was a soldier at sixteen, a school-teacher after the war, and left the pedagog's bench for the platform. He owns a farm in Kansas, where he shines as a pomologist.

A Tennessee Opinion of Political Preachers.

From the National Review, Anti-Prohibitionist.

Sensible business men look with equal dread upon the possible political domination of the saloons and that of the preachers.

The Prohibition contest has narrowed down to an issue between the saloons and the political preachers—the two chief spiritual nuisances of the age.

Preachers who don't even pay a poll tax and who liv altogether by public charity can better than anybody else afford to ridicule the consideration of the revenue feature of a great economic question.

Every Protestant preacher in the land loudly condemns the Catholic church for its intervention in the state affairs of Europe, and yet a good many of these same Protestant preachers are daily endeavoring to engraft their peculiar religious notions into the constitutions of states in this Union.

The preachers in the Southern Methodist church did more than any other single agency on the earth to bring about the late Rebellion. They talked politics on the streets and on the highways; they wrote politics in their religious journals; they preached politics from the pulpits and proclaimed the divine right of slavery until red-handed war rent the nation asunder, swallowed up the treasures of the land, and sent a half-million people to bloody graves. Thus hav we had a very large and expensiv lesson on the subject of political preachers. Wisdom admonishes us to profit by it.

SOME WHEREASES AND ONE RESOLVED.

Whereas, A Baptist preacher, late of Chattanooga, was guilty of a gross violation of good morals and a grievous sin against society, in that he was detected in criminal relations with a female of questionable repute; and

Whereas, A Presbyterian preacher of Atlanta went to Cincinnati, got on a bender, and raised Cain to the evil example of all like offenders, and against the peace and dignity of society; and

Whereas, The Rev. Bays, a Southern Methodist preacher of Knoxville, had to leave the city three weeks ago, in the night time, for outraging society by becoming a seducer; and

Whereas, The Rev. Longbottom, a preacher from Blount county, went to the hotel at Knoxville recently and registered a woman whom he had ruined as his wife, taking rooms with her, contrary to good morals and to the higher usages of society; and

Whereas, The Rev. Gambel, or some such name, an Episcopal preacher of Jackson, Tenn., was recently shot on the streets by an irate husband for criminally destroying the domestic felicity of the assailant, the same being opposed to good morals, and calculated to unduly disturb society; and

Whereas, Numerous and divers other instances might be mentioned wherein preachers hav figured conspicuously as instrumentalities for shocking society and lowering the standard of morality; therefore be it

Resolved, That the constitution of the state be so amended as to prohibit the manufacture of preachers by the various colleges of the country, the public morals requiring it.

Letters from Friends.

CENTRAL CITY, NEB., Aug. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me your journal for three months more. You can consider me a regular subscriber. I am a poor mechanic, but I am not orthodox. I would rather giv $50 to the Infidel cause than 50 cents to a church. We hav nine churches here in a town of one thousand five hundred inhabitants. E. M. ELLITHORP.

ELK GROVE, CAL., Aug. 10, 1887.

MR EDITOR: I know I am a little short, but I inclose $5 for two years from last April; would hav sent the money sooner, but was waiting on some half-hearted Freethinkers to get some more subscribers for the grand old paper, but it was no go; they hav promised and promised until I hav become tired. We would love, oh, so much, to hav C. B. Reynolds at our little village, when he comes to the Golden state. My pious regards to Miss Wixon, John Peck, and Watson Heston. Long may they liv. JACK COTTRELL.

STEVENSVILLE, MON. TER., Aug. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $10 inclosed, for which send us five subscriptions of THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. I reside on Bitter Root Valley and hav for the last thirteen years. I hail from Illinois. Our beautiful valley is outdone and overrun with sectarian preachers. I would like well to hav some Freethought and reform man come here and lecture. I am the getter up of the club which I send. I stumbled on a copy of your TRUTH SEEKER and, on inquiry, I found Mr. Warner is taking it, who, I believe, is the only such person in the valley. JAMES PHELPS, SR.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., Aug. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith send three dollars for a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER in advance. I would like to extend your circulation if I knew how to accomplish it. Out of the whole number of the people there appear to be but few real readers. I must or cannot but revere the paper on account of my admiration of its founder, whom I supposed likely to liv longer than myself, for I am now nearly eighty and cannot do much anyway. I consider the paper very good, yet as to the matter of the pictures I suppose the conductors of the paper to be much more likely to judge correctly of that than I am. WM. NEWMAN.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Aug. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: A few weeks ago I forwarded a check to your office of $5 in payment of two years' subscription. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 20th R. S. D. said he believed that land belonged to the human family, like the atmosphere and sunlight, and I say it is true. Therefore, the United States government will giv away farms of one hundred and sixty acres free of cost. All that a person has got to do is to select a vacant piece of United States government land; send in his application; then settle, improve and enjoy it like the free atmosphere and sunlight. It is not in the power of the government to do any more. If the Socialists desire land they must make application to the government for it; they can get all they want for nothing.

AUGUST BUESING.

On last Saturday evening about suudown, on the Sterling Johnson place, two and a half miles southeast of Milan, six angels were seen to fly down into the yard of Mrs. Wood, a widow lady. It seems that Mrs. Wood was very ill and several ladies were present attending to the wants of the sick, when a noise in the yard attracted their attention. Upon looking out of the window they saw an angel, and in a moment more it was joined by five others. They were there only a few moments, and took their flight, flying straight until lost from view. They, with the exception of wings, were in the form and shape of man, with clear cut and finely formed features, and were clothed with garments of pure and spotless white, while a halo of heavenly light encircled their heads. The above was told to us as the truth, and can be vouched for by the ladies in attendance upon Mrs Wood. Be that as it may, it has created considerable excitement in the neighborhood.—Milan Exchange, Gibson Co., Tenn:

COALTON, KY., Aug. 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: From the inclosure you will see the angels hav been visiting in Tennessee, and as angels' visits are so few and far between, I concluded to send you the account of the same, and hope you will not hav the audacity to doubt the truth of the statement. S. P. HERRON, P.M.

ASHTABULA, O., Aug. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I was very much taken with the idea contained in the inclosed article in the Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette:

Bitterness of feeling is becoming intense between the Roman Catholics of German and Irish descent in the Northwest. This is to be regretted. The fostering of foreign national animosities among American citizens under any pretext, or for any cause, is a positiv injury to the republic. As a means of prevention in such case we would kindly suggest to all concerned the example set by the Protestant Episcopal church in the early days of the nation. It laid aside its foreign ecclesiastical allegiance, and became an American church without deviating from the doctrins or dogmas of the church of England in matters of faith and morals. Should the members of the Roman Catholic church in America pursue the same course there is much reason to think that the grounds of such dissensions would be largely removed. Whatever may be our religious creeds, political beliefs, or social ethics, we should all be Americans, and the name of no other nationality be recognized among our citizens.

If the doctor could induce his fellow-Catholics to throw off the authority of the pope, and start an American Catholic church entirely independent of Rome, how very much better citizens they would become. There would then be no reason for them to swear allegiance to the United States with a reservation, as they hav to do now, for their first allegiance is to the pope, and we all know he claims to be above all states or other governments. It is impossible to serve two masters, and while they owe allegiance to the pope they can not be true citizens of the United States; they cannot even own their own churches, but all church property is held in trust by the bishops for the propaganda in Rome, Italian aliens. How much more independent they would be as strictly American Catholics, owing no allegiance to any foreign potentate whatever, and keeping the millions of property in their own hands. If Dr. McGlynn can bring about this he will be the greatest benefactor to the United States as well as the Catholic church the world has yet seen, and the times seem opportune for such a movement. Let American Catholics throw off the Romish yoke and become American citizens indeed. Let them keep the deeds of the vast amount of church property that is theirs by right out of the hands of the blood-sucker of Rome, and manage their own affairs as all independent Americans do. If Dr. McGlynn will advocate this I am mistaken if a large majority of the Catholic population does not join him with a will that will be perfectly irresistible. J. DOWNES.

NEW YORK, Aug. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Boston's great mathematical genius, G. N. Hill, evades the proffered bet. He is not willing to abide the test of his assertion that his so-called Freethought calendar started with and from the 1st of January, 1600, counting now 287 is all right; which I controvert as a gross error of fact, because it counts one year short, as 288 is correct.

He avoids the real question above and catches at a straw, juggler like. Let us now examin his offer which he calls "generous and praiseworthy." He seems to hav a "Paine Hall share" and is willing to part with it, but I hav no knowledge whether it is worth anything or nothing, and of course if worthless, or nearly so, what good would it do THE TRUTH SEEKER? Then he wants me to giv a share, or $25, to Mr. Seaver first; thereafter he will write to get a decision, holding meanwhile his share himself. Who ever heard of such an arrangement before? His writing might not giv the true question in discussion. For the last time I will offer this: Let us ask the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER to send for a decision by a professor of mathematics in one of the named colleges, this question: "If a calendar is started from and with the first day of January, 1600, what is the number of the year to count now?" Under the decision, to be plain, the professor shall sign his name for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and maybe in other papers.

Now, if Mr. Hill will promis to put up the money or a certified check of $25, I will deposit first my $25 with THE TRUTH SEEKER, whose Editor is personally unknown to me, and within eight days after Mr. Hill is notified he shall deposit his money, not a share, with THE TRUTH SEEKER. If not complied with I shall be at liberty to withdraw because of Mr. Hill's failure to deposit. When both deposits are made, then let the Editor take the trouble to write for a decision; if I win, THE TRUTH SEEKER shall hav the gain; if Mr. Hill wins, he shall be at liberty to pocket it if it suits him.

If this offer does not suit Mr. Hill, any other substitute of the 287 guard is welcome to take it up. FRED. KOEZLY.

FORT BASSINGER, FLA., July 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been rambling some about the state since I wrote before and hav never been able to get THE TRUTH SEEKER regularly, but I got a lot when I reached Kissimmee City on my way up, and another lot at Charlotte Harbor some time ago. I suppose my time is about out, and as soon as I hit communication again I will send a little money. My trip from Charlotte Harbor up the Caloochie-hatchie, through Okeechobee, up the Kissimmee, and through Lake Kissimmee, Hatchenbaw, Syphrus, and Tobopeklega to Kissimmee City would be interesting to those who love nature and beautiful wilds. I left Kissimmee for Gainesville, and farther up the state I met old friends I had not seen for six years, whom I had left as a poor wandering missionary, setting forth hoping to be able to shed a little light of reason and truth in the dark places where few, if any, had found it. I wished to teach all to walk by the plumb-line of rectitude, to love each other, and love the great universal animating power which I call God. I met with varied success. Sometimes many believed; but, alas! the blatant, pulpit-pounding, hell-fire and brimstone shouters drive reason from man. But here I was again, after six years' warfare in the wilds of south Florida. Those six years would make a history. My old friends gathered around, and the crowds I spoke to reached away up in the hundreds. The six years' absence, I suppose, caused many to come and see me, but I think a belief in common sense, equity, and evolution is taking possession of the people. I hope so. I returned to Kissimmee City, took command of the schooner Arcadia, and ran her down to Charlotte Harbor. There was a bar on the schooner, and sometimes the boys along the river (cow-boys) would get rather full, but we had no great trouble until I reached the quarantine boats lying awaiting such as we who should come up from Punta Rassa. These I was forced to run, as I had no clearance papers, and I supposed the cargo would be confiscated if captured. It was daylight, and a quarter-stern wind which rose to a gale, and the chase became exciting. The two sloops were about one mile astern. As I was about to round Punta Gorda, a blizzard struck me and snapped my foremast. I lowered away the foresail. My jib still hung by the splintered mast. I ran my flag up, Union down, payed off the main-sheet, got before the wind, and continued the race. As I hove anchor at Charlotte Harbor the foremost sloop was off about a cable's length. We had some trouble, and I passed on to the United States revenue cutter and turned my schooner over to Rev. F. U. Durrence, United States officer. Thus ends the first cruise of the Arcadia. I took the first train for Fort Ogden. Then came a lonely walk through the wilds for one hundred miles. I saw much baleful country and much waste land, many cattle, and not a few deer, and some turkeys. My sloop, the Lucy H., is here. My wife and boys are also here. I shall rest a little, then go down to Charlotte Harbor, where I hope to get more TRUTH SEEKERS.

While I was in Palatka I spent a day or two with our good friend Morse, who is a business partner of Mrs. Vorce. That puts me in mind that I attended a Spiritual sit at her house, Mrs. Vorce being the medium. I hav but little faith in what I saw there, though I hope all were sincere, for I should hate to think they did not believe it themselvs. They are kind people, but I could not find the thing I long hav sought (a spirit).

I am glad those flags did not come South. It could not hav made the rising generation feel more patriotic to see the battle-torn flags their fathers fought and died under. They should always remain among the boys or the children of the boys who took them. REV. SAML. B. HURLBUT.

NEW CASTLE, WASH. TER., Aug. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The war I announced is over, and we are now gathering in the spoils in the shape of nine new subscribers. Pretty good—don't you think so? General Samuel P. Putnam took the lead, and led us on to a grand victory. He charged the enemy with his "Universal Mental Liberty" and his "New Heaven and Earth," and you may guess at the commotion that followed. I thought that we would hav another Uriah transaction, but we had prepared for any emergency of the kind, although some wanted to hang him, others to tar and feather him, others dynamite him; but he got out all right after selling from thirty to thirty-five dollars' worth of books, which will prepare his way for the next tour out here. We had splendid audiences both nights, but what created great animosity in the bosom of our Christian friends was that the band boys turned out to serenade my preacher, as they called Mr. Putnam here; but for all that, it made our hearts feel kind of gay under the influence of such sweet music.

Yours fraternally, JENKIN MORGAN.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Aug. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The social problem being squarely made a political issue, I will suggest the expediency of the politician reformers giving us a logical definition of the term monopoly. For, unless they giv us an intelligent definition of the term, I think their tirades against monopoly should seem like sounding brass—plenty of sound, too much brass, and hollow as a bubble. Though none should need to be informed of the self-evident fact that exclusiv ownership constitutes monopoly, it appears that everybody has need to be reminded of the equally evident fact that private ownership, being necessarily exclusiv, is monopoly per se, irrespectiv of the amount owned or the pretense on which ownership is assumed. Therefore I think it should seem absurdly inconsistent to rail against monopoly, and advocate and foster a principle from which monopoly is inseparable and without which monopoly is impossible. Nevertheless, such appears to be the position generally taken by professional advocates of reform; and their taking that position is somewhat suggestiv to my view that none need reforming more than do the reformers themselvs.

"Labor advocates" assume that human labor creates all wealth; on that questionable assumption they further assume that those who perform the labor should hav an exclusiv right to all wealth. That looks very like monopoly in another disguise, and can hardly fail to be the same monster of inequity in that disguise that he is in all others, notwithstanding the pretense of his being an honest workingman. Therefore until professional advocates of social reform can unanimously agree to accept the self-evident fact that, by the law of our being, every individual inherits an equal right to liv and to the means of living, irrespectiv of all other considerations than the fact of his being, I shall think it advisable to hav an army in readiness to prevent them and their dupes asserting the right to establish monopoly on a broader and firmer base than it now has. Hence, the social problem is resolved into the simple question of whether private ownership, monopoly, is a just or unjust principle. If it is a just principle, it should not produce unjust results, and no reform should be needed or called for. If it is an unjust principle, we should not reasonably expect to get just results from it, hence it should necessarily be abolished to initiate reform.

Private ownership of wealth gave birth to the laws we hav and made them a necessity; therefore nothing will be gained by repealing the laws unless we abolish the cause of them. I hav not yet made the discovery that private ownership of wealth is so prolific of facilities for working people procuring the means of living that they can well afford to dispense with any of them. It requires millions of days' work to pay the interest on the national debt; hence it givs employment to thousands that enables them to acquire the means of living. So does the army and navy. So does the liquor traffic. That traffic is peculiarly exempt from the charge of coercing people through their necessities to support it. Therefore I shall fail to see that the working people will be benefited by abolishing them unless other facilities for procuring the means of living are amply provided. Hence, when we hav a system established that will secure ample means of living to every individual, man, woman, and child, without resort to base practices, we shall hav a healthy, vigorous, and progressiv reform movement inaugurated. I shall fail to see any reasonable hope of reform on other terms or conditions.

The individualist is unwilling to accept reform on those conditions because they necessarily involve collectivism. Nevertheless, I think he will not undertake to dispute the self-evident fact that the human race are gregarious; instinctivly inclined to collectivism for mutual protection and social enjoyment, and to mutually assist each other. But private ownership throws every individual upon his individual resources, and compels him to be an individualist, practically, whether he has a desire to be or not. Hence private ownership is the fundamental principle of individualism, and individualists are themselvs dissatisfied with the result; but instead of reform they propose progress from bad to worse by repealing all laws. I think they had better not, for the laws are the only salvation of their pet institution.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed in another letter you will find $1.50 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another six months. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better than all the papers I ever read—wicked as it is. Heston is leaving the monkey out sometimes. Send the "righteous citizen" along; he or she is in the right place every time. We can't do without our ancestor. I wish THE TRUTH SEEKER and our cause grand success and a glorious victory for humanity's sake. But, great eternal, what a fight there is ahead! T. H. MONTGOMERY.

SALEM, NEB., Aug. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Brother Bell's sojourn here was an intellectual treat to the Liberals. He delivered three of his splendid lectures, among which were many beautiful thoughts that will, I believe, help to develop individuality in everyone that heard them. Below is an agreement by Rev. Williamson and W. S. Bell to be fulfilled during the fall:

"We, whose names are hereon, agree to discuss the following propositions:

"1. Resolved, That Christ is a historic character, the logos of God, and hence the savior of the world. Affirmativ, T. J. Williamson.

"2. Resolved, That the Bible is of human origin, and not a revelation from God. Affirmativ, W. S. Bell."

None of the Christians doubt the elder's "ability to handle the subject in a most affable manner" (local paper).

Ever yours, T. P. BEINEGAR.

PINE RIVER, COL., Aug. 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It might be to the benefit of some syndicate or colonists to know where to get a fine tract of government land, estimated variously at from ten thousand to twenty thousand acres, susceptible of irrigation, water power immense. The water will hav to be taken out in a ditch about fifteen miles long. It is right in the heart of the finest stock country now extant, and right on the railroad. The altitude is about six thousand feet, and in as healthy a country as there is in the world, splendid for fruit, and mountain scenery. The climate is delightful.

Now, if any person or corporation wants further particulars, they will please address me at my office. It is a fine opening for a colony.

Please insert this in your valuable paper as a letter, and oblige Yours, not for Christ's sake, but for the sake of humanity, E. KEITH.

WINDOM, KAN., Aug. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I suppose you claim to be what your "Infiddle paper," as the Catholic from Cork terms it, implies. If so, will you insert the following facts of my experience in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which do away with cold Materialism in my case forever? The light of a new belief, nay, a positiv knowledge, has dawned upon me.

About a year ago, being badly broken down in health, from overwork at farming, I had a serious illness, during which whispering voices began to speak to me, which came from the viewless air. These voices claimed to be the voices of those who had died, relativs, friends, etc., but mostly those of strangers, who appeared to be solicitous about my health and gave me good advice in regard thereto.

During my sickness I was sadly mistreated by a member of the medical fraternity, who, I am sorry to think, had the greenback god instead of the fear of the Lord before his eyes, and had he not been discharged, I should probably now be among these unseen people instead of conversing with them across the line—for at the present time they can talk to me better than ever.

Since my Sangrado's departure they hav taken charge of my case entirely, and benefited my health materially by treating me to electric shocks, manipulating my person in various ways, and administering, by nasal inhalation, fragrant herb and delicious, fruitlike-smelling medicins. Whoever they are, these people are far better educated and more refined than I am.

They inform me that the reason they can influence me so well is that, owing to my peculiar physical organization, condition of health, their manipulations, etc., the spiritual part of my being—sight, hearing, etc.—is becoming preternaturally developed.

They not only talk to me as familiarly as those of my own family, but represent to my vision lifelike-looking people, animals, specimens of architecture, beautiful scenery, and flowers in brilliant colors of various hues.

They claim to know what is going on in our world better than we do ourselvs, notwithstanding our telegraphs, railroads, newspapers, etc.

They claim that every distinct thought, prominent act, and thing seen by the eyes of a mortal is plainly impressed on the cells of the brain and can be viewed by them at any time. In proof of this, they told me of acts in my past life which I had forgotten for years.

They appear to be desirous that people here should understand these things—particularly that, when death comes, their real persons liv on, unperceived by their friends because they are spiritually blind, and that the better lives they liv in this their first conscious state of existence, the better prepared they will be to enter the next, which is the true life, and a state of rational enjoyment according as they become fitted for it, untrammeled by earthly care and drudgery, and everlasting. So we may truly say of the soul, in the words of Addison's "Cato;"

> The stars shall fade away, the sun
> Himself shall die, and nature sink in years,
> But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,
> Unhurt amidst the war of elements,
> The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds.

Although they inform me about things in their world as fast as I can comprehend them, which they call fundamental truths, they are not always in a serious mood, but appear to believe in the old saw:

> A little nonsense now and then
> Is relished by the best of men.

I hav laughed heartily at many a fine joke from one who claims to hav been a humorist well known on earth several years ago. In fact, each one who talks with me—and I hav a good many invisible visitors—has a distinct individuality, the same as mortals.

To conclude, I know very little about Spiritualism, as taught by its earthly advocates. I saw just enough of its manifestations years ago to excite my ridicule. Having a knack at rhyming, I even went so far as to satirize it in a metrical composition, which I was vain enough at the time to think very smart, but which looks a little queer to me now in the light of my present knowledge—for I suppose mine to be a case of genuin Spiritualism.

By the way, I see you advertise a book, written by an M.D., on "The Treatment of Mediomania." I merely mention it out of curiosity, for I hav no use for the book. In my present state of mind, I would rather not be cured of it. On the contrary, I really hope the disease will become more prevalent, and in good time be universally acknowledged as a means to the truth which all men must realize some time.

I now look upon Spiritualism as the most rational doctrin in regard to nature's final disposition of the human race ever taught to man.

Its earthly teachers are not trained in a theological school, but constitute a certain few of our race who seem to be marked by nature's self for their calling, and who, under favorable circumstances, become fully developed and inspired by those who appear to understand the art, and certainly "know whereof they speak." N. S.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Aug. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: If there is anything that I dislike to do it is to occupy the precious space in our greatest champion, THE TRUTH SEEKER, simply for the purpose of quibbling.

I am aware that dullness of comprehension is one of the worst faults of the human mind, and, too often, it is the result of neglect of proper mental exertion. In our TRUTH SEEKER of August 13, 1887, our beloved Malcolm tried to show that money is not a measure of values, and that a yard stick is a measure of distance, because distance is definit, while values fluctuate. To which I would say that distance also may fluctuate, and the unit of distance-measure may fluctuate by expansion and contraction, as does a surveyor's chain, by and through the changes of temperature. The distance between two ships upon the water may change (fluctuate) as may the value of Mr. Malcolm's horse. But at the time the comparison is made of the yardstick with the distance between the ships, it is found that the yardstick "goes into," or is contained in the distance a certain number of times, with or without a remainder. And this comparison is called measurement, just as the value of the horse, when established or agreed upon, is compared with the unit of value-measure, which, in the United States, is the dollar, and which may "go into," or be contained in, the value of the horse a certain number of times, with or without a remainder. Not that the dollar establishes the value of the horse any more than the yardstick establishes the distance between the ships. Supply and demand cause the establishment of value, while other conditions cause that of distance; and the value, when once fixed, ascertained, or agreed upon, is measured by, compared with, and expressed in dollars just as distance, when ascertained, is measured by, compared with, and expressed in yards.

A wealth-measure (dollar) established as I suggested in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 18, 1887, would be as nearly stable as is the surveyor's chain made of iron, while the dollar, made of or based upon gold or silver, regardless of its volume, is about as would be a surveyor's chain made of indiarubber. When buying land the surveyor, when measuring it, might stretch out his indiarubber chain to thrice, and, when selling land, he might measure it with his rubber chain at its normal length, just as the bankers do with money.

To illustrate, I will say that in 1879 some capitalists in Europe and America concocted a scheme to conquest, financially, Mexico. They first ascertained that the money in that county was of silver, and that the volume thereof was about $5 per capita, and that the wages of the average laborer there was about $5 per month including his food and lodging. They also knew that if they could obtain a permit to increase the volume of money in Mexico from $5 to $30 per capita, the wages of the average laborer would then increase from $5 to about $30 per month. They also knew that railroads in Mexico could not be made to yield a profitable income. But, in order, that the Mexican Congress might not be able to discern the trickery of their scheme, those foreign capitalists planted some non-paying railroads in that country, so that the boom that they were about inaugurating there, and the consequent prosperity of the industries of the people, might falsely be attributed to the railroads. They then sent the renowned capitalist-aiding General Grant, under instructions, over to Mexico, and he prevailed upon the over-awed, elated, and astounded Mexican Congress to enact a law which provided that whenever a banker in any of the principal cities of that country could show that he had one million silver Mexican dollars in his safe, and other property to the value of two million Mexican silver dollars, he might, upon that security, issue $2,000,000 in bank bills (paper money). This security was to be appraised every month by a board of appraisers appointed by the government, and the banker was obliged to publish his balance-sheet once every month in a prominent newspaper in the city wherein the bank was situated. Banks were then established in all the principal cities in Mexico, and all those bankers began to issue their paper money, paying it out for real estate which they bought.

For an example I will refer to the house and lot, No. 50 Commerce street, in Mexico City, which, under a volume of money of $5 per capita, was worth $10.000. The banker bought this house, and also many others, and paid $10,000 of his brand-new paper money for it. The man of whom the banker bought the house, having his pockets full of money, began to make many purchases of things that he fancied he stood in need of, as did many others who had sold houses to the bankers, and for various amounts.

Thus, in 1881, business in Mexico boomed as it did in no other country. Labor advanced in price from 20 cents to $1 a day, because dollars were abundant and cheap. The volume of money there had been increased from $5 to $30 per capita, and, of course, as would hav been the case with apples, or with anything else, dollars were abouts six times cheaper than they, prior thereto, had been. Each house, being an embodiment of so much labor, arose in value in the same proportion as did labor in any other form, till in 1883 the aforesaid house at No. 50 Commerce street was worth $60.000, and the appraisers were compelled to appraise it at that amount, as well as all other houses of that class that the banker had bought. And thus the wealth of his bank amounted to many millions, while his issue of paper money was only two millions, and, of course, it always remained at par with silver dollars. Then, in 1883, all those bankers in Mexico began to sell real estate. The house at No. 50 Commerce street was sold for $60,000, one-half cash, the balance to be paid in three yearly payments together with 10 per cent interest thereon.

The banker received the cash payment, $30,000 (the original cost of three such houses) in his own bank bills, and immediately burnt it up, saying, "There, that is $30,000 of my paper issue honestly redeemed."

At the end of the first year, the purchaser of the house walked into the bank and paid the first yearly instalment, $13,000, and, as before, the banker committed it to the flames. This was repeated at the end of the second year, and all the paper money the banker had issued had been thus redeemed and burnt up; leaving in circulation, in Mexico, but $5 per capita of silver money, and of course this house and lot were worth, as before, under a like volume of money, $10,000. At the end of the third year, the purchaser, owing principal and interest, $11,000, walked into the bank and told the banker that he had no money with which to pay it; that a terrible money panic had prevailed throughout Mexico during the last past year, and that he had found it a difficult task to keep his family from starvation. To which the banker replied saying, "Well, then I must foreclose the lien that I reserved against the property to secure the prompt payment of the purchase money. Pizness is pizness." The property was then sold at auction, and the banker bid it in at $10,500; leaving the purchaser still in debt to him, by promissory note, to the amount of $500; and ever since that time Mexico has been the dullest country out of doors. Those bankers all operated together, as do the national bankers throughout the United States, and now they own (or hold) a great portion of the most valuable property in the principal cities in Mexico; having treated the people there just as the bankers hav treated the people throughout the United States, through every money panic that has cursed our country.

Thus it may be seen how and why the total real and personal wealth of New York city, with a population of about 265,000, in 1836, amounted to $309,500,920, and, in 1850, when the wealth and population of that city had more than doubled that of 1836, the total value of her real and personal property amounted to but $286,061,816.

Every person who had, under an inflated volume of money, contracted to pay dollars, and was, thereafter, compelled to pay those dollars, under a contracted (reduced) volume of money, was robbed, world without end!

I don't mean to say that I hav stated the condition of affairs in Mexico exactly as it was, but nearly so, and sufficiently so for illustration.

We are just now, throughout the United States (Benighted States) entering upon another of those horrid money panics. The amount of money in the United States now is about $18 per capita. But $653,000,000 (about $11 per capita) of it is, by and through over-taxation, cornered, locked up in our treasury at Washington; leaving in circulation but $7 per capita among the people. I sincerely hope that none of the truth seekers owes dollars upon his home that fall due and must be paid under such a contracted condition of our money.

If the capitalists in America hav combined with those of Europe, wheat may go down in price, next year, to twenty-five cents per bushel; and all other wealth into which labor may hav been converted may go down in proportion; in which case railroad charges should be proportionately reduced; else the capitalist with his railroad will, as usual, get three times his share of wealth.

The capitalistic element corner money just as they do wheat, and if one is compelled to pay dollars when dollars are scarce and dear, he is in the same predicament that he would be in if he were obliged to deliver wheat when wheat might be scarce and dear. It is not a shrinkage in values; it is an increase in the wealth-measuring capacity of the dollar. Hoping that I may not hav failed to make this matter at least fully as clear as mud, and that our readers and thinkers may read this in connection with my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 18th, I am,

Respectfully, GEORGE NEWTON.

Very Cheap Pamphlets.

We hav on hand a large number of the following of COLONEL INGERSOLL'S pamph ets, which will be disposed of at cost, as fol ows:

Ingersoll Catechised:

His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the Editor of the "San Franciscan;" singly, 3 cents; per dozen, 30 cents; per hundred, $2.00.

ORTHODOXY,

A lecture, fifty-four closely printed large 12mo pages, 10 cents; fifteen, $1; and $6 per hundred.

Civil Rights Speech,

Including the address of Frederick Douglas, fifty-three-large octavo pages, singly, 10 cents; fifteen for $1; and $6 per hundred.

The Truth of History,

This is a comment by Colonel Ingersoll upon the religious lies that hav been told about himself, and first made its appearance in these columns. Price 3 cents; 30 cents per dozen; $2 per hundred.

BIBLE IDOLATRY,

A letter Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the editor of the London "Secular Review." Price 3 cents; 30 cents per doz., or $2 per hundred.

INGERSOLL ON McGLYNN,

Being the comments and opinions of Mr. Ingersoll upon the fight in the Catholic church between the late pastor of St. Stephen's and his employer, the pope. Price 3 cents; 30 cents per doz., or $2 per hundred.

We suggest that these be purchased in quantities, and given away to Christians, and it is with that not unreasonable exp ctation that the prices hav been placed so low.

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Information as to Our Future Home.

The St. Louis Christian Advocate, Methodist, knows all about hell, and describes it as follows: "Hell is a place, as heaven is a place, as earth is a place. It is located somewhere in the wide realms of God. It has its center and its frontier, a real place, not an airy state, intangible and dreamy, but real, as earth is real. Men and women are there who used to walk the streets of earth or liv in its beautiful homes; they are there, their identity felt and recognized, their citizenship in hell declared and established. It is a created place, prepared by God; he directed in the location and completion of this dark region, not with the delight with which heaven was planned and built, but as really though more sadly, he was the maker and builder of hell. . . . To liv in hell is pain; its very life is torture; depression and heaviness are in its air; its clime breeds discontent, alarm, and tears. The sentence, which is never to be repealed, and which follows them to every nook and corner of their returnless exile, is, Depart from me, ye accursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. What a life! accursed by the place! accursed by its fire! accursed by its companions!" "Hell was not made for a day, a year, or an age, but made for eternity, as stable as heaven and as enduring. Its existence and sad history will run parallel with the existence and history of heaven, but without interchange or sympathy, no hope, no cross bridges the awful chasm between the two. Heaven is enduring, its foundation fixed, its walls garnished by the love of God. Music and bliss fill its homes and burden its air—thrones and crowns are the reward of its radiant inhabitants. Hell is enduring, its foundation fixed, its walls shaded by the justice of God, sighing and bitterness fill all its homes and burden its deadly air—chains bind to misery and darkness its throngs of hate and guilt."

News of Battle.

The Gospel Flame, of Ennis, Tex., has some exclusiv news. It shouts: "War has been proclaimed! This world has been invaded by a hellish foe. The kingdom established is that of Satan, who holds the nations in his iron grasp. He has usurped the authority of God and planted his own nature in men's hearts, and made them his children, his heirs, which inheritance is sin, with all its pernicious fruits, 'adultery, fornication, uncleanliness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revelings, and such like.' The prophecy of Isaiah tells us that 'by fire and by my sword will the Lord plead with all flesh.' It is not like carnal warfare, 'with confused noise and garments rolled in blood,' but, says the prophet Isaiah, looking forward to this glorious conquest that will result in placing the absolute government of this world on the shoulders of the 'Mighty God,' 'this shall be with burning and with fuel of fire.' This is the plan of war; no other is given us in the word of God. The greatest need of the hour is a general assembling of the saints in different parts of the land for the special purpose of receiving the enduement of power for the speedy overthrow of the powers of darkness and the conversion of the world. The great holiness lights should begin to 'blow the trumpet in Zion,' and 'call a solemn assembly' or assemblies of the people and prepare them for war, the success of which all God's ministers, whom he promises to make a flaming fire, are responsible. Let us get back to first principles and move on the line of the anointing and power of the ancient days, and then shall the arm of the Lord be felt in causing the nations to tremble at his mighty power; and such grand upheavals of satanic corruptions and dissolutions of worldly principalities, thrones, and dominions and turning of the inhabitants of this planet to God has never yet been witnessed only on a comparativly small scale."

In Memoriam.

Died, on Thursday, the 25th of August, 287, William W. Burnett, in the fifty-first year of his age. The deceased was a resident of Syracuse for some years, and was known as a man of sterling integrity and high moral worth. He was a Freethinker of the most pronounced type, subscribing for and reading THE TRUTH SEEKER as his scriptures; making a special request of his wife—who sympathized with him in his belief, or disbelief—that no Christian service should be performed at his burial. A telegram was sent to Mr. Reynolds, but no response was returned, and so, by the request of the widow and brother, I attended the funeral, saying what I could in sacred remembrance of the departed. When such a person dies, not only are the immediate friends bereaved, but the community suffers and feels the loss.

LUCY N. COLMAN.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us."—N. Y. Sun.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

It is now said that Powderly, master workman of the Knights of Labor, is making pacific overtures toward the leaders of the trades unions with a view to a reconciliation and an abandonment of his former hostil attitude toward them.

Bishop W. L. Harris, the greatest man among the Methodists, died last week aged 70.

The amount of taxes to be collected in New York city this year is $31.803,-174.55. The rate is $2.16 per $100.

There hav been great floods in Texas. Every bridge in Waco county is washed away, and the damage to crops amounts to $100,000.

The attorneys for the convicted Cook county, Ill., boodlers claim to hav made a startling discovery of vital error in the recent trial, totally invalidating the finding. One of the lawyers has said that it was nothing less than that the Illinois conspiracy statute is illegal. This is the law under which the Anarchists as well as the boodlers were convicted.

"Camp-meeting John" Allen, the downeast revivalist, died suddenly on the East Livermore camp grounds in Farmington, Me., on the 31st ult. He was 92 years old, and this was the 374th camp-meeting which he had attended.

The police made seventy-five arrests for liquor selling in this city last Sunday.

The Anti-Poverty Society held its usual religio-political meeting Sunday, with a large audience, mostly ladies, and took up a collection of $144.60.

Reports are still coming in of disasters from the cyclone on the Atlantic, August 24th, 25th, and 26th. Many incoming vessels bear marks of its ravages.

Ten thousand assembled at Ennis, Ireland, on the 4th inst. to attend a meeting of the Irish National League. It is worthy of mention as remarkable that there was no riot.

Labor Day, Sept. 5th, was observed by a large parade and picnic. Mayor Hewitt ordered the American flag to be floated from the City Hall, and all the city departments were closed.

The decision on the motion for a new trial for the Chicago Anarchists will be handed down this week. The general belief is that the verdict of the lower courts will be sustained, and that the sheriff will be instructed to proceed with the execution of the law on the condemned men.

The Socialistic organizations expelled by the George-McGlynn United Labor party held a meeting by delegates last Sunday. Three hundred men represented nearly eighty organizations, and were unanimous in condemning Henry George and resolved upon independent political action.

Mary Druse, the daughter of the Druse woman of Herkimer Co., N. Y., who murdered her husband, is now in the Onondaga county penitentiary under a life sentence for alleged complicity in the murder. She has become an imbecil and a movement is on foot to secure her pardon.

A San Francisco telegram says: "By the steamer Alameda, arrived yesterday, it is learned that the expedition in New Guinea, despatched to inquire into and punish the perpetrators of the recent massacre of missionaries and nativ Christians at the mouth of the Heath river, attacked a Moveavi village and had a fight with the nativs, several of whom were killed and a number wounded. One of the attackiug party was wounded by an arrow, but not seriously At a subsequent expedition the nativs fled and their village was burnt." The superior humanity of Christian civilization being thus demonstrated beyond dispute, no further inquiry as to the perpetrators of the alleged massacre will be necessary.

JACOB FALLETH IN LOVE WITH RACHEL.

And while he yet spake with them, Rachel came with her father's sheep; for she kept them.—Gen. xix, 9.

Odds and Ends.

Small boy (at church picnic): "I say, Johnny, where's them nice ham san'wiches your ma put up for you? These ain't no good." Johnny (bitterly): "The superintendent an' the teachers is a-eatin' of 'em."

Omaha bride: "Oh, I wish I were dead. I never supposed John would talk to me in that way." Omaha dame: "It's only a lover's quarrel, dear. Don't get a divorce." "Divorce! Horrors! I never dreamed of it." "No, it's no use, dear; no use at all. Every lady in Chicago will tell you that it is just as hard to get along with one man as another. They are all alike."

Servant (to the parson, who is very ill indeed): "If you please, sir, the chorister is downstairs' and wants to know if you won't giv him the hymns for next Sunday's service?" Parson (feebly): "Tell him there will be no service; I expect to be dead before next Sunday." Servant (exit and re-enter): "If you please, he says, then, will you be kind enough to send down the hymns you'd like sung at the funeral?"

The effete European monarchies hav very accurate ideas concerning the geography, politics, and history of this country. A recent issue of an English paper says: "Between the murderous red men and the barbarous Prohibitionists, the reservation of Kansas, west of the United States in North America, is likely to be depopulated. For years the Indians hav been making it exceedingly sultry for the whites who were allowed to settle there, and now, to add to the horror of the situation, the Prohibitionists, a large tribe of aborigines, hav commenced a war of extermination. The mode of warfare of this tribe is to capture the enemy and torture them in the most horrible manner. They will shut them up and keep them there until they die of thirst. The Prohibitionists are a peculiarly constructed people by nature, as they never drink anything and never get thirsty. Knowing that thirst is the worst torture their enemy could be subject to, they hold war-dances whenever a prisoner is captured. Postmaster-General Vilas has ordered three men-of-war to Wichita, where the entire reservation can be bombarded."

PRAYER AND BUSINESS.

On Wednesday evening, about two months ago, prayer-meeting was held by the members of one of the leading churches of Aberdeen, this territory. Owing to some repairs being made in the church building, it took place at the residence of a prominent member of the church named Dawson, who was also a leading real estate dealer. The city was at that time in the hight of a boom.

Rev. Bagley had charge of the meeting, and, after a number of those present had offered prayers, the reverend gentleman called on Brother Dawson. He accordingly knelt by a chair, and, after a fitting introduction, said:

"And we desire to further thank thee this evening for allowing me to put my new north side addition upon——"

"Hold on, brother, hold on," interrupted Rev. Bagley. "It hardly seems to me proper for you to introduce private real estate deals in a supplication of a church prayer-meeting. Don't do it, Brother Dawson."

But Brother Dawson was of a stubborn disposition, and this only made him more determined. He continued:

"As I was saying, I desire to return thanks for thy providential guidance while placing my north side addition on the market. As thou probably knowest, I hav thrown the entire addition on the market at $450 per lot, though they are all well worth——"

"How's that, brother?" put in Rev. Bagley, eagerly, as he took his face out of his hands and peered sideways over his spectacles from where he was kneeling in front of the sofa.

"Four hundred and fifty dollars a lot, elder," answered Brother Dawson.

"Good gracious!" replied the minister, as he arose, "there's money in those lots at that figure. Just put me down for a block of about six. I'm willing to put my pile in north side dirt at that rate at any time. Here, Sister Dawson, bring us a pen a minute till we draw up the deed. I don't propose to take any chances on monkey business on as good a deal as this. Just remain kneeling, friends, this matter won't take but a moment's time."—Dakota Bell.

THE TRIALS AND TRIBULATIONS OF THE FREE-WILL BAPTISTS.

A party of deep-water Baptists held a service off the Canadian river bank, opposite the head of Grand Island, last Sunday. There were some ten or a dozen converts, mostly women. One of these was afraid of drowning, and she had her suit lined with cork from neck to heels, but she didn't say anything about it. The service proceeded without a hitch, and it came Sister Jones's turn to be immersed. The minister waded out into the stream, leading the sister by the hand, and repeating the ritual. When they got waist deep, Sister Jones had much difficulty in keeping her feet on the bottom, and the deeper she waded the more this trouble increased, but she didn't want to say anything.

All at once, however, the current took her off her feet and threw her lengthwise on the surface of the water. The minister grabbed her and tried to pull her under. The current was every instant dragging her out. The minister clutched frantically at the fair convert, who was herself struggling to assume an upright position, but without success. The minister felt himself getting out of his depth, and screamed for help, but no one offered to come out; the current was very swift. The minister looked around, and saw that he was slipping rapidly down the river; he couldn't touch bottom. With a superhuman effort he swung himself up and seated himself on his fair raft, and wildly flourished his arms to the people on shore, who were now fading into mere specks.

"This is horrible," said the minister, looking round on the waste of water; "in three hours we'll be over the falls. Sister Jones, let us sing something in this trying hour."

Sister Jones, who had been emitting shrieks like a steam calliope, only shrieked the louder, and the minister struck up in a rich, tremulous tenor, "Rescue the Perishing." He had hardly finished the first stanza, when a steam-yacht hove in sight and bore down on them in response to the gestures of the minister, and in fifteen minutes they were rescued in an exhausted condition. The clergyman is perhaps thinking of becoming a Congregationalist, while the young convert is so backslidden that fears are entertained she will become an Infidel.—Buffalo Courier.

Gems of Thought.

Poor old Adam! Had it not been for that one bite of apple he might hav lived to a good old age, and been an honorable and useful member of society! How wrong to place such tempting, dangerous, and deadly fruit before an unsophisticated young man just made! Let us weep.—D. M. Bennett.

Ten persons will repent of a sin for one who will confess it—I do not mean to the priest—that may be an easy matter, but to the only person who has a claim to the confession, namely, the person wronged. Yet such confession is in truth far more needful to the wronger than to the wronged: it is a small thing to be wronged, but a terrible thing to wrong.—Geo. Macdonald.

Mankind would now be everywhere bowing down to idols of wood and stone as an act of religion, instead of doing righteousness, had not rational thought come in to clear away the superstition on which idol-worship rested. And even at this day, and in civilized communities, there are many superstitious beliefs that with vast multitudes of people are standing in the way of their seeing that the present practical religion is the doing of righteousness. Only the dispelling of ignorance, only the advancement of thought, can abolish the worship of beads and bibles, and bring in hat higher worship which cousists in the service of humanity and truth.—W. J. Potter.

The priests of Paris declared from the pulpit that "he has no religion who will not kill the Huguenots.' Pope Gregory XIII. showed his joy at the massacre of St. Bartholomew by having public thanksgivings offered in the churches, and a medal struck, which is still extant, as is the picture in the Vatican painted by his order, and stating that the pontiff approved of the murder of Coligny. Pius V., who was afterward made a saint, urged Alva, in the midst of the massacres in the Netherlands, to go on doing these noble deeds which would surely lead him to heaven. Such was the character of that church which boasts that she is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.—Revue de Belgique.

Little children, let no man deceive you: he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous. He that committeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning.—1 John iii, 7, 8.

If the Mosaic account means anything, it means that whereas there was nothing, God caused something to exist—created what we know as matter. I cannot conceive of something being made or created without anything to make it with. I hav no more confidence in fiat worlds than in fiat money. Mr. Talmage tells us that God did not make the universe out of nothing, but out of his "omnipotence." Exactly how God changed "omnipotence" into matter is not stated. If there was nothing in the universe, "omnipotence" could do you no good. The weakest man in the world can lift as much of nothing as God can.—Ingersoll's Tilt with Talmage.

"Hermione, my wife! what has come of your reasoning faculties?" said Richard Fullerton. "What it would be as well if it came to yours, Richard—a little humility and a little faith," she answered, tartly. "If you are humble, dear, what is that which pretends to teach you?" he said. "A body of men declaring themselvs infallible—the possessors of immutable and eternal truth, affirming an intimate acquaintance with the secret counsels of God, to use their own phraseology—and the mappers out of heaven and hell, as if they had been over both with a measuring tape, and all quarreling among themselvs, and none of them knowing as much as we others of the world around them in which they liv. Do you not see that you are being traded on through your very virtues? that your humility is the pabulum of their insolence? your faith bolsters up their presumptuous assertions and makes their monstrous falsehoods possible?"—Under Which Lord, by Mrs. Linton.

Properly guarded, and borne in mind as the occasional exception, by no means as the rule, the return of injustice or ill-will by benevolence and kindly feeling may be of the utmost value, both in cultivating the best emotions in those who practice it, and in calling forth the repentance of those toward whom it is practiced; but as a universal and absolute principle it must be utterly rejected. Lao-tsze and Jesus, when they affirmed it, undoubtedly struck one of the highest notes in human nature. Yet it must be granted that Kung-tsze took a wider view, and that his injunction to recompense injury with justice, and kindness with kindness, is more consistent with a philosophic regard for the interests of mankind, and with a practicable scheme of social ethics.—Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief.

In Spain alone some of the best men—those who doubted, and without doubting there can be no progress—were eliminated during three centuries, at the rate of a thousand a year.—Darwin's Descent of Man.

SOME PROBLEMS IN EVOLUTION

Notes and Clippings.

THE Massachusetts Prohibitionists held a big convention last week and nominated a state ticket, with Wm. N. Earle at the head.

CAPT. BEN. RICHARDSON has loaned George Washington's coach to General Hoffman, of Philadelphia. It will appear in the Centennial parade on Sept. 15th.

MISS CARRIE CRITTENDEN is a soldier in the Salvation Army, and her trunk which recently went over the Michigan Central Railroad bore this inscription: "Carrie Crittenden. Blood and fire! Salvation Army! God is love! Repent or perish!"

CHAPLAIN MCCABE, the official solicitor of donations for the Methodist board of foreign missions, has just reported a gift of $130,000 from Mr. and Mrs. Elijah Hayes, of Indiana. This amount of money, at the average cost of converting heathen, will carry the gospel to several persons.

MR. LABOUCHERE has asked the English government to throw open the British and South Kensington Museums on Sundays. "A man might go to church and museum too," said Mr. Labouchere; adding, "He may perhaps learn something in both places, and at the museum he certainly will."

JACOB L. BUZZARD and others were engaged in digging a well on the premises of James Grant, not far from Bay City, Mich. At the depth of three feet they came across a large deposit of bones, which, from their appearance, were evidently those of some giant animal of the mastodon species. One of the tusks of this animal was six feet in length, and measured five inches in diameter at its base. A hip bone measured twelve inches in diameter, and a rib was found seven and a half feet in length. The jaw of the animal was also found, and measured four and a half feet in length.

YOU must not go down to church tomorrow evening with less that two bits in your pocket. You cannot expect to get a good sermon, fine music, and see the array of Kingston's beauty and fashion for less than twenty-five cents. The old nickel don't go. It's a two-bit ante.—Kingston Mail.

THE steamship City of Rome brought over 717 cabin passengers on her last trip. This is more cabin passengers than ever crossed the ocean before on one vessel. The City of Rome is the largest of the ocean steamers, and it takes a crew of 294 persons to work her and attend upon the passengers.

SALVATIONISTS are a great trouble to the authorities in many parts of England. By questions asked in Parliament it seems there are three members of the Salvation Army in prison for obstructing the highway at Warwick, and that five more were arrested at Stamford. They persist in using markets for their religious services in defiance of the decision of the magistrates.

MR. GLADSTONE was invited to be a guest of the committee who hav in charge the centennial celebration of the adoption of the American Constitution during the exercises of that occasion, but, owing to his various engagements at home, he was obliged to decline. In replying he says that the invitation is the most flattering he has ever received; that the Constitution is the most remarkable work of modern times; that the United States is without a parallel in the history of nations, and destined to remain so; that he will watch the proceedings with profound interest, and that, of his own option, he would be proud to be present. He adds that our kinsmen in England will pray for us.

SUPERINTENDENT COOPER rules as follows in answer to a query in regard to reading the Bible in the public schools of Texas: "The organic and statutory law both prohibit sectarianism in the public schools. The question whether the reading of a short selection from the Bible at the opening of school in the morning, without note or comment, constitutes sectarianism in an unsettled one, both in Texas and other states. There are several conflicting decisions on the subject. I advise that teachers conducting public schools who wish to use a Bible arrange their program in such a way that the time of Bible reading, which should be without note or comment, will not be included in the same hours prescribed by law for such daily session. I further advise that attendance on the Bible reading be made optional."

A MR. HOWARD LIVESEY complains in the Christian World of the profane language he hears in the streets, and cries out for a stringent law to put it down. "But why all this pother on the part of the Christian?" asks the London Freethinker. "Nearly every oath is derived from religion, and there are more damns in the Bible than in any other book we are acquainted with. Besides, there is this difference between ordinary cursing and church cursing. When a rough fellow in the street damns your eyes, he doesn't mean you any harm, and probably if you tumbled down he would help you up again; but when a theologian damns you to all eternity for daring to differ from his infallible little brain, he really means it, and looks forward with considerable pleasure to your champion swim on the billows of hell. Let Mr. Livesey turn his pious indignation against the cursing pulpits first, and leave bus-drivers and costermongers till the last."

A BLUE book was published lately containing last year's correspondence on the slave trade. Colonel Schaefer, the head of the Department for the Suppression of the Slave Trade, states in 1886 that in six months thirty-six persons, many of them professional dealers, had been tried by court martial for buying or selling slaves; of these thirteen were condemned, four acquitted, ten were still under judgment, and nine were released for want of evidence. The report as to the progress of the Home for Women Slaves in Cairo, founded by the efforts of Mr. Clifford Lloyd and Mrs. Sheldon Amos, is encouraging. In May, 1886, 170 women had been received into the home, most of them negresses, a few Circassians, and a few Abyssinians. According to another report drawn up by Colonel Schaefer, in the twelve months previous to May, 1885—that is, before the Slavery Department took over the working of the Manumission bureaus—the number of slaves freed in Egypt proper amounted to 1,032. In the following year that number increased to 2,786. of whom 853 were the property of Dongola refugees. In 1883 there were thirty-two slave dealers in Cairo; there are now only four or five, and they only act as brokers.—St. James's Gazette.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

I.—Mental Maxims.

CHAPTER VIII.—PRUDENCE.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

The first germs of animal life have been traced to the soil of the tropics, and in the abundance of a perennial summer the instincts of pleasure and pain may long have sufficed for the protection of mere existence. But when the progress of organic development advanced toward the latitude of the winter-lands, the vicissitudes of the struggle for existence gradually evolved a third instinct: The faculty of anticipating the menace of evil and providing the means of defense. The word Prudence is derived from a verb which literally means fore-seeing, and that faculty of Foresight manifests itself already in that curious thrift which enables several species of insects to survive the long winter of the higher latitudes. Hibernating mammals show a similar sagacity in the selection of their winter quarters. Squirrels and marmots gather armfuls of dry moss; bears excavate a den under the shelter of a fallen tree; and it has been noticed that cave-loving bats generally select a cavern on the south side of a mountain or rock. Beavers anticipate floods by elaborate dams. Several species of birds baffle the attacks of their enemies by fastening a bag-shaped nest to the extremity of a projecting branch. Foxes, minks, raccoons, and other carnivora generally undertake their forages during the darkest hour of the night. Prowling wolves carefully avoid the neighborhood of human dwellings and have been known to leap a hundred fences rather than cross or approach a highway.

Young birds, clamoring for food, suddenly become silent at the approach of a hunter; and Dr. Moffat noticed with surprise that a similar instinct seemed to influence the nurslings of the Griqua Hottentots. Ten or twelve of them, deposited by their mothers in the shade of a tree, all clawing each other and crowing or bawling at the top of their voices, would abruptly turn silent at the approach of a stranger, and huddle together behind the roots of the tree—babies of ten months as quietly cowering and as cautiously peeping as their elders of two or three years. Young savages, and often the children of our rustics, show an extreme caution in accepting an offer of unknown delicacies. I have seen a toddling farmer's boy smelling and nibbling an orange for hours before yielding to the temptation of its prepossessing appearance. Only the distress of protracted starvation will induce the Esquimaux to touch their winter stores before the end of the hunting season; and the supposed improvidence of savages is often due to the influence of a hereditary disposition once justified by the abundance which their forefathers enjoyed for ages before the advent of their Caucasian despoilers.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

Civilization has partially healed the wounds of that Millennium of Madness called the Rule of the Cross, and of all the insanities of the Middle Ages the Improvidence Dogma has perhaps been most effectually eradicated from the mental constitution—at least, of the North-Caucasian nations. Instead of relying on the efficacy of prayers and ceremonies, the dupes of the Galilean miracle-monger at last returned to the pagan plan of self help, and it would not be too much to say that the progress thus achieved in the course of the last fourteen decades far exceeds that of the preceding fourteen centuries. Earth has once more become a fit dwelling-place for her noblest children Pestilential swamps have been drained. Domestic hotbeds of disease have been expurgated. Airy, weather-proof buildings have taken the place of the reeking hovels that housed the laborers of the Middle Ages. Farmers no longer live from hand to mouth. The price of the necessities and many luxuries of life has been brought within the resources of the humblest mechanic. Affluence is no longer confined to the palaces of kings. There is no doubt that the cottage of the average modern city tradesman contains more comforts than could be found in the castle of a medieval nobleman. Prudence, in the sense of economic foresight, has become almost a second nature with the industrial classes of the higher latitudes, and the benefits of such habits can be best appreciated by comparing the homes of the thrifty Northlanders—Scotch and Yankees—with those of the Spanish-American priest-dupes: here deserts tilled into gardens, there gardens wasted into deserts. In natural resources, South America, for instance, excels New England as New England excels the snow-wastes of Hudson's Bay Territory; yet industrial statistics demonstrate the fact that the financial resources of Massachusetts alone not only equal but far surpass those of the entire Brazilian empire.

The contrast between Prussia and Spain is not less striking, and that climatic causes are insufficient to explain that contrast is proved by the curious fact that within less than five centuries Spain and North Germany hav exchanged places. Two hundred years before the conquest of Granada the fields of Moorish Spain had been brought to a degree of productivness never surpassed in the most favored regions of our own continent, while Catholic Prussia was a bleak heather. Since the expulsion of the Moors from Spain, and the monks from northern Germany, Prussia has become a garden and Spain a desert; the contrasting results of prudence and superstition. While the Prussians were at work the Spaniards were whining to their saints, or embroidering petticoats for an image of the holy Virgin. While the countrymen of Humboldt studied chemistry, physiology, and rational agriculture, the countrymen of Loyola conned oriental ghost stories; while the former placed their trust in the promises of nature, the latter trusted in the promises of the New Testament. Prudence, rather than military prowess, has transferred the hegemony of Europe from the Ebro to the Elbe, and prudence alone has smoothened even the path of exile which ill-fated Israel has pursued now for more than a thousand years. For, with all the Spiritualistic tendency of their ethics, the children of Jacob have long ceased to deal in miracles, and train their children in lessons of secular realism which effectually counteract the influence of their school-training in the lessons of the past, and as a result famine has been banished from the tents of the exiles. Like the Corsicans and the prudent Scots, they rarely marry before the acquisition of a competency, but the tendency of that habit does not prevent their numerical increase. Their children do not perish in squalor and hunger; their patriarchs do not burden our almshouses.

C.—PERVERSION.

There is a story of an enterprising Italian who increased the patronage of an unpopular mountain resort by effecting an inundation of the lowlands; and if the apostles of other-worldliness had tried to enhance the attractions of their hereafter on the same plan, they could certainly not have adopted a more effective method for depreciating the value of temporal existence. The vanity of work, of thrift, of economy, and the superior merit of reliance on the aid of preternatural agencies, were a favorite text of the Galilean messiah. "Take no thought of the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself." "Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? what shall we drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed? For after all these do the gentiles seek." "Ask and it shall be given you."

Secular foresight was depreciated even in the form of a prudent care for the preservation of physical health; the selection of clean in preference to unclean food was denounced as a relic of worldliness; and in mitigating the consequences of such insults to nature, prayer and mystic ceremonies were recommended as superior to secular remedies. "If any man is sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." "And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." "And when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power against unclean spirits to cast them out, and to heal all manner of disease."

If such instructions had been followed to the letter, the human race would have perished in a hell of madness and disease. As it was, a thousand years' purgatory of half insanity cured the world of its delusion; and the sinners against the laws of common sense escaped with the penalty of a millennium of barbarism, a barbarism which, in the most orthodox countries of the fourteenth century, had sunk deep below the lowest ebb of pagan savagery. The untutored hunters of the primeval German forest were at least left to the resources of their animal instincts; they were illiterate, but manly and generous, braving danger, and prizing health and liberty above all earthly blessings. Their children were dragged off to the bondage of the Christian convents and doomed to all the misery of physical restraint, not for the sake of their intellectual culture, not with a view of purchasing the comforts of after years by temporal self-denial, but to educate them in habits of physical apathy and supine reliance on the aid of interposing saints—a habit which at last revenged itself by its transfer to the principles of ethics, and encouraged malefactors to trust their eternal welfare to the same expedient to which indolence had been taught to confide its temporal interests. Where was the need of rectitude if iniquity could be compromised by prayer? Where was the need of industry if its fruits could be obtained by faith? Where was the need of sanitary precautions if the consequences of their neglect could be averted by ceremonies?

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

The consequences of that dogma refuted its claims by lessons which mankind is not apt to forget for the next hundred generations. From the day when the doctrine of antinaturalism succeeded in superseding the lingering influence of pagan philosophy, progressive industry waned, and at last almost ceased to supply even a reduced demand; commerce lingered, and the sources of subsistence were wholly confined to the produce of a more and more impoverished soil. With the exception of (still half pagan) Italy, not one of the many once prosperous countries of Christian Europe had anything like a profitable export trade. On the international markets of the Byzantine empire the products of skilled labor—fine clothes, fine fruits, perfume, and jewelry—were sold by oriental merchants, while the Christian buyers had little to offer in exchange but the spontaneous products of Nature: timber, salt, amber, and perhaps hides and wool. Medical science had become such a medley of vagaries and barbarisms that even the princes of Christendom could not boast of a competent family physician, and in critical cases had to trust their lives to the skill of Moorish or Persian doctors. Abderaman el Hakim, a king of Moorish Spain, had so many applications for the services of his court doctor that he often jestingly called him the "Savior of Christian Europe." The prevalence of the militant type should certainly have encouraged the manufacture of warlike implements; yet not one of the twelve heavy-armed countries of Trinitarian Europe had preserved the art of tempering a first-class sword, and proof-steel had to be imported from Damascus. The traditions of architecture were limited to the fantastic elaboration of religious edifices; peasants dwelt in hovels, and citizens in dingy stone prisons, crowded into crooked and cobble-paved alleys.

The unspeakable filth of such alleys produced epidemics that almost depopulated the most orthodox countries of medieval Europe. Under the stimulus of clerical theories, those epidemics in their turn produced outbreaks of fanatical superstition, which in pagan Rome would certainly have been ascribed to the influence of a contagious mental disease. Diseases, according to a doctrine which it was deemed blasphemy to doubt, could be averted by prayer and self-humiliation. In spite of a diligent application of such prophylactics, diseases of the most virulent kind became more prevalent. The logical inference seemed that prayer had not been fervent and self-abasement not abject enough. Hordes of religious maniacs roamed the streets of the plague-stricken cities, howling like hyenas and lacerating their bodies in a manner too shocking to describe. After exhausting the available means of subsistence, the blood smeared wretches would invade the open country, and by frantic appeals frighten thousands of peasants into joining their ranks, and in carrying the seeds of mental and physical contagion to a neighboring country. In Germany and Holland the total number of "Flagellants" were at one time estimated at three hundred and fifty thousand; on another occasion at more than half a million. If the disease had exhausted its fury, the self-torturers would claim the reward of their services by falling like hungry wolves upon the homes of the sane survivors. If the plague refused to abate, the leading fanatics would ascribe the failure to their followers' want of zeal, and enforce their theory by an indiscriminate application of a rawhide knout, till the dispute was referred to the arbitrament of cold steel, and the ranks of the howling maniacs were thinned by mutual slaughter.

E.—REWARDS.

The world has trusted in the doctrine of miracle-mongers till skepticism became a condition of self-preservation, and the benefits of open revolt are now conspicuous enough to impress even the non-insurrected slaves of the church. With all their hereditary bias of prejudice the victims of the miracle dogma cannot help contrasting their lot with that of the industrial skeptic. They cannot help seeing self-reliant science succeeds where prayer-relying orthodoxy fails. The prosperity of Protestantism, its physical, intellectual, political, and financial superiority to Conservatism, with the aid of all its saints, are facts too glaringly evident to ignore their significance, and our ethical text-books might as well plainly admit that this universe of ours is governed by uniform laws and not by the caprice of ghosts—at all events not of ghosts that can be influenced by rant and ceremonies. Whatever may be the established system of other worlds, in this planet of ours Nature has not trusted our welfare to the whims of trixy spooks, but has endowed our own minds with the faculty of ascertaining and improving the conditions of that welfare; and the time cannot come too soon when well-directed labor shall be recognized as the only prayer ever answered to the inhabitants of this earth.

The philosophic author of the "History of Morals" remarks that the medieval miracle-creed still lurks in the popular explanation of the more occult phenomena. While the natural sequence of cause and effect is, for instance, freely admitted in such plain cases as the stability of a well-built house and the collapse of a rickety structure, the phenomena of health and disease, of atmospheric changes or of the (apparent) caprices of fortune in war or games of chance are still ascribed to the interference of preternatural agencies. That bias is undoubtedly at the bottom of the still prevalent mania for hazardous speculation and the reckless disregard of the laws governing the condition of our physical health.

Unconfessed, and perhaps unknown, to themselves the grandchildren of orthodox parents are still influenced by the hope that in such cases the event of an imprudent venture might be modified by the interceding favor of "providence."

Secularism should teach it converts that the most complex as well as the simplest effect is the necessary consequence of a natural cause; that the "power behind phenomena" acts by consistent laws, and that the study and practical application of those laws is the only way to bias the favor of fortune.

"Pray and you shall receive," says Superstition "Sow if you would reap," says Science. The Religion of Nature will teach every man to answer his own prayers, and Prudence will the Providence of the Future.

The Costs in Reynolds's Trial for Blasphemy.

The law concerning blasphemy in New Jersey is predicated on an old "act" of the medieval ages, and it has been, practically, a dead letter on the statute books of New Jersey for more than a hundred years. The oldest inhabitants hav never before heard of a suit brought for blasphemy, and competent jurists conjecture that the records of no other court (besides the court at Morristown) in the entire state bear the disfiguring blotch of a trial for blasphemy.

As the men who had C. B. Reynolds arrested and tried for blasphemy had such a profound regard for the majesty of that old law, an itemized bill of the costs in the trial was obtained by the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the purpose of seeing how much regard they themselvs had paid to other important laws in prosecuting the defendant. The law states explicitly that so much, and no more, may be charged by officers of the court for what each one does, under a penalty for an excessiv charge. We will compare the charges rendered in the bill of costs with the amounts allowed by law, and show how hard they labored to roll up an unchristian bill of costs by adding a few cents, here and there, more than the law allows. The clerk of the court is paid a large salary for his services; yet he is required to make out a bill of costs, at the close of the trial, and charge so much for what he has done, so much for what the sheriff has done, and so much for the services of only two witnesses. Then, he is under obligation to pay sheriff, constable, and two witnesses and hand over the amount charged for his own services to the county treasurer. The clerk has an opportunity to pocket a good deal of money that does not belong to him by collecting four times as much as the law allows, then handing over the lawful amount to the county treasurer, and pocketing the surplus. Clerks of every court hav numerous chances to extort unlawful money from every one who has a suit at law, unless the litigants, or their attorneys, will look into the law, and see whether the clerk has charged more than the law indicates.

As very few people understand how a bill of costs is drawn, it will be proper to state that a blank sheet is ruled in several columns, one column for the clerk's charges, one column for the sheriff's charges, and another column for the court, or judges, and another column headed "Als." In this column the fees of witnesses, crier, constable, and others are entered. A great many entries are made under "Als." that never get beyond the clerk's pocket. As soon as the trial is closed, the clerk is required to fill out the bill of costs, or "tax" it, as it is called. So he commences: The clerk drew the summons. The law says the clerk may charge 34 cents for drawing summons. So he enters 34 cents in clerk's column. The sheriff served the summons on Brother Reynolds.

The law states that the sheriff is entitled to $2 00 for serving the summons, and 12 cents for returning it to the clerk, and two cents per mile for every mile traveled to serve the summons. So the clerk enters $2.12 and 4 cents per mile in the sheriff's column. Then, here are five subpœnas for witnesses to appear before the grand jury to give evidence for indicting Mr. Reynolds. But the law says the clerk must not charge the defendant for more than two witnesses. So he foots up the amount allowed by law, for serving two subpœnas, and then adds the mileage, and places the amount in favor of the constable under "Als." The law states that for trying the case the clerk may enter 50 cents in the court column, as the fee of the judge, to be handed over to the state treasurer. After the blank is all filled out, the clerk folds it up and puts it in a pigeon-hole. All this process is called drawing, taxing, and filing a bill of costs. The law says explicitly that for drawing, taxing, and filing a bill of costs, the clerk may charge 50 cents in his column and no more, under a penalty of $30. Now, let us examin the tems charged against Mr. Reynolds, and compare hem with the law. Here is the document itself:

M. S. CONDIT, Clerk.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, County of Morris. } ss.

I, Melvin S. Condit, Clerk of the County of Morris, and also Clerk of the Oyer and Terminer and General Quarter Sessions, holden in and for said County, do hereby certifv that the foregoing is a true copy of the original Taxed Bill of Costs, on indictment in the case of the State of New Jersey, vs. Charles B. Reynolds, as fully as the same remains on file in my office.

IN TESTIMONY WHEREOF I hav hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said Court and County at Morristown, this 29th day of July, A.D., eighteen hundred and eighty-seven.

M. S. CONDIT, Clerk.
[SEAL.] Per D. S. VOORHEES, Dep.

The first charge is for drawing five summons for five witnesses, $1.75. The law says that defendant is chargeable for only two witnesses. The clerk is allowed to charge 34 cents, thus making 68 cents according to law, and $1.75 according to Christian equity. Constable's fees for serving summons, $2 40. As we do not know the amount of mileage, we cannot state exactly what amount would be lawful; yet it is safe to state that for two witnesses the amount would be two-fifths of $2.40, or 96 cents. Entering and filing indictment, 20 cents (right once). Nine cents for crier, in "Als." column. What did the crier do for that 9 cents? There is no record of any service.

|---|---|
| Fee of justice of court on indictment | .50 |
| (That charge of 50 cents is correct, provided the court records show that the judge did anything. If the records do not show any service, the clerk had no right to enter 50 cents.) | |
| Clerk drawing and sealing process for defendant, 76 cents; rule for same, 20 cents | .96 |
| (The law says 34 cents for drawing process (or warrant), and 14 cents for sealing, making 48 cents, instead of 76 cents. He has charged 20 cents for rule of a court. There was no rule.) | |
| Sheriff's fees for serving, $2, and returning papers, 12 cents (correct) | 2.12 |
| Order to hand to quarter sessions, 44 cents for clerk; 20 cents for court; and 9 cents for crier for opening the door, in all | .73 |
| (There is no law for either of these last charges.) | |
| Order to set prisoner to bar for appearance, and entering do., clerk | .28 |
| Court fees | .70 |
| Rules to charge and plea, and entering plea, 44 cents for clerk and 40 cents for court | .84 |
| Order to set down for trial, 18 cents for clerk and 20 cents for court | .38 |

The law makes provision for only a part of the four last items. The law states that no item of cost shall be allowed, except such as are specially provided for in the "Fee Bill," or the "Act" regulating costs. C. B. Reynolds was not a prisoner. He went into court a free citizen, and appeared in response to a summons served by the sheriff. Hence, all this twaddle and items of cost about a prisoner is not applicable to this suit. If any one will go to Morristown and examin the court records, he will not find any order on file to set the prisoner to bar, nor rules to plead, nor any plea on file. Yet the clerk has scooped all these items into Reynolds's bill of costs; and as nobody examins the bill to see where the money goes, this excess is pocketed.

Drawing and sealing one subpœna and twenty-six tickets, $2.99. The law allows the clerk to charge the defendant for subœpna 25 cents; sealing, 14 cents; and two tickets, 9 cents each, 48 cents, instead of $2 99. Constable's fees for serving these papers, $9 10. The clerk had a right to charge 60 cents for the first witness subpœnaed, and 30 cents for the second, and mileage, and the mileage must not exceed $2. It is safe to assume that the mileage, in serving two witnesses, will not exceed $1. So we hav $1 90 lawful charge, and $9 10 as the Christians' charge. Order to call up prisoner and that trial come on, 36 cents. No order of the kind was ever given, as C. B. Reynolds was not a prisoner. Fees of the court for issuing order, 40 cents. The court never issued any such order, for the reason that Reynolds was not a prisoner. He came into court as a free citizen, without any order, consequently that charge of 36 cents for drawing the order, and 40 cents in favor of the judge, when he never issued any order, is simply robbery. Drawing and sealing venire and rule, 57 cents; judge's fee, 20 cents; constable's fee, $1. If the court records show that all this was done, the amount is only two cents more than the law allows. Calling and swearing jury, clerk, and crier, 32 cents; the law says, calling and swearing jury, 12 cents. Calling seventeen witnesses by clerk and crier, and swearing them, $2.04. The clerk had a right to charge for swearing two witnesses, and no more, 6 cents each, 12 cents. "Twenty-three witnesses, twenty-nine days, $14 50;" the clerk had a right to charge Reynolds for only two witnesses, 50 cents each. (See Rev. Stat., p. 558.) So here we hav $1 according to law, against $14.50 according to Christian rules. Drawing and sealing twenty-three witness certificates for sheriff, $4 60. There is no law, rule, or custom for this charge. If a certificate was necessary for two witnesses the lawful charge would be only 10 cents each, certified and sealed, or 20 cents for doubtful law, against $4 60 Christian. Court fee for trial, 50 cents (for a wonder another charge is correct). Constable attending jury, 50 cents; and clerk swearing jury, 24 cents; and rule to remand jury, 20 cents. The constable is paid by the day, so that 50 cents is unlawful. Swearing the jury is 20 cents. There was no order for remanding it, hence that 20 cents is fraudulent. Taking and entering verdict, 26 cents; for clerk and rule to remand the jury, 20 cents. The law says for taking and entering verdict, 8 cents; as the jury agreed at once there was no rule to remand, and consequently this 20 cents is an unlawful charge. Order to call the prisoner to the bar for sentence, 18 cents for clerk, and 20 cents for court for remanding prisoner to the custody of the sheriff. Reynolds was not that kind of a prisoner, and was not remanded. The court imposed a fine of $25 00 for uttering a few words that anybody and everybody uses at pleasure. Reynolds payed the fine, like a free citizen, and went home as free from the claws of the sheriff as any other man. This 18 cents for clerk and 20 cents for court show a far more deliberate and defiant violation of a wholesome law than the few harmless words that Reynolds uttered. Taking and entering judgment, $1 34 for clerk, and 70 cents for the judge for signing an order. All this is fraudulent. The fine was paid as soon as the verdict was rendered. All proceedings ended then and there. If Reynolds had been a prisoner, and a fine had been imposed which he was unable to pay, and he had been remanded back to prison, then the clerk would hav been directed to enter a judgment against him, and the judge would hav signed it. But all this was not done, hence these charges for services not rendered are fraudulent and forbidden by law under a penalty of a large fine and imprisonment.

Prosecutor's fees, $15. This charge is to pay the prosecutor of the pleas for drawing the indictment against Mr. Reynolds, and for managing and trying the case. This prosecutor of pleas is a salaried officer of state. Whether he does little or much, he receives a regular salary. He does not receive compensation from fees. He dare not accept one dollar as fees, under color of his office. If the costs for what he did should be taxed as an attorney's fees (as they are taxed where a lawyer does not receive a salary), his fees according to law would be as follows: Drawing the indictment against Mr. Reynolds, $1 50; retaining fee, $1; Term fee (60 cents), two terms of court, $1 20; motion for trial, 50 cents; trying the case, $2. In all, $6 20. But as he receives a fat salary, he is not entitled to one cent of this $15. (See Rev. Stat. of N. J., p. 402.)

Drawing costs, taxing, and filing, and copy for the clerk, $1 12. The laws says, drawing and taxing bill of costs, 50 cents (Rev. Stat., p. 409). The clerk of the supreme court and clerk of chancery, the highest tribunals in the state, are allowed to charge only 50 cents for drawing, taxing, and filing a bill of costs. For making a copy the law says 8 cents. Drawing costs copy for sheriff and certificate, 74 cents. This is all fraudulent. Certified copy of sentence for sheriff, 74 cents. This charge is another fraud. There was no sentence. Reynolds was only fined, and he paid the fine on the spot. No copy of a sentence was made and no copy was required. Hence these last items are utterly unlawful.

Call for the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held at Chicago, October 15th and 16th.

The Congress will be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs—the President and Secretary and three delegates. All charter members and life members, all Vice Presidents, all Chairmen of state Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats, but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada who can will be present.

Per order Board of Directors:

COURTLANDT PALMER, Pres.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Sec.
E. A. STEVENS, Ch. Fin. Com.
CHAS. ECKHARD, Treas.

To the Liberals of Utah.

The importance of the thorough separation of church and state was never so manifest as at the present time. The ecclesiastical power throughout our country, and especially in Utah, threatens the perpetuity of republican institutions. American citizens should guard against the least infringements of equal rights and impartial liberty. The Declaration of Independence expresses the ideal of human government. It is not for a class, but for all. It is not for religion, but for justice and freedom.

Organization is necessary in order that political progress may be maintained. Superstition is not dead, and theological tyranny is not overthrown. The forces of ancient barbarism are still banded together. For defense the advocates of a purely secular state must unite, for the issue is forced upon the citizens of America by the aggressiv measures of church parties, supported by wealth and powerful associations.

Citizens of Utah! All in favor of a secular state, absolutely free from all class and theological legislation, and devoted to the maintenance of the rights of each individual, are invited to meet in convention at the Walker Opera House, Salt Lake City, Saturday, September 24th, at 10 A.M., for the purpose of organizing a territorial Secular Union, whose object shall be the total separation of church and state in the political government of Utah and the United States.

Samuel P. Putnam, secretary of the American Secular Union, will open the convention with an address on "The Dangers Ahead," and will also on Saturday evening, at 8 P.M., giv his lecture, "The American Democracy." Other able speakers are expected to be present, and there will be a general conference and debate in regard to important measures of reform. There will be three sessions daily, Saturday and Sunday, September 24th and 25th, at 10 A.M., 3 P.M., and 8 P.M.

Will everyone who receives this notice take the utmost pains to advertise the convention and induce a large attendance from his vicinity? Come every citizen of Utah who believes in political rights.

News and Notes.

Prairie City is away among the Blue mountains, seventy miles from Baker City. After three months' fair weather, the rain began to pour just as I left Baker in the lumbering coach. I did not object to this, for the dust on the mountain roads, according to report, was about three feet deep. So the discomforts of a storm were welcome. It is slow traveling among these mighty hills. The way is rough, and reminds one of ancient Jordan. At 7 o'clock we arrive, cold and hungry, at the supper station, but six hours' travel is still before us in the driving showers for our night's rest, and then we can only sleep a couple of hours. We must start early in the morning and cross two big ranges to reach the happy valley wherein the pretty village of Prairie is situated. As we ascend at about the rate of two miles an hour to the hight of six or seven thousand feet, we pass from rain into snow, and the white mantle spreads amid the huge forest trees—a sketch of winter amid the landscapes of August. In the course of our day's journey we come to a lonely ranche in a little nook of the world. There is a big fireplace and a sparkling flame, and for a few moments we hav a chance to warm our chilled bodies. As I glance at the wall I see the face of Ingersoll, and then I know I am somewhere in the haunts of civilization, and that good souls are about. In this remote wilderness shone a picture of noblest life, and the rest of my journey had delight mingled with the turmoil of rain and snow. In the afternoon I arrive at Prairie City, and the welcome of friends is reward for all the ups and downs of mountain travel and the cold drapery of winter.

Prairie City is in a beautiful valley, John Day valley, through which flows the John Day river, which is one of the brightest of mountain streams. John Day was one of the early trappers of this country. He came out with Lewis and Clark's company, and left them in the Willamette valley, and, with only Indian guides, ventured into this mountainous country and discovered this valley, where he lived until death, and which is named after him. The valley is about seventy-five miles long, with a width of from one to seven miles. The scenery is exceedingly beautiful. On one side towers Mount Dixie, and on the other Strawberry Butte, to the hight of about ten thousand feet, while about them roll lesser peaks of the Blue hills, hundreds of miles away. The soil of the valley is fertil, producing excellent vegetables of almost every kind, and wheat, barley, oats, corn; a variety of fruits—plums, cherries, peaches, pears, and apples. It is a fine stock country, and cattle at present, with the mines, are the main source of its wealth. All the neighboring region is rich with ore. The placer mines hav been nearly worked out, but the quartz mines seem to be inexhaustible, and new ones are constantly discovered. It is a lively country round about, though so remote from the railroad. The people know how to enjoy the world, and are Liberal in spirit, and even the Christians are of the good sort and don't wish to oppress the unbeliever.

In spite of the weather, the hall was full on the first evening, and the auspices were favorable for the week's campaign. The next day the storms rolled off and the sunshine glittered on the snowy mountain-tops and amid the gorgeous masses of clouds. The landscapes were brilliant and enchanting.

My friend A. S. Blinn drove me over to Canyon City. Blinn is a Yankee pioneer. He has been in almost every state, and can do most anything when emergency requires. Dr. York knows him, for it was Blinn who introduced the doctor to this country some years since, where he made a notable compaign, whose influence is yet felt for Freethought. I was glad that the way had been broken for me by my bold companion. It was Blinn who had the courage to persuade me into this far country. He takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and reads it all through, and therefore is not behind the times. One is sure of success with such a veteran worker at his side.

Canyon City is rightly named. It has only one street, so narrow that in order to turn round one has to travel clear through. It was started as a mining camp about 1870, and millions of dollars hav been washed out of the neighboring gullies. It was here that Joaquin Miller had his start. He was formerly judge in this place. His wife was then the poet of the family. Miller's literary productions are a good deal like the country from whence he emigrated, a mixture of brightness and eccentric desolation, luxuriant valley alongside sandy bluffs.

I was pleased to meet Mrs. Abagail Scott Dunnaway at Canyon, who is also lecturing on "Equal Rights." She is bright and liberal in her method of dealing with the advancement of woman, and understands pretty well the situation and where the hope of reform lies. She is doing a valuable work, and although not openly advocating Freethought, she is thoroughly in harmony with its radical philosophy, and a brilliant advocate of some of the principles of our platform. A fair audience was present at Canyon City, but it is pretty well church-ridden, and only a few are ready to stand the brunt. There are three churches, of which the Catholic is the strongest. I had the Catholic priest for a table companion. He is very innocent-looking—so innocent that I really believe he is honest. He seems to hav the idea that Infidels believe nothing; for he confidingly asked me if it wasn't easier to believe nothing than something. I told him that Infidels believe as much as anybody else on rational evidence. He incautiously affirmed that the morality of the world five hundred years ago was better than that of to-day. Friend Blinn advised him to quit preaching if such was the result of Christianity. He did not seem to understand the drift of the remark. A faith so childlike and bland could scarcely arouse any aggression on my part. His serene ignorance was such a curiosity that I hadn't the slightest temptation for combat.

Thursday evening I lectured again at Prairie City. Here the people are alive and progressiv, and seem to enjoy Freethought to the utmost. As yet there is no church, and ecclesiastical shadows are not cast.

On Friday morning my friends Mr. and Mrs. Cleaver, with Mr. Blinn and Mr. Thompson, drove me up the valley to the Warm Springs. This is a delightful place in the heart of the hills, where Nature has done almost everything to make a pleasant resort—the bright waters, cold and hot, brimming from the earth, with evergreen groves around, harvest fields, meadows, running brooks, and giant trees towering to the lofty summits, making a sparkling temple for the divinities of the happy human mind.

Mr. and Mrs. James F. Cleaver and all their family are Liberals in blood and brain. They believe in doing something for humanity's sake, and I find them noble allies in my work here.

On Friday evening I lecture again at Prairie City and at Canyon on Saturday. We hav some sturdy friends at the latter place who stand up to be counted against all odds—C. B. Hupprich, John Smith, Robert Lockwood, Mr. Rainey, and others—and it was a pleasure to meet these brave scouts on the frontier post, who blaze our pathway under the very walls of superstition.

Sunday morning, I lecture at Prairie City. In the afternoon I enjoy the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Thompson. Mr. Thompson secured in this place one hundred and twenty-three names for the pardon of Bennett. Some of the signers were Christians, and two of them ministers. This shows the liberality of the place and the earnestness of friend Thompson, who is always ready to do his level best, and who believes in freedom with his whole heart and mind.

With the good allies already mentioned are W. B. Davis and family, J. L. Sanford and A. Clark, who came twenty miles to attend the lectures, Wm. Tuneman, W. B. Carpenter, Samuel Carpenter, Jules Le Bret, J. Harding, Samuel French, George Shearer, W. W. Armstrong, N. Arke, Thos. Mills, and others. On Sunday evening, the hall was full to overflowing. In every respect I hav enjoyed myself in this delightful valley, and though it is so far off, I hope to visit it again, for here is genuin human nature—liberality, open-heartedness, with all types of character, interesting and original, so that one is constantly fascinated with the ever-changing life of this hamlet. Major Magone, who introduced me on the first evening with eloquent speech, is a true son of the soil, as independent as the rock-ribbed hill. He is a brother of the collector of New York, but is a true-blue Republican himself, and asks no favors. He had rather dig in the soil than be under any obligations to others for fortune. He is bound to "paddle his own canoe" in this Western wilderness.

Monday, Sept. 5th, I bade good-bye to my many comrades in this Arcadian valley, where Nature smiles with such summer glory, and the ribs of earth are seamed with such uncounted wealth. I hope for good fortune to all, for that will be good fortune to the Secular Pilgrim.

I found merry companions on the stage, and the seventy miles' travel through the brilliant sunshine, the magnificent woods, the grand hills, the moonlighted night, and the rosy-hued morning was like a happy dream. I am not tired a bit when I land in Baker City. I lecture this evening here, and tomorrow, Wednesday, at Weiser City; Emmett's, Sept. 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th; Caldwell, Sept. 13th, 14th, and 15th; Boise City, 16th, 17th, and 18th; Salt Lake City, Sept. 24th and 25th; Canyon City, Colorado, Sept. 28th and 29th; Denver, Oct. 2d.

I shall be in Chicago, Oct. 15th and 16th, for Annual Congress, where I hope to meet a crowd of Liberals.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Baker City, Sept. 6, 1887.

To the Liberals of the West.

For some time a feeling has been fomented, by some whose principal distinction to the title of Liberal has been their illiberal criticism of those whose time, talents, and means has been continuously devoted to forwarding our Freethought and Secular work, that the American Secular Union was merely a New York enterprise—a personal affair. Those critics, in support of their position, pointed out that the chief officers were invariably New York men; that congresses and conventions were oftener held in the East than the interest there manifested would warrant, and other equally absurd and unjust claims were urged to defeat the only organization that has ever afforded opportunity for practical Freethought propaganda. That this has had a detrimental effect on Freethinkers in the West, many of whom were led to believe that they were being discriminated against, no one can deny. Now, whatever might hav had that appearance in the past is obviated by the approaching Congress to be held in Chicago, Oct. 15th and 16th. Then Western Liberals will be afforded an opportunity to shape its course and weld themselvs into a compact, practical, and powerful association, commensurate with their intelligence and influence.

Are you interested in Freethought work? Are you a member? If not, become one before the Congress, and if you can't attend in person, send a good man or woman in your stead, and if you can't do either, please to send your money. The morning sessions will be devoted to business, and the afternoon and evening sessions to lectures and addresses. Morning sessions will be held in the elegant hall of the Chicago Secular Union; afternoon and evening sessions in the Madison Street Theater, formerly Hershy Music Hall, where were held the Congresses of 1880 and 1881. This theater has recently been remodeled, and is one of the finest auditoriums in the city.

The rates of fare on most railroads will be but one fare for round-trip tickets. The exposition and Chicago's semi-centennial great military display will be the attraction during that time. Make your visit during the time of the Secular Congress.

I will venture to say that there will be more practical work performed next year than ever before, provided that Liberals will all giv generously. It is you that this appeal is addressed to. If you do not aid this work, no one will. Do your duty; do it nobly; don't always fire blank cartridge, but realize the responsibility that rests on you relativ to the present and future welfare of the race. Let me hear from every Liberal who expects to attend.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

Receiving an urgent invitation from the Farmdale Secular Union of Ohio, I started on my western tour two weeks earlier than I had intended. Health being feeble, I trusted the exhilaration from meeting fellow-workers for the cause of humanity and the necessity of rallying strength for the labors of the rostrum would enable me to shake off the depression my lung trouble occasioned.

Thursday, August 25th, I bade farewell to home and loved ones, and started away upon my long, lonely pilgrimage to the jumping-off place on the Pacific coast, hoping to return via the extreme northern route.

Saturday, Aug. 27th, I arrived at Williamsfield, Ohio, and found the ever-genial M. F. Dean, of Lindenville, awaiting me. A little sick, a good deal tired, and some depressed at the prospect of long absence from home, how delightsome it was to be welcomed to such a happy, cozy home as that of "the Deans." Mrs. Dean is not a "mother in Israel," but a generous, kind-hearted, motherly woman, the pride and joy of her husband, the angel of her home. Mr. Dean has one son just on the verge of manhood, and a fair daughter a year or two younger. All are united in Liberalism, and so liv out its teachings that, despite their "dreadful Infidelity," they are by all loved and respected. Saturday evening I lectured in the Lindenville schoolhouse; subject, "Why I Left the Pulpit." I was surprised to find so large an attendance in such a Christian community, and very much enjoyed delivering my lecture. It seemed to greatly interest the audience, and there is no question but much of good will result.

On Sunday morning, after admiring friend Dean's nursery and fruit farm, we drove over to Farmdale, and I became the guest of that bonnie boniface, Brockway, who, kind and courteous to all, is ever the outspoken Infidel. The friends at Farmdale had made what I feared would prove a bad mistake—advertised lectures for Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday afternoons, as well as evenings. Sunday afternoons are always safe for good attendance, but week days are risky for Liberal lectures, and Monday afternoons most dubious of all.

The Root Brothers, the principal merchants of the place, hav erected an extensiv store, and over it a handsome hall capable of seating 500 persons, fitted with stage, scenery, etc. I was cheered on ascending the stairs on Sunday afternoon to hear the inspiring music of their band. Infidels all, but believers in music and skilled creators of sweet melodies, their music added greatly to the success of the lectures, and was of itself an attraction that added to our numbers. We had a fair audience in the afternoon, and much larger in the evening.

John Remsburg has been here, and I find it a very great advantage to follow where he has pioneered, for the admiration and respect he has gained from all classes of the community insure a cordial welcome and respectful hearing to his successor.

I announced the lecture for Monday afternoon, "The Heaven of the Bible," with some misgivings, yet believing if anything would induce the women to hurry up the washing, and defy its attendant weariness, it would be to learn all about heaven, of which all talk, yet none know or can agree as to wherein its delights consist. I had a deeply interested audience, and on Tuesday afternoon a very much larger attendance to hear "Why I left the Pulpit." This success was entirely due to the women taking activ interest in the work. No society will make real progress until the women are earnestly interested and they are awarded a full share of the positions of honor and responsibility.

Monday evening I went home with Emery Thompson and family, to his model fruit farm near Kinsman (the adjacent village to Farmdale). He had acres and acres of beautiful blackberries, and immense peach orchards, the branches of the trees propped up, yet many breaking down with the weight of mammoth luscious Crawfords.

I closed the course of six lectures on Tuesday evening to a very large audience—spoke on "Defense of Satan." It would be impossible to find a place where more general and kindly interest could be manifest. There was eager desire to purchase Liberal literature, and a spirit of investigation aroused resulting in several candidates for membership in the Union. The society has resolved to carry out suggestions to establish a science school on Sundays, inaugurate an amateur dramatic class, and giv semi-monthly social entertainments. This done, and the Farmdale Liberal Society will soon take precedence, and eclipse the churches alike in educational and social advantages.

It was a long journey from Farmdale, O., to Kalamazoo, Mich., where I arrived early in the morning, September 1st, and found joyous welcome at the mansion of my friends Elias H. Gault and wife. I was cheered by kind wishes and hearty words of encouragement from noble Uncle Lute (Lucius West); enjoyed a happy half hour with the prince of hotel keepers, Fred. Hotop, of the American; and had a merry time with that generous hearted, outspoken Liberal, who rejoices in the sobriquet of "Dutch Arnold," and who well-nigh rivals the indefatigable Gault in admiration of and efforts to increase the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER; received glad greeting from the sedate, but warm-hearted, artist L. C. Abbey and hosts of friends, but had to bid them all good-bye on Saturday morning, and take train for Waterloo, Ind., there to deliver three lectures in the open air on Sunday, September 4th.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Dr. York in Pittsburgh.

That the friends of our cause, both in the West and East, may know where I am, and how the battle goes, I submit a brief report of progress on my eastern trip.

Our stay of six weeks in Michigan was pleasantly spent among relativs and friends of our early days, speaking at Ionia, Belding, and Grand Rapids, to large audiences considering the extremely hot weather.

At Ionia, Mich., Dr. Bayard and Wm. Bentley hold the fort, having recently had a good stirring up by our radical friend, C. B. Reynolds, who has left his mark on the orthodox beast in Michigan. At Grand Rapids Brother Blodgett stands in the front, and to him our thanks are due for the generous donation of the Grand Opera House for our lecture on "The Unburied Dead," which was well received by a large and most enthusiastic audience.

Our next point was Alliance, Ohio, where we gave two lectures to fine audiences in Mr. Godard's rink, the finest structure and most novel in construction of anything of the kind I hav ever seen. But you will know the reason when I tell you that Brother Godard is a live, long-headed, inventiv Yankee, and a good, square Liberal besides. Alliance is a handsome little city of seven or eight thousand inabitants, full of activity and, I must add, Liberalism, as my audiences of four to five hundred were ample proof; as also that good work has been done here by Brothers S. P. Putnam, Watts, and others, who hav scattered broadcast the good seed. Our thanks are due for our success in Alliance to R. G. and D. W. Smith, of the firm of Smith & Sons, who hav the finest watch and jewelry store in the city. Their home, like our own in California, has always been a resting-place for our speakers, and wife and I were made glad and happy in the sunshine of their home. Long liv the Smiths! I must also mention G. Thornburg, a most worthy and level-headed worker from the beginning of Liberal work in Alliance, and our thanks are also due to him for an open door, a kindly welcome, and prompt and energetic assistance. We turn away from the friends at Alliance with the promis to call and do so some more in November, and carry with us much good feeling to them, as well as a new inspiration for the work before us.

We pass from Alliance through a most beautiful country to Columbus, the capital of the state, where all needed preparations had been made by Brother Rallston, the leading spirit in the Columbus Secular Union, and to whom great credit is due, as well as our thanks and appreciation for his prompt action in throwing our banner to the breeze, and other acts of kindness during our stay.

Columbus is a growing city of eighty thousand population, and full of business life. It is also full of mental malaria known as religion. Above sixty God-houses point their spires on high, and not until recently has Freethought had any foothold on its sacred soil. Our gallant Putnam led the way, followed by Watts and Reynolds. Two or three lectures from each of the above speakers tell the story of Secular work in this graveyard of mental liberty up to this date. We gave three lectures here under the auspices of the Liberal Union, to good audiences, in the Turners' Hall, and spoke also in the city hall to working people on "The Upper Ten and Lower Million; or, Land, Labor, and Capital." We also officiated at the funeral of a child of a member of the Secular Union. This was said to be the first Secular funeral service ever held in Columbus. But, if my advice is followed, it will not be the last of the kind.

A correspondent has already written you about my lecture before the prisoners and visitors at the penitentiary in Columbus. This innovation upon long-vested rights and usage of the church to cram these helpless people with superstition and the substitution of a Secular for a religious service was due to the courtesy of Captain Koehne, a stanch Liberal, at present captain of the guardroom of the penitentiary, as also to the liberal and broad-minded warden, who permitted the service, and who, after the lecture to the convicts, expressed himself as being highly pleased with our effort in every regard. And I was more than pleased, and not a little surprised, when I was called on by Captain Koehne, on the eve of my departure, and presented with a gold-piece, nicely wrapped up with a kindly written note expressing satisfaction and thanks of the officers of the prison for our service, and the statement that I had the honor of being the first to break over the persistency of Christian rule in any state institution. While it is true that we may not hav any great claim to minister to convicts in prison on the ground of similarity of belief, as there is scarcely an Atheist, Infidel, Spiritualist, or Jew to be found in our prisons, and nearly all of the convicts believe in God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, for all that the Christian church has no right to force any religious observance upon any state, school, or institution; and for this reason hav been formulated the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Our thanks are also due in Columbus to Dr. J. B. Schueller, Dr. P. E Blesh, T. S. Montgomery, J. C. Goodman, Mrs. Canon, Mrs. H. M. Lyndall, and others, who did what they could to make our work a success—not forgetting W. H. More, an old reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who came from Gehanna, twelve miles distant, to hear the Western orator.

At present I am, according to appointment, in Pittsburgh, the Babel of noise, smoke, and manufacture, as busy as a bee-hive, if not nearly so clean. Our friends of the Pittsburgh League, of whom Roman Staley. F. A. Pierce, A. Barker, H. H. Timby, and Mrs. G. H. Abel are leading spirits, were up and dressed ready for the fray. We were met at the train by Brothers Staley and Hoover, and our hearts lifted not a little to grasp the hands of these old and effectiv workers in our cause. I hav for many years read after the pungent pen of Harry Hoover, the level-headed radical man of Pennsylvania, and now am made happy by this kindred spirit and fellow-worker at his home.

I spoke on "The Two Bibles, Evolution and Creation." On Thursday evening I speak to working people on "Labor and Capital." On next Sunday I speak on "Inspiration or Revelation, Which?" On the third and last Sunday here we speak on "The Unburied Dead." I am to speak in Philadelphia on September 25th and October 2d; at New York, October 9th; at Boston, in Paine Memorial Hall, on October 16th, 23d, and 30th.

Hoping all things good, and desiring all things true, I am,

Yours always for mental liberty, J. L. YORK.

Who Wants a Good Sewing Machine?

DEAR FRIENDS: Robert Benfield, publisher of the Maurepas Gazette, Louisiana, has kindly presented me with a due-bill for a light-running "New National" sewing machine, No. 2, one that agents sell on time for $65. By paying $11 cash to the New Home Machine Company, 30 Union square, New York, the machine is mine. Mr. Benfield got the due-bill for advertising for the company, and passed it on to me as help on the defense fund.

We hav an excellent machine, and Snowville is flooded with agents, so my chance for selling this one depends upon some Liberal friend who may want a machine. I trust some of you will be willing to take it, not only to help me, but to aid the Defense Association, for all money received by or for me, over and above actual expenses of the arrest and trial, will belong to the treasury of the Association as a fund to help others.

This offer remains open till October 16th. The best offer received between now and then will be accepted, and the due-bill sent to the would-be purchaser. The bill is on the New Home Sewing Machine Company, 30 Union square, New York, and the machine awaits there the order of the holder of the bill on payment of the $11 cash.

Friends, now is your chance to help me and yourselvs at the same time. I hope to receive many offers for the machine from my friends and the friends of free mails. Address,

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

The Annual Idler.

II.

I am not able to report with any accuracy on the state of religious affairs as to vitals and godliness in New Hampshire. I did not go to meeting and I met but one clergyman, and I am afraid he didn't form as high an opinion of me as I would like to occupy in the estimation of all good ministers. I was driving a two-horse haywagon with a horserake behind, when I saw him coming in a buggy. I drove out of the road so as to leave him about four-fifths of it, and stopped. When he got there he stopped. "Look here, my friend," he said rather sharply, "what's the matter?" I looked surprised and said, "Sir!" "Can't I hav half the road?" said he. "You can hav it all when you get by," said I. This concession failed to satisfy him, but he drove along, grumbling as he went. I did not learn until afterward that he was a minister, and consequently by custom entitled to everything. He and his local wife and daughter are all preachers, and work the surrounding country for what it is worth. About four or five miles from his residence is another preacher who is said to be powerful in prayer and discourse, but some of the people are complaining about his attentions to a young woman in his parish. Others stand up for him and argue that, his wife being older than himself, it is natural and justifiable that he should cultivate more youthful society. It is a question that I don't pretend to understand, and I can't throw any light upon it.

You will remember that Solomon, in the eighteenth and nineteenth paragraphs of the thirtieth instalment of his desultory remarks under the head of Proverbs, confesses that there be three things which are too wonderful for him, yea, four which he knows not: "The way of an eagle in the air, the way of a serpent upon a rock, and the way of a ship in the midst of the sea." The fourth touches the matter here under discussion. As the science of aërostatics was quite undeveloped in his day, Solomon is not to be blamed for his lack of knowledge on that subject. A serpent on a rock is indeed an object calculated to awaken feelings of the liveliest curiosity, though if Solomon had ever seen a New England deacon on a toot his astonishment would hav been greater. His unfamiliarity with a ship at sea is excusable, since he probably never saw one; but for a man with a thousand best girls to plead ignorance on the fourth count is, in my judgment, a fatal blow at the value of human experience. But I digress. I think that I detect in myself of late a tendency to discuss questions of a deeply philosophical nature.

Among the unusual things I saw in New Hampshire was a blind man making cheese. He had been a farmer and kept a large dairy for years, and as he grew old his eyes failed him. He heard of a mysterious doctor in Boston who had had a "revelation" and professed to effect miraculous cures. He went to Boston with eyes sufficiently good to enable him to find his way about, was treated by the doctor according to the revelation, and came back—a blind victim to imposture and superstition. I saw him at work. He is a man of herculean build and keeps to the treadmill of his daily task like a sightless Samson grinding corn. If he could get the medical impostor and his revelation into one of his presses, I am inclined to believe he would take pleasure in squeezing them into a small and compact cheese.

New Hampshire has one institution that she is not proud of, and which no one that I saw cared to apologize for, and that institution is her legislature. For every one thousand persons in the state there is a legislator fooling away his time in Concord. Within the memory of old men, the New Hampshire legislature has passed but one important bill, and that was an act providing for a bounty of ten cents each on woodchucks' tails, provided that said tails were not taken from woodchucks killed on Sunday. This act, thus uniting church and state by means of the tail of a woodchuck, existed but a year, and then the Concord statesmen, in their capacity as representativs of a sovereign people, rose up and repealed it. In supporting the motion for repeal one member set forth with eloquence that not only had the tails of woodchucks killed on the Sabbath been palmed off upon town officers as secular tails, but the boys along the Connecticut river had entered into a wicked conspiracy to import tails from Vermont and to get a bounty of ten cents each on them in New Hampshire. Therefore the bill had to go, and there is nothing left, in the record of the legislature, to which the members can now point with pride. It hasn't even a threatening danger to view with alarm.

Sometime during the present session a member of abandoned character introduced a bill permitting women to vote in municipal elections. Then every Hawbuck from Geeuptown, who had left his wife at home to carry on the farm while he legislated, voted No in the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress. The people of the state support their church and their legislature for the same reason that a horse supports its rider. The drones are in the saddle and hold the reins. From observations which I took, I judge that the population of New Hampshire is increasing in three departments, namely, the legislature, the church, and the graveyard; and when a young man dies a natural death, and is laid away in the last of these, it must serve in a measure, I think, to lift the sorrow of his friends to feel the assurance that he will never get into either of the others.

Were you ever in the town of Marlow? Last year, in speaking of that place, I referred to it as "godforsaken," a theological expression which I had no authority to put forth. I hav no means of knowing whether God has forsaken Marlow or not. I think he would be a little homesick there at first, but recollections of the arid and rocky soil of Palestine might reconcile him to staying. I withdraw the remark that Marlow is godforsaken. It has lofty hills, good people, and a pleasant little village. Riding through that village, I saw over the door of a store a sign reading "H. Towne." The name is a familiar one. Mr. Towne is an old soldier, and I hav in my possession a copy of a letter he wrote twenty five years ago, which tells a story that belongs to the history of the war. The letter I copied was yellow and torn, and the ink had faded to near the color of the paper. Here it is as I made it out:

An account of the Death of Henry Macdonald, who enlisted in Company E, 6th Regiment, New Hampshire Volunteers, and fell at the second Battle of Bull Run (Virginia), August the 28th, 1862, in the War of the Great Rebellion. He was 36 years of age, having been born October the 14th, 1825.

By a Comrade.

Camp near Sharpsburg, Md., Sept. 29, 1862.

Friend Clement: You hav probably heard various accounts of our battle in the woods, where we suffered so severely; so I will attempt no description except of Macdonald's death. I was by his side; or, rather, we were facing each other, he with his left side to the enemy. We had fired, and were loading. We had reserved our fire somewhat, trying to see a good mark to sight. He fired first. After firing I stepped back close to him. He said, "Did you see him?" I answered, "Yes." Said he, "So did I." The words were scarcely spoken, when Almon Nutting, who was forward, was struck on the head by a ball, inflicting a serious wound. At the same instant Macdonald was hit just forward of the top of the ear, the ball passing squarely through the head, and coming out on the other side at the spot opposit. He fell on his back, his eyes set. He did not speak or recognize me. The wound bled very fast. He suffered none, and passed away feeling not the pains of death, nor its fears. He was as cool, and spoke as calmly, as if we had been shooting squirrels. I think it was the ball which wounded Nutting that killed him, as both were struck at the same moment.

After speaking to Nutting, I was obliged to leave, the regiment having moved forward and left us behind. I had no time to save Macdonald's money, or the clothing upon him. Indeed, the chance of my coming out myself was so small I did not think to do it. When we returned it was by a different route, and on the double quick, so he fell into the hands of the enemy, who were careful to carry away everything except the clothes. The shoes they took, if good. He was probably buried by our men, who went back for that purpose with a flag of truce. There will be no means of identifying the spot. His knapsack, with contents, was left behind.

H. Towne.

I am opposed to war, and wish that the last of the instruments of bloodshed were sunk in the sea and the art of making them lost forever; but in spite of that I hav never ceased to regard with growing admiration and respect the memory of the curly-haired, dark whiskered man, as I recollect him, who bade us good-bye on a cold Christmas day in 1861, and went away to the South to fight for what he thought was a sacred cause, and to meet death as his comrade has described it in this letter.

An event occurred here the other day that also awoke the past to some extent. It was the golden wedding of the Rev. Jehiel Claflin, a minister of the Christian denomination, whom I hav often heard preach. The correspondent of a country paper described the affair as "the crowning event of the season." What the subordinate events were was not revealed. No doubt the wedding was a fine affair, as it well might be, for as Elder Claflin had been an Abolition orator in his day and had paid the penalty for his independence by being abused by his brethren in the church, letters of congratulation were sent him from all the old warhorses of antislavery times. Parker Pillsbury sent one of his strong epistles; so did Oliver Johnson and Samuel May. William Lloyd Garrison, Jr., wrote a very good poem, and the local poet wrote a very bad one, and there were speeches, and presents and pie worth a year's salary, and congratulations and cake. East Westmoreland suddenly awoke to the fact that it contained a distinguished citizen. The Keene Sentinel printed a full, four-column report of it on the front page, poetry and all, and when Mr. Claflin got the paper he was moved to declare that it was the proudest moment of his life. He is getting to be an old man, and though he still retains the power to preach, he has no permanent pulpit. He lost his pastorate there at home because he had the independence to vote as he believed, but he has never lost the good-will of the people, and he occasionally turns an honest dollar by marrying the boys and girls to each other. If I ever hav a chance to throw one of these little jobs in his way, I shall exert myself in that direction. They tell here a story about a minister who had in his parish an aged and respected man, a Spiritualist, with a deep stoop to his shoulders. The minister was so straight as to lean backward. The dominie one day inquired of the aged man the reason why he carried his head depressed. The other, in reply, drew his attention to a neighboring field of grain, and asked him if he ever noticed that some of the stalks stood erect and others bent. The preacher had noticed it. "Well," said the aged and respected citizen, "if you examin them closely you will find that the heads that droop are full, while those that stand up so straight that they lean the other way hav nothing in them."

The deacon whom I mentioned in my last year's letter as an interesting miracle of grace still flourishes, but I regret to say that he sometimes uses so-called profane language—not in his own discourse, but in repeating the words of others. A story moderately free from blasphemy at first, passing through his hands, comes out with its events surrounded by an effulgent halo of profanity. He is on the school board, and does the examining of candidates for the position of teacher in his district. The first teacher who came to him for a certificate found him unprepared. Not being much given to study beyond the reading of Zion's Herald, he was unacquainted with his duties, and had been so busy getting in his crops that he had had no time, he said, to familiarize himself with the school curriculum. Under the impression that the order of exercises was of some importance, he inquired of the applicant what she would do upon opening school after the scholars had "kinder settled down quiet." She replied that the reading of the Testament was generally thought to be a good preliminary to the day's tribulations. "Well," said he, "sposen you jest read off a few verses, and see how it goes." A Testament was produced, and the candidate read it so effectivly that anything further was pronounced unnecessary, and the certificate was forthwith handed over. The school which followed this civil service examination was satisfactory in all respects.

I call this man "deacon." I do not know whether he was ever ordained as such or not; but as he livs near the school-house where the meetings are held, finds stable room for the horses of the worshipers who come from a distance, and invites the minister home to dinner every Sunday (an invitation which the minister was never known to decline), I think he deserves some recognition more than a ordinary and unserviceable member of the church. He is spoken of by the nearest residents as a good man and an obliging neighbor. He was such before his regeneration, and former habits cling to him.

I went on but one excursion, and that was a fishing picnic. The deacon had registered to go, but on the appointed day it rained, and he declared that the disappointment had so "relaxed him down" that when a fair day came he hadn't sufficient energy to undertake the trip. Others stayed at home for the reason that while waiting for the weather to clear off they had eaten all the pie designed for the picnic.

The pie is an ingredient part of New England life, and the production of it inspires the people there to their greatest efforts. Three times a day and between meals is not thought too often to indulge in it. I became more or less confirmed in the pie habit while there, and hav since been tapering off on New York pie, which is much inferior to the New England manufacture, and therefore less dangerous. As the youth in Prohibition states are less likely to contract the liquor-habit on account of the poor quality of the whisky sold there in large drinks, so the unattractiv nature of the New York pie diminishes the danger which people here might be in of contracting the pie habit if that article were as seductiv as the New England product. This dissertation on The Pie is parenthetical and relates to the picnic only in that, at the picnic aforesaid, I fell again and again, threw prudence to the winds, and took pie with all who invited me to dissipate. The result is the mental and physical wreck which you see before you. The picnic was a success, as was everything else connected with my vacation, if I except this feeble and imperfect account of the same.

I feel at liberty, and also bound by prudence, to conceal from you my true opinion of the New Hampshire girl. I spoke about them to my friend, Counsellor Sherman, who is Mayor Hewitt's righthand shorthand writer, and he said that if he hadn't found so congenial a hammock at Lake Carey, in Pennsylvania, he should regret not having spent his vacation in the Granite state. I also discussed the question with Mr. Somerby, and he is already on his way to New England, though as that is his nativ place he has sufficient reasons for going there apart from any allurements I hav held out. But to ward off all further misgivings and disaster, I shall be reticent in my communication to you. In the language of holy writ, a word to the wise is as good as a wink to a blind horse.

Space admonishes me that my letter has reached an unreasonable length. A hundred incidents, more interesting, perhaps, than those I hav mentioned, I must leave untouched. In Surry, in New Hampshire, between those giant hills that rise, and beneath the majestic heavens that bow to meet them, in rain and sun, in warmth and cold, in boyhood and in manhood, I hav spent happy days. To stand there again in the door of the old house, to see again the familiar landscape, to hear the housewife singing about her work, to see the husbandman "jocund drive his team afield," to see the cornfields in the distance like an army with banners, to breathe the pure air, and above all to feel the eternal quiet that never comes to the dwellers in cities—all this impresses a man against his will with the attractivness of a pastoral life. Think of it—to hav land upon which you are not a trespasser and a passenger; to hav about you living things—horses, and cattle, and sheep—that are your own; to hav a farm, and a house, and a home, and a wife—think of that!—to hav crops that grow while you sleep, and fields that are white to the sickle, and only await the gatherer; where "to plow is to pray, to plant is to prophesy, and the harvest answers and fulfils." Think of it.

Here, in this little world of hills, men and women are born, and liv, and struggle for a season against the law that finally draws them back again into the earth. Yet between the cradle and the coffin they enjoy all that life has to giv. They hav health and home, music, papers, and books, family and friends; and so, undecoyed by visions of a more attractiv and luxurious world outside, they liv their rural lives, and take their honest part in our unwritten history.

> Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife
> Their sober wishes never learn to stray;
> Along the cool, sequestered vale of life
> They keep the noiseless tenor of their way.

Which, I may say, in a casual way, is quoted from the poet Gray.

But a vacation cannot last forever. The Idler at length feels out of place among these workers. He would like to join in their labors—the spirit is willing, but the flesh demurs, objects, and declines. The sun scorches him, the heat melts him, the tools which he fain would use hav a more executiv effect upon his hands than upon their object, and the bloom comes off his clothes. So he bids good-bye with what cheerfulness he can affect, throws a last look upon the reminders of old days, and in a few hours is back again, with memories of bright faces behind and a prospect of congenial employment ahead, to a place where he can be useful if not decorativ. I return my best respects to the people of the old Granite state.

With great admiration (not unmingled with astonishment) for your ability to get out as good a paper while I am gone as I do when you are away, I subscribe myself, Your brother,

GEORGE E. MACDONALD.

Superstition, Ancient and Modern.

Ignorance is the mother of devotion.

Webster defines superstition to be, "literally, a standing still over something; hence an excessiv reverence or fear of that which is unknown."

The Christian religion is an outgrowth of Judaism, and Judaism is the product of some still older religion. Man is progressiv in religion as well as in government, science, etc. The farther we go back in history the lower we find the various forms of religion. We soon reach the conclusion, after a brief investigation, that all religions hav one common origin; that they all spring from the ignorance, helplessness, and fear of man. It is equally plain that religious rites and ceremonies are maintained by means of the same human weaknesses. The divine mysteries when set before him bewilder his mind—he knows not what to think—and when the horrors of hell are pictured to his imagination, he is terrorized, and not unfrequently demented. It is an old and empty assertion to say that man has a religious nature. It is true only in the sense that man has an ignorant nature, and that out of his ignorance spring his fears.

The early progenitors of the human race had, strictly speaking, no religion or science. They knew almost nothing of the laws of nature. All remarkable phenomena were to them the work of personal spirits. Man measured everything by himself. He was conscious of life, and consequently to him everything that moved had life, either within itself or secretly associated with it. The sun, moon, and stars were among the first objects of his worship. The heavenly hosts were all gods of greater or less magnitude.

Origen declares that "the stars are animate and rational, moved with such order and reason as it would be absurd to say irrational creatures could fulfil."

A comet or eclipse was some celestial tramp out of employment. He was a devil-god, and must either be frightened away by demoniacal noises or bought off with a handsome bribe. The sun has been more generally worshiped than any other object. He brings the spring, summer, and autumn, turning his back upon us only in winter. In every religion we find vestiges of the old rites of sun-worship. In the Christian religion Christmas has no more to do with the birth of Christ than it has with the birth of Buddha. A very general festival of eastern countries in early times was that of the New Year. Christians placed one of their festivals upon this time and called it the birthday of Christ.

When the days ceased to shorten, and immediately began to lengthen, it was an occasion of rejoicing. The New Year's festival is a permanent institution everywhere, and through all time. The New Year is the promis of seedtime and harvest.

Go where you may, you will find the majority of people controled more by popular superstition than by reason. There is no end to the number and variety of the forms of superstitions. Almost everything has some sort of superstitious legend associated with it.

The water-spirits and mermaids abound in oceans, lakes, and other large bodies of water. Fairies, hobgoblins, spooks, fill the air. The fancy of the imagination takes upon it myriads of forms and colors. The undeveloped mind is peopled with a world of wonders. The primitiv man, in consequence of his limited acquaintance with nature, and on account of his helplessness, was almost constantly in a state of alarm. The lightning, thunder, earthquakes, volcanoes, and other phenomena filled him with terror. He saw danger about him on all sides, and his fearful imagination extended so greatly the number of objects that could do him harm that he became afraid of everything new or strange. He was a most arrant coward. He cried out in his distress, and gradually formed his cries into pravers. He sought to gain favor with the unseen powers. He pictured multitudes of evil spirits lying in wait to do him injury. Hence the primitiv man sought to propitiate them with presents and sacrifices.

With what rare wisdom Shakspere presents the cowardice of human nature in saying that

> 'Tis the eye of childhood
> That fears a painted devil!

We may as truly say:

> 'Tis the heart of childhood
> That worships an angry God.

Fetishism is the first form of religion among savage tribes. In his lowest condition man is a great worshiper, and in his highest he bows not his head nor bends his knee in fear to gods or men, but loves manfully all that is good, beautiful, and true.

The undeveloped man is ready to offer service and devotion to any person or thing that he thinks can do him good or evil. He was ready at any moment to cry out "good Lord," "good devil." Anyone who could beat off the evils threatened was greatly in demand.

FETISHES.

These fetishes are anything which people like to select for adoration, a tree, a mountain, the sea, a piece of wood, the tail of a lion, a pebble, a shell, salt, a plant, a flower, certain animals, such as cows, goats, elephants, sheep, or anything like these. These are the gods of the negro, sacred objects, talismans. The negroes offer them worship, address their prayers to them, perform sacrifices, carry them about in procession, consult them on great occasions. They swear by them, and such oaths are never broken (De Brosses's Du Culte des Dieux Fétishes).

The negro supposes that the possession of a fetish representing a spirit, makes the spirit his servant. We know that negroes beat their fetish if their prayers are unanswered, and I believe they seriously think they thus inflict suffering on the actual deity. Thus the fetish cannot fairly be called an idol. The same image or object may indeed be a fetish to one man and an idol to another, yet the two are essentially different in their nature. An idol is indeed an object of worship, while, on the contrary, a fetish is intended to bring the deity within the control of man (Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, p. 165).

Christians do not beat their Gods, but they think that by importunate prayers they can torment their Jehovah into compliance with their wishes. If prayers are not sufficient to bring him to terms, they resort to fasting, penance, scourging, and other methods of self-torture, which are sure to place him under obligations to assist them. The parable of the widow and the unjust judge teaches this doctrin.

The early people are known to us almost wholly through their childish notions. We hav stories superimposed upon older stories, myths overlying still more ancient myths, and legends inclosing within their fossil forms earlier legends. The glaring characteristics of these our primitiv ancestors were their credulity, weakness, and cruelty. They worshiped not only the sun, moon, and stars, the mountains, lakes, rivers, forests, and animals, even snakes, but also bits of wood, stone, shell, horn, or any other trifle to which they took a fancy. They were not always given to a belief that these objects contained within themselvs the great powers for good or evil, but that by their prayers certain spirits would come to their rescue in the hour of danger; they would giv them success in fishing, hunting, or in war. The savage was thrown into alarm upon the slightest thing which to him was unusual. If he traveled by night, the rustling of a leaf or the grunting of a hog was enough to frighten him. Every place was the home of some bad spirit, seeking to do harm to all who came that way. Poor wretch! he had to devise some sort of insurance against these powers of darkness, and the best he could invent were the fetishes. These were handy, decorativ, and cheap.

We moderns hav not wholly turned away from the gris gris business, for we hav our charms, amulets, beads, rosaries, lucky-stones, horse-shoes, and ten thousand other fetishes. But we are not heathen. Oh, no; we are civilized.

It is not many years since we had the blue window-glass craze. It had quite a run, but the believer in this superstition would hav been insulted if any one had called his foolish notions heathenish.

In the wake of the blue-glass craze another comes in the form of the horse-shoe lunacy. And worse still is the Salvation Army.

I think that a sensible pagan witnessing a parade of the Salvation Army in our streets, and noting our horse-shoe and blue glass superstitions, might hav good grounds for calling us heathen.

The modern fetish-worshiper, when passing a graveyard late at night, is greatly troubled lest the ghosts come out of their graves to carry him off, or at least "to put a spell on him." To resist and repel this dangerous attack, he whistles and, perhaps, counts his beads, if he has time.

I once knew a lady who, though not very pious, was nevertheless quite superstitious. During a severe thunder-storm she would usually take down her Bible and begin to read. The Bible was her fetish. God could not hav the heart to strike her with his lightning when she was in the act of serving him.

In the Boston Journal of Chemistry, 1879, is a remarkable instance of the survival of an old superstition. A druggist in Texas lately paid $250 for a "mad-stone." The stone was found in the stomach of a deer several years ago, and is reputed to possess the virtue of curing the bites of mad dogs, snakes, and all other venomous animals and reptils (Credulities, p. 161, W. Jones).

FEAR.

Let us look for a moment at the conspicuous place fear held in the Hebrew religion.

The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom (Ps. cxi, 10).

But this is not true; the fear of the Lord is the beginning of superstition. How often this old counterfeit has been palmed off on us as a genuin truth! And we, with remnants of fear in us, dared not question the imposture.

It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God (Heb. x, 31).

The wise man will then keep out of his hands and hav no dealings with him.

Ye shall not fear other gods, nor bow yourselvs to them, nor sacrifice to them (2 Kings xvii, 35).
And ye shall not fear other gods (2 Kings xvii, 37).
Fear not the gods of the Amorites (Judges vi, 10).
But he forsaketh the fear of the almighty (Job vi, 14).
In thy fear (O Lord) will I worship toward thy holy temple (Ps. v, 7).
Serve the Lord with fear (Ps. ii, 11).

Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. Everywhere in the Hebrew scriptures fear is the loftiest and most prominent virtue in the calendar of duty. Nor can it be denied that the Jews had good grounds for fear. Jehovah seems to hav been angry nearly all of the time, and, do what they might, his people could never keep him pleased for any great length of time.

THE ANGER OF THE LORD.

Upon returning from Mount Sinai, Moses found the Israelites worshiping a golden calf, whereupon he broke the two tables of stone, fasted forty days and nights, and then upbraids his people in these terms:

For I was afraid of the anger and hot displeasure wherewith the Lord was wroth against you to destroy you (Deut. ix, 19).
That the Lord may turn from the fierceness of his anger (Deut. xiii, 17).

The "wrath of God" is a very common phrase in the Hebrew writings. This form of expression is often varied; sometimes it is the "fierce wrath," or "the fierceness of his great wrath," "the fierceness of his anger," his "hot displeasure," the "vengeance of the Lord."

Vengeance is mine, and I will repay, saith the Lord (Rom. xii, 19).

Some of these terms appear on almost every page of the Bible.

The Old Testament speaks of Jehovah as if he were a monster. It describes him as a cruel despot who commands his people to do the most atrocious deeds for no particular reason, except that he has become angry and jealous. In his hot displeasure he often drives his people to murderous wars upon neighboring tribes. Every page of the Old Testament displays ghastly traces of a ghastly people and their ghastly God. W. S. ## "God Wills It."

So said Henry George in a speech the other evening before the Anti-Poverty Society. "This is a new crusade," he declared. "As in the old crusades the cry was, 'God wills it,' so in this crusade the cry is, 'God wills it.'"

It is true, according to history, that "God wills it" was substantially the battle-cry of the old crusaders who took up those ill-fated excursions against the Mohammedans for the possession of Jerusalem. When Pope Urban stood upon an elevated scaffold at Clermont and harangued the crowd, he cried out, "It is the will of God," and the throng took up the cry. "It is indeed his will," went on the pope; "and let these words be your war-cry when you find yourselvs in the presence of the enemy. You are soldiers of the cross; wear, then, on your breasts or on your shoulders the blood-red sign of him who died for the salvation of your souls." If Mr. George is a true crusader, he will adopt this "blood-red sign." Of course, the red flag of the Socialists, whom he has excluded, will not be practicable.

At the time of the first of the old crusades the people of Latin Christendom to a large extent owned the land on which they dwelt. At the outbreak of the holy-city fanaticism they sold or mortgaged their homes, and the merchants and traders came into possession of them, the result being a monopoly of the land. It is doubtful if the present movement will awaken such enthusiasm or bring about such a result. To sell all that thou hast and giv to the Anti-Poverty Society has not as yet become a cardinal doctrin of the new crusade.

Peter the Hermit started through Hungary for the holy land with one hundred thousand followers. Seven thousand of these reached Constantinople, crossed the Bosphorus, and were murdered by the Turks. When the hosts under Godfrey came thither on the way to Palestine they found a heap of human bones. Did "God will it?" Henry George started out with sixty-eight thousand followers. How many of them will be with him at the holy sepulcher of abolished Poverty?

In the old crusade there was a serious split between the Latin and Greek Christians. There was no central authority, and each clung to the system of private warfare. This may be typical of the split in the United Labor party.

The second crusade was a failure. The third crusade fell through for the reason that the leaders fought among themselvs. The fourth crusade was attended by ill success. The fifth crusade captured Jerusalem for a short time. The sixth crusade was bootless. The seventh crusade was, like the majority of its predecessors, a dismal failure. The eighth crusade did not get there. The ninth and last reached Nazareth, slaughtered its inhabitants, and then returned to England. The holy city is to-day in the hands of the Infidel, and the alleged tomb of Christ is guarded by a Mohammedan soldier, whose duty it is to see that Christians of different sects do not fight over the holy sepulcher. Did God will all this? If the devil had willed it and carried out his intentions, could the crusades hav ended worse than they did? Is Mr. George's hope for the success of the new crusade based upon the happy results of the old ones?

To say that God wills it is no argument. Indeed, it generally indicates a total lack of argument. It has been the cry of fanaticism in all ages, and in all ages the struggle for liberty has been a struggle between the will of the people and the alleged will of God. The will of God means a theocracy. The will of the people means a republic. If there is merit in a new doctrin, let that doctrin stand upon that merit. Let reason rule. "Let the ghosts go. Let them cover their eyeless sockets with their fleshless hands and fade forever from the imaginations of men."

Mexican Politics and Religion.

It is a fact proved by history that when religion is introduced into politics, politics is corrupted and even religion is not made more attractiv. Texas found that out in her recent Prohibition campaign, and our sister republic, Mexico, is learning the lesson. There are in that republic two parties, the Liberal and the Clerical, the former made up mainly of Protestants and no-religionists; the latter, of Jesuits. The constitution and administration are much like those of the United States, and hav been since 1857, though twice overthrown and restored. Formerly the Catholic church owned nearly one-third of the real-estate of the entire country, but their landed property has since been nationalized, the convents abolished, and superfluous church-buildings sold or converted to public use. For this sequestration of their property the Catholics had only themselvs to thank. They had become so overbearing and so intolerant of all other forms of belief or unbelief, that theirs was the only creed permitted in the country. The times called for either nationalization of their property or another French revolution.

At present the war between the Liberal and Clerical parties is reported to be extremely animated. The Monitor Republicano, a Liberal newspaper published in the City of Mexico, in its issue of September 3d says that there appears to be a well-formed plan among the Jesuits to destroy in Mexico the precious achievement of religious liberty, and charges that the higher as well as the lower class of the clergy is constantly preaching a crusade against religious tolerance as enjoined by the constitution of the country. The Monitor charges that ecclesiastial penalties are inflicted for reading the Liberal party newspapers, and that recent acts of some of the bishops tend to revive the institutions of the Middle Ages. It also charges that this intolerance, displayed in the persecutions of the people who hold liberal views, is the chief cause of there being no influx of foreign immigration into the country, and says: "It is feared with reason that the clergy contemplate repeating on Mexican soil the horrible atrocities of Saint Bartholomew's Day in France."

It is proposed by the Liberals to immediately organize anti-clerical leagues throughout the republic. One has already been established in the City of Mexico, which declares undying hostility to the Jesuits, and states its purpose to be the emancipation of the Indians of the country from the slavery of ecclesiastical rule, and compelling observance of the reform laws. In a circular letter addressed to the public, the league says it is opposed to bloodshed, and only desires an intellectual struggle.

An intellectual struggle is exactly the kind of struggle which the Jesuits will not giv the Liberals. They will fight them as the Catholics fight in this country, by the corruption of legislatures and by the exercise of arbitrary power over the ignorant and superstitious. The recent instructions of a Puebla bishop to his subjects not "to hav even the slightest social or business intercourse with Protestants" is an example of the latter method, and the attempts of the clergy to obtain concessions from the government allowing the church more privileges than it now has is an example of the former. The Clerical organs all over the country set themselvs in open hostility to the United States and American institutions, and oppose the development of intercourse between the two republics. It is prophesied that the religious controversy will enter into the next presidential election, as the only question in Mexican politics just now appears to be whether Mexico shall remain a republic and take its place "among the nations of the earth," or relapse into a hierarchy, as it was in colonial times, and sink to the level of other countries in which the church has undisputed control, as it certainly will do if the priests come once more into power. With the examples of all these other countries before them, it would seem that the people of Mexico must be blind if they do not take the proper course and deny the Jesuits every vestige of political power beyond what they may properly exercise as individuals and citizens of a republic.

Labor Holiday.

The first Monday of September having been made a legal holiday by Governor Hill and the New York legislature, and having been christened Labor Day by general consent, it was duly observed by a portion of the toilers of New York city and elsewhere. It was not, however, accepted by all the employers without protest. They argue that, coming as it does at a busy time in the fall trade, and affecting this state exclusivly, and New York city particularly, its institution is prejudicial to the business interests of both state and city. Nevertheless, it was a great day, and vast throngs joined in its celebration. Those who could not feel that they were sufficiently entitled to the name of "laborers" to join the parade could at least stand upon the sidewalk and see the procession go by, or, if they felt so disposed, they could observe the day by working in the usual manner.

Opinion is divided as to the wisdom of making this additional legal holiday. It is called class legislation, since it is theoretically a legal recognition of a labor class as distinct from a class who are not supposed to be laborers. Exactly where the line between these is to be drawn, no one, we take it, would be able to say, unless it be between employers and employees. As a matter of fact, however, employers often work harder and longer than any whom they employ. With them left out of a labor demonstration, therefore, the hardest workers are unrepresented, while if they were to be included the demonstration would lose its character and become general.

Labor day owes its origin to the political influence which the various labor organizations were able to bring to bear upon the governor and legislature. It therefore belongs especially to organized labor, and Organized Labor day would much more accurately describe it than its present name. But as the labor organizations hav an autonomy of their own and are supposed to exercise a control over their members, the question may properly be asked why they should seek legal recognition of a day which they hav set apart as their own. Their disciplin, their numbers, and consequently their strength, could be displayed in a much more imposing manner if the observance were more exclusiv and if, so to speak, they had the day to themselvs. They would then, in most instances, lose the pay for the day's work which they might otherwise hav performed, but this sacrifice would be only another proof of devotion to their cause.

The act of making a holiday a legal one has of itself very little force, as witness the prevalent disregard of the Saturday half-holiday. Every holiday means so much money withdrawn from the wages of the laborer, since the state has no right to force a corporation or an individual to pay for labor not performed. It is in every instance, except that of public employees, the generosity of the employer that stands between the laborer and the loss of pay for his holidays.

The chief objection to Labor day is its legal character. All workers hav a right to govern themselvs as to the time they shall work and the time they shall not work. They can, however, hav no right to coerce others into idleness. Suppose business men should through political influence secure a legal holiday to be known as Employers' day, and suppose they should then compel their employees to work that day without pay. This would be exactly equal to the demand of the employee that the employer shall pay him for a day upon which he does not work.

Labor is honorable and almost universal. Nearly everybody works. Those who do not work lead lives of uselessness. A true labor holiday would be a holiday for all except the drones who do nothing and who therefore hav a perpetual holiday. A legal holiday should be the choice of the whole people. Class holidays should not be made legal. If the people find that they are necessary or desirable, they will adopt them and observe them, and Labor day has still to undergo this test. It must be admitted that the general observance of September 5th indicates that, as a day of recreation, the people of New York hav pronounced in its favor.

Piety Against Honesty in New Jersey.

The bill of costs which the clerk of the Morristown court charged up against Mr. Reynolds, and which Colonel Ingersoll paid last May, is very interesting reading. It proves what we said at the time, that when a Jersey Christian gets a chance at a New York heretic's pocket, he dives deep and stays down a good while.

The swindle, it will be observed, begins early in the record, and goes right through. No respect is paid by the clerk, or his deputy, to the law; the idea that possessed them seems to hav been to extract as many dollars from the heretic as possible. If it has all gone into the state treasury, we are very much surprised.

During the trial we were astonished at the number of witnesses against Mr. Reynolds called by the district attorney. It is explained now. He was piling up costs for the benefit of the clerks. Two witnesses only need hav been called, and their fees by law could only hav reached 90 cents, for they were residents of Morristown, and the law allows no mileage when the witnesses reside within one mile of the court. We wonder if the district attorney benefited by the host of swearers? When he addressed the jury, which was not remanded, but for whose remand the clerk duly charged, Mr. Cutler bore down heavy upon the necessity of upholding the Law. The Law, said Mr. Cutler, is the shield of our liberties. The Law is the palladium of New Jersey's rights. The Law is the expression of the People's Will. The Law must never be broken with impunity. With the defendant's opinions the jury had naught to do. It was with the Law only that they could be concerned. The Law demanded the punishment of blasphemers, and it was solely to maintain the majesty of the Law, the expression of the People's Will, that he sought the conviction of the defendant. At all hazards, gentlemen, he concluded, keep inviolate the Law.

How he himself kept the law the figures of the bill of costs show.

The illegal practice of over-charging losers in law courts, while not confined to New Jersey, is probably more extensivly in vogue in that state than any other. The New Jersey friend who aided us in this exposure, on one occasion was overcharged to such an extent that he sued the court officials and compelled them to refund. In obtaining this list of costs we ourselvs had to suffer. The legal fee for furnishing a copy of a bill of costs is fifty cents. We were compelled to pay one dollar and fifty cents for it. From that commencement the swindle is continuous. Many of the illegal items are printed in the columns, showing that overcharging has become a settled custom, and that the clerks hav become bold and brazen in their illegal iniquity.

Mr. Reynolds has before him the opportunity of teaching these people a lesson. Here before him are the charges; there the law prescribing the penalties for the theft from Colonel Ingersoll's pocket. The suit that he could bring might convert a few of New Jersey's people from Christianity to honesty.

Vaccinating School Children.

Mr. I. W. Archibald, of Everett, Mass., sent his little girl to a public school of that place, but she was refused admission because she had not been vaccinated. He wants to know what he can do about it.

The case is an aggravating one, but by no means isolated. The same rule regarding vaccination obtains in most large cities, and is based upon the popular idea that inoculation prevents smallpox. The physicians of the most eminence—whether they are the best or not is another matter—hold this theory. The boards of education in cities are composed of more or less respectable gentlemen who are not physicians. The moral, mental, and physical welfare of school children is placed in their care. In regard to morals, they compel the teachers to teach the generally accepted tenets. The course of instruction is mapped out by successful educators and adopted by the school trustees. The rules pertaining to physical health are such as eminent physicians prescribe. The school trustees, in a majority of cases, are honestly desirous of promoting the value of the school in their charge. In making vaccination compulsory they believe they are taking measures of great sanitary importance. The state places the power in their hands, and therefore the rule is legal.

But it is, nevertheless, an invasion of personal liberty that is galling to parents who conceive that they are the proper ones to say what shall be done to and for their children. And what makes the matter worse is the fact that hundreds of children hav contracted disease by being vaccinated, while the fact that smallpox did not attack those who may hav been vaccinated is a case of providential escape from disaster due to not being where the disaster occurred. A great many vaccinated people hav afterward had the dreaded disease.

There are two sides to this question. It is conceded, in the first place, that it is the duty of the school authorities to do what is in their power to prevent the spread of contagious diseases among the large number of school children collected in a city public school. The majority of human opinion is in favor of vaccination. Of course, the majority is just as apt to be wrong as the minority, and it is not necessary to discuss that. But the majority being in favor of it, the school trustees are justified, so far as a majority can justify any governmental measure, in adopting the rule. They are trying to do their duty.

On broader grounds—and these are the grounds upon which we stand—the majority has no right to impose any such rule upon the minority in matters upon which there is such diversity of opinion as upon this subject. It is, therefore, a question of the limitation of the powers of government; and as most people are probably agreed that governmental powers should be restricted as much as is compatible with public safety, the vaccination rule, considering the unreliability of the process, is an infringement of personal and political rights.

But Mr. Archibald will hav to submit or send his child to a private school.

THE Radical, of London, reports that the Balls Pond Secular Sick and Tontine Society has recently been registered under the Friendly Societies Act, and is now in working order. The objects of the society are to provide medical aid and a weekly allowance for members in case of sickness, to furnish aid to members in case of accident, and to provide for the interment of deceased members or their wives. The subscription rates are low, and the benefits are said to be as generous as they can be consistently with fairness and stability. Many Freethinkers hav expressed a desire to see such a society established, and London Secularists hav now an opportunity of joining one which may be said to be designed by Freethinkers for Freethinkers.

THE Rev. J. J. White was formerly pastor of the Methodist church at New London, Conn., but through a wicked conspiracy, involving his personal reputation, he was expelled from the pulpit. He at once formed an independent church, and "the Lord blessed his labors," as he claims. Meanwhile, the church which cast him out got in debt, and the other day was sold at auction, the purchaser being none other than the Rev. J. J. White himself. He will move his independent congregation into the old building, and will enjoy the fame which comes to all preachers who attend strictly to their ministerial functions.

MRS. SLENKER desires any friend having copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER they do not wish to preserve to mail them to her. Those later than July will be most serviceable, though old ones will serve her for circulating. She has many poor friends who ask her for Liberal papers, and her regular supply is insufficient.

THE Young Men's Christian Association of Brockton, Mass., refuse to receive the donated subscription of the Providence People because that paper quoted Thomas Paine's splendid sentiment: "The world is my country; to do good my religion."

Lectures and Meetings.

DR. J. L. YORK will lecture for Friendship Liberal League, Philadelphia, Sunday evenings, September 25th and October 2d, in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, at 8 o'clock. As these lectures are to be free to the public, Liberals throughout the state are earnestly requested to attend and assist to meet expenses. Geo. Longford, secretary, 1106 Leopard street.

A PRELIMINARY state society, to be known as the "The Colorado Liberal Union," was organized in Longmont, Col., in May. Judge Woy was elected president; Etta Dunbar, secretary and treasurer, Longmont; W. F. Jamieson, state lecturer and corresponding secretary, Monte Vista, Col. Longmont Liberals paid to the lecturer $100 toward the fund to canvass the state, lecture, and organize Liberal societies. Annual membership fee, $1. Liberals all over the state should send in their names and become acquainted with each other. Address W. F. Jamieson, Monte Vista, Col.

J. F. BECK, secretary of the Adams county, Ohio, Secular Union, writes: "Please announce in THE TRUTH SEEKER that Charles Watts, editor of Secular Thought, Toronto, Can., has been secured for a course of seven lectures for our third annual Liberal camp-meeting, to be held at Peebles and West Union, O., on September 16th, 17th, and 18th. Peebles is on the Cincinnati & Eastern Railroad, connecting Cincinnati and Portsmouth. Freethinkers in those two cities will please observe and be sure to attend the entire course, bringing as many of their orthodox friends as can be induced to listen to reason. The subjects are as follows: 1. 'Secularism: What Is It?' 2. 'Unbelief: Its Nature and Value.' 3. 'Morality and Religion: Which?' 4. 'Science: Its Struggles and Triumphs.' 5. 'Christianity: What Has It Done?' 6. 'Atheism and Theism.' 7. 'The Nightmare of Theology.'"

Heretical Personalities.

WHEN E. A. Stevens writes letters he shows his appreciation of the ladies by adding postscripts. P.S. No. 2 of his last to us runs this way: "Although in a hurry, I do want to express my high appreciation of those articles by Felix Oswald. Suppose you are going to publish in book form. I hope so, at any rate. He combines rare literary skill with profound philosophy and scientific research, and can condense more thought into an ordinary article than any man I know of." For the information of Mr. Stevens and other admirers of Professor Oswald, we may say that as soon as the series is completed, it will be brought out in that handsome form of book which Mr. Somerby knows so well how to force from unwilling artisans. It will probably make over two hundred pages, and sell for a dollar.

WATSON HESTON, whose artistic work in THE TRUTH SEEKER has been so generally commended and criticised, is a young man of only one hundred and seventeen pounds avoirdupois, most of which weight is above his shoulders. He is quick, nervous, and bony, and always sympathizes with the under dog in a fight. He looks the typical Westerner, and if he should don a slouch hat and tuck his trousers into his boot-legs he might be taken for a miniature cowboy. He has been married fourteen years, and considers it not a little remarkable that he and his wife are in love yet. He never had a lesson in drawing in his life, but will move to New York this fall and study art. His admirers may therefore look for an improvement in the technique of his work, but he will find it requires effort to improve his ideas.

C. P. FARRELL, Colonel Ingersoll's publisher, has been spending the summer at Franconia, N. H. Like all the folks (regardless of sex) around Colonel Ingersoll, he is one of the best fellows in the world, and deserves his good fortune. He used to be a merchant in Illinois, but after marrying Mrs. Ingersoll's sister he started in to spread heresy by putting Colonel Ingersoll's lectures upon the market in an attractiv and respectable style. He has been very successful in this, and but for the book thieves who steal the property of Mr. Ingersoll, the sale of the writings of this one author would make a business of enormous proportions, and keep Mr. Farrell busy. Mr. Farrell is about thirty-five years old, big and bony, never loses his temper, and quotes Ingersoll incessantly; but the best thing he has said lately is that he expects to publish Colonel Ingersoll's speech in the Reynolds trial next month.

Now that our genial associate, C. P. Somerby, the Business End of the Truth Seeker Company, is away up in New Hampshire seeking a little rest, we can tell what he is like without making him blush. Before THE TRUTH SEEKER invaded New York, Mr. Somerby was publishing Infidel books in this city. He is tall, strong, and brunet, a descendant of the Puritans, a Vermonter by birth, a whilom resident of the great Northwest, and knows more about heretical books than anyone else in the country. In social economy he is a Communist, in religion an Atheist-Positivist; in politics he is a Prohibitionist and for the best man. His strong points of character are modesty, honesty, and enthusiasm, and a firm belief that a hundred years from now the world will be a great deal better than it is at present. He is about forty-four years old, married, and never so happy as when helping along the progressiv swing of the universe.

J. L. York is on his way East, and will be in this city soon. He writes that "things are booming" in Pittsburgh, and expects them to boom in Philadelphia, which city he will soon reach. Dr. York is another big and bony Infidel, of strong personality, and possesses sufficient of what is called "magnetism" to hold his audience in sympathy with him. He is a Spiritualist, but, as they say of people who are quietly religious, he doesn't work at it much. He has lived something over half a century, a great deal of the time in California, owns a place in San José, makes money at lecturing, and spends it freely in spreading the gospel of Freethought. If the Manhattan Liberal Club will giv him an evening, and the audience a collection. New Yorkers will hear him next month, and the Man With a Badge-Pin will describe his eloquence with that regard for Truth which so well becomes him. The best thing about Dr. York is that he takes his wife with him on his travels.

MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER, whose affairs are attracting a good deal of attention just now, will be sixty years old two days before next Christmas. Her father was a Quaker preacher, and was turned out of his pulpit for his heresy. Mrs. Slenker is the eldest of six girls, and is a heretic in everything. Perhaps no other person, aside from Liberal editors, has written so many articles for Liberal journals as she. She writes so many that she hasn't time to spell out the words she uses, and printers often hav to be mind-readers to get the meaning of her sentences. She is so honest that she is easily deceived, and no doubt some of her correspondents hav taken advantage of this fact. Her husband owns a woollen mill in Snowville, and is well to do for that section of the country, but his wealth is chiefly in his mill. Should Mrs. Slenker be fined to the extent of the law, it would almost ruin him to pay the fine. Mrs. Slenker is a plain, grandmotherly countrywoman, used to hard work, but living more outside of her surroundings than in them. She is unconventional to a painful extent, and hates a hypocrit. In her hands a hoe is as familiar as a pen, and her garden is the pride of her neighborhood. She is a botanist of no little information, and her simple descriptions of plants and flowers take with the children immensely.

LEXINGTON, KY., Aug. 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I will relate a little story my father used to tell. An Irishman came to this country, and thought he would go to the Protestant church. The parson's sermon was on Samson. After he got through, the Irishman goes up to him, and taps him on the shoulder and says:

"And what mighty mon was that you was a-talking about awhile ago?"

"It was Samson, the strongest man that ever lived."

Says Pat: "Faith and bejases, I hav a full cousin in the north of Ireland could sweep hell and blazes out of your strong Samson, so he could." J. P. J.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10 for five new subscribers. Send papers as per inclosed list. Before this reaches you, you will hav learned that Mr. Putnam has been and gone. But I hope it will not be out of place to say a word in his favor. I think he is just immense. He was well received by a large portion of our community, and made many friends for the Liberal cause. He draws well, and holds about all he draws.

Some of our lady friends said to me that they were very sorry that he had left. I said to them he (Mr. Putnam), like Christ, had promised to come again; and I was quite sure he would be here first, as he had given us the date.

ALCOVE, NEB., Aug. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: My letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER about the first of March, 1887, led parties to address me in regard to government land, and also numerous other questions, so I was led to send a second, which was printed August 20, 1887.

Now, I receive letters wanting to know why I do not tell the whole TRUTH SEEKER family all about it.

I will say right here I will write a piece for your paper once a week if they will pay you for your trouble printing it. I want nothing for writing. I will giv them my views as best I can on paper, including health out here, productivness of the soil, Indians, cattle ranches, water, fuel, and last, but not least, all about the government land. If you do not wish it I will send it to any other Liberal paper they may select. Should they select some other paper, in that case, I would like to hav them send me a copy of the paper while I am writing. HENRY W. MATTLEY.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., Aug. 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I assisted at first, and hav helped to nourish thee in all thy years, and am pleased to greet thy comings—even with thy faults, which I hope will disappear in age Do you ask me what? Let me say, in many things, I think you are too tender-footed—too much under the control of church and state—and fear to expose those multiplied curses that lie at the very bottom of the iniquities that you combat on the surface. That the inherent enemy of most of our multiplied organizations is popery, from crown to sole, is no secret to the initiated. And if these continue, and all the women (things and all) should vote, what would the next century be? A set of wild church dervishes, outlined now in Abyssinia, where the lineage is on the mother's side. Alas! there are but few men and women who dare to act up to their convictions, one to elevate the mental standard, and the other the physical.

The church only requires dwarfs and cripples—it ever has bred and ever will breed disease to fill its pews.

NEW YORK, Aug. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of August 6th Mr. S. D. Jeffers asks where he can get land that he can liv on and cultivate for five years and call his own. I know nothing about Western land, but there are yet a few acres of homestead land in Florida that can be secured. It is called "state selected land," which means that the state has tried to gobble it as swamp land, but Uncle Sam has refused to giv it up. There are about two thousand acres of homestead land in Dade county, near Indian and Jubiter rivers, and about three miles north of Jubiter inlet, which fact is not generally known in Florida. Anyone interested can send $1 to the government land office at Gainesville, Fla., for a map of Township 40, south of Range 42 East. I hav secured a homestead there and am satisfied with it, but hav no advice to giv others. As yet it is a wilderness; neighbors are few, and musketoes are plenty. Homesteads cost $14, called receiver's fees. An affidavit is necessary, signed by two witnesses, declaring that they know the land to be free from overflow and fit for cultivation. But a party without several hundred dollars to start in with would better seek his fortune elsewhere. G. W. HALL.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, O., Aug. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav had the privilege of reading your valuable paper through the courtesy of an old comrade, and know that it advocates the doctrins that I always loved—the doctrin of universal rights and the common brotherhood of man. I do not wish to be considered egotistic when I say that I spent three years and seven months fighting in the service of my country to establish the fact that all men were created equal, and we all supposed that the damning heresy that oppression of any kind was a divine institution had been shot to death on a hundred bloody battlefields in the late rebellion. I was therefore surprised and dumbfounded when I read in papers of recent date of the action of the Presbyterian Synod at St. Louis, in which a certain minister resurrected the doctrin that Parson Brownlow was so completely routed in by A. C. Prime in 1854. I wish your good work could hav a greater circulation among my people (viz., the colored people), for I sincerely believe there is more religious bigotry among us than among any other race in America, and I hav often said that if there are any miracles of the nineteenth century, it is the black man's religion. Inclosed I send you a list of the works I want. Hoping the time is not far distant when I can become a regular patron of your praiseworthy journal, Yours for the motto of your paper, C. S. HANCE,

Late 1st Sergt. Co. I, 102d Mich. Col. Regt.

DES MOINES, Aug. 29, 1887.

DEAR OLD TRUTH SEEKER: Another year has rolled around, which reminds me that it is the proper time to lay in my spiritual food for the year of '88. I hav been a close reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time; am well pleased with it, and the cartoons are immense. They are the text from which I do my preaching. We would hav much healthier sermons wound off to the world if the sky pilots would study and preach from those truthful texts. I hav but one objection to your paper, and I will now giv it. I think it would be policy to let up on those letters of Mrs Colman. They would do for the Grand Army posts, or for the Republican office seeker, but for those seeking truth, they certainly are out of place, and take up valuable space of the best paper in the world. Blaine or John Sherman would pay her liberally for those negro-suffering letters. I hav quit reading them. I send you three new subscribers with my own, and postal order of $10. You see that I hav not taken out any commission for those I am entitled to, or for the collections and remittances for other small favors I hav done. Now if you will send me the photos of Paine and others advertised, I will remit if there is any difference. The names I send you as subscribers are the leading men of this city, moneyed men, and if they become as interested as myself, we can then hav some lectures delivered here. It is a shame that there is no move made in this city. We could safely say that one-half of our population would indorse the teachings of THE TRUTH SEEKER if we get at them in some way. Truly, CAPT. T. J. KENNEDY.

BOSTON, MASS., Sept. 1, 287.

MR. EDITOR: As Brother Koezly declines my improvement on his proposition, and as betting or any other form of gambling is against my principles, I will consequently accept the offer he made to leave the question to an editor for settlement, and will name Editor Macdonald of this paper, whose decision—in my favor—is already in print, and will be found on page 3 of THE TRUTH SEEKER Annual for 1886.

It is contained in these words in the explanation of a perpetual calendar, viz., "At the beginning of every century leap-year is omitted, except every fourth century—1600, 2000, etc.," which words completely refute and overthrow Brother Koezly's unique idea—and upon which his mistaken computation is based—that it took 1601 to begin that century.

The Year of Science calendar having, therefore—as everyone can plainly see—begun its centuries or hundreds on the same day that the superstitious style "A.D." began one, viz, Jan. 1, 1600, it must then, of course, use the identical figures for its tens and units that the Christian calendar does, and consequently the date 287 must certainly correspond with the 1887 date of the humbug "Year of our Lord" style. Can anything be plainer, and is not Brother Koezly satisfied now that he was in the wrong in his figuring?

His confusion arises largely from supposing that calendars use the figure 1 as the starting-point of a new century, but if he will just "point off" the year 1600, he will see that it gives 16 for the hundreds, 0 for the tens, and 0 also for the unit with which to inaugurate the first year of the 17th century, which was none other than the year 1600, as is now proved to him in his own desired manner. GEO. N. HILL.

COLUMBUS, O., Aug. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: One of the most striking features of the visit of Dr. York to this city was his address to the prisoners of the Ohio State Penitentiary on Sunday, August 28th, at the hour they meet for chapel exercises, 10 A.M. Captain Koehne, one of the officials of the place, succeeded in getting permission to dispense with the general program, and allow the doctor to occupy the entire forty-five minutes. All went off well, apparently, till the arrival that morning on the grounds, when printed programs were distributed saying that the time would be occupied by "hymn, prayer, scripture reading, hymn, sermon by Rev. De Bruin." Against this the doctor immediately protested to the warden, refusing to be brought in as a "side-show," which it was undoubtedly the scheme of the Christian managers to do. The warden being a gentlemen, besides seeing the injustice of so meanly using him after promising him the time, told him to proceed, and that he should hav the entire time. After the prisoners were seated the doctor read a beautiful poem. The choir then sang a hymn, after which came a splendid address by the doctor upon right living taught without Christianity, leading back to the days of happy childhood, of the love of mother, of brothers and sisters, and the impossibility of happiness without character. He interspersed his speech with hygienic suggestions that might improve their condition physically, mentally, and socially. Many of these poor, unfortunate fellows, as they thought of their homes as pictured by the speaker, had to hide their faces and weep the tears of saddened disappointment. At other times at his pleasantries would they rattle their feet like good fellows. It was a treat for them, and those close by in the choir whispered an invitation to the doctor to come again.

Besides the prisoners there were over four hundred visitors present, who went away accrediting one more laurel to the crown of a Freethinker than Christianity had taught them existed there.

The doctor also addressed a labor meeting in the City Hall, and will be found to possess radical and sound ideas as to the land, labor, and capital question. He was also called upon while here to deliver an oration at the funeral of a little child, which duty he performed with credit both to himself and the occasion.

One credit to the city of Columbus, O., is that it is, perhaps, the first place in the United States where a Freethinker has been introduced to the right to assist in elevating the fallen victims of vice by addressing the inmates of a prison to the exclusion of Christian prayers and sermons for an entire Sabbath. The papers were fair enough to report the meeting favorably and justly. R. H. R.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: From the general knowledge of Liberalism that I hav acquired, it seems lacking as regards a true balance of ideas—seems to require a something from other liberalizing systems that shall round it out into a complete and harmonious whole.

Its mission seems to be a pulling down of old ideas, removing that over-sacredness regarding Bible teachings which forbids others than the clergy to reason upon them, and an endeavor to set aside everything between the two lids of the Bible that will not bear the light of each man's individual reason. But reason is a gradual growth in the understanding, according to one's enlightenment from study and experience, so that what to one mind may seem ridiculous, to another may seem quite probable, and within the realm of law and reason as well. Earthly reason alone, unenlightened from spiritual sources—mind free from body—cannot solve the seemingly paradoxical statements of the Bible; it must come through inspiration—through revelation. In this way the Bible had its birth. Its teachers were inspired of God or spirit (using the word spirit as we now use the word congress—a collection of like units, with a common name applied to all as a body or organization); its healers performed their marvelous cures, not alone by force of their own spirits, but by that of the spirits or a spiritual magnetism working through them; and, lastly, its wonderful phenomena were a manifestation of the spirit side of life, of organized spirit action, of man glorified and exalted to the full dignity of his nature through the acquisition of universal knowledge from a residence in two worlds.

You may naturally ask, from your standpoint of pure reason, How do you kuow this that you assert so positivly? And I answer: From a six years' knowledge of an objectiv presentation of facts and phenomena in modern Spiritualism, similar and closely allied to those of Bible days, coupled with a personal, conscious, intuitiv revelation of the spiritual "true inwardness" of scripture and the ministry of Christ Jesus.

In no other way can man attain unto it, except he receive it from one so instructed, and in a manner best adapted for him to receive it.

For this reason it becomes necessary for the spirit-world to raise up the inspired mediums who grace our platforms, some of whom unconsciously voice the thought of the controling intelligence, while others are inspired along the line of their own acquired knowledge.

Hence such pictures as throw ridicule upon the clairvoyant vision of Jacob's ladder, by illustrating it as a modern toboggan-slide, with angels ascending and decending, are entirely uncalled for in the light of modern Spiritualism. "Seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you." A SPIRITUALIST.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., Aug. 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I take the liberty and pleasure to submit to you for publication in your paper my views on the great question of life and death. Christianity versus Rationalism is a greater issue than ever before; science and reason are penetrating the vast problem. Too long hav religion, fanaticism, and superstition kept the world in mental slavery; but these times of enlightenment are bringing about mental freedom, and all who hav the courage of their convictions can liv free from the terrible monster superstition. Those who are willing to liv in fear of an unknown God and a hell that does not exist, let them do so. As men's minds are constituted they must take different views on this tremendous question. I can see the truth as I never saw it before. Why is Christianity in the ascendancy? Why is it existing in this country so strongly? It exists by the power of belief. The great majority of the people and wealth are on its side. The great trouble is this: The orthodox are necessarily fools; that is, if they believe the Bible. People do not recognize the right of a man to think for himself. They say you must think as we do, accept the teachings of Christianity unconditionally, or be lost in hell. Take the survival of the fittest; that is enough to crush out religion as it is. A religion of reason is wanted, not that of superstition. We are governed entirely by cause and effect. The old cry of God's will is proven false by the demonstrated fact that the fittest must necessarily survive. Mental slavery is far worse than physical slavery, and it is astonishing how most people so willingly accept a doctrin that cannot be proved.

If Christianity is anything, it is a monster of tyranny, a foe to liberty of mind and enlightenment. Of all sects the Roman Catholic is the worst. Its tenets are so preposterous and unjust that all friends of Freethought must be fearfully concerned at its growing power. The brave Dr. McGlynn is now a free man. He has defied the Romish authority with great courage, and preserved his individual liberty. All honor to him. If every man who is a thinker would dare exercise his rights, what a revolution of sentiment would occur! But most people will continue religious, because it offers hope, and that is all they want; like drowning men, clinging to straws, they are satisfied with it. This is a free country; let all who want to liv and die in fear and superstition do so. Infidels and Freethinkers hav rights that church people are bound to respect. I am a Freethinker by consideration. I am one of that kind who want to know the reason why. As long as I liv I will maintain my rights. Every man, woman, and chi d is a free, distinct individual being, and in the very nature of things their own God; the the truth is, the great almighty fate is God, and all who can not or will not accept this fact are simply fools.

Christianity has its strongest supporters among the ignorant and superstitious. Look at the negro population of this country, the down-trodden and ignorant race. They are the most thoroughly superstitious of any people, and they take to religion as naturally as a duck takes to water. A negro Infidel would be something new under the sun. Imagination is their conductor. There are a vast number of deluded white people who liv in mental slavery, who are almost as superstitious as negroes. I hav talked to many of them. We can liv without religion, for Agnosticism is better than religion. It givs mental freedom, common-sense, and reason, and all that is good is in it; it teaches all to do good because it is good. The gospel of humanity is the only real religion. Christians do right because they want to get to that heaven they believe in; people of Freethought do right for the sake of right, heaven or no heaven. The whole question of the universe now is the gospel of superstition versus the gospel of humanity. THOS. J. CONNERS.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Sept. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Will you allow me to report from our goodly city the progress of Liberalism? We still keep up our League organization, but hav not held meetings for some time for the want of a hall. But we expect to start them up this fall.

For the last two years the labor question has been the all-absorbing topic, and good work has been done in organizing, and agitating, and educating, so that good work has been done in political reform.

Dr. Juliet H. Severance and myself hav spent the last four weeks in Spiritualist camp-meetings, and we find, like every other class of people, there are two factions—the radical, or rational, Spiritualists, and the conservativ, or orthodox, Spiritualists. The latter seem to be drifting more and more toward the churches. They are fast using the forms and ceremonies of opening their meetings with prayer, and singing orthodox hymns with as great an unction as the most veritable Christian, and if you say a word against these ceremonies they say you are bigoted, prejudiced, etc.

They seem to hav transferred their worship of the old orthodox God to the spirit world and the angels, and running after the phenomena and wanting a test, and losing all interest in the great problems of the hour, and more interested in the spirit world and the angels than they are in humanity and in this world.

This same class are ready to accept all (what seem to me) vagaries, such as Christian science, mental science, metaphysics, or whatever name they may choose to call it, and reincarnation, etc.

That they may hav performed some remarkable cures I do not doubt, but not in the way they claim, but in accordance with the same laws that our healing mediums hav done, and in all past ages. But this they emphatically deny, saying that magnetism, or psychology, or spirits hav nothing to do with it.

But I notice the teachers of this new method of treating do not practice, but devote their time to teaching. I would refer the reader of this article to an able editorial in the Banner of Light of August 27th, in which it expresses my ideas exactly.

But I am glad to say that the radical Spiritualist can be found in the front ranks of all reforms, ready to help to make this world better, feeling that in helping humanity here he is making the spirit world better also, for that is founded upon this the earth life. With this class of workers in the Spiritual movement I wish to work, for I am more interested in angels here and in the ever-present now than I am in the other side of life, for I know more about it. I know of the sorrows and sufferings, the inequality, the injustice, the ignorance, of this earth life, and I am willing to work with Infidel, Freethinker, Materialist, Spiritualist, and even the Christian, for I find some of them that are willing to work for the cause of human progress.

So I say let us all try and do what we can for the betterment of this life, invoke or aspire for all the help we can get from others either here or in the spirit side of life.

A mere knowledge of the communion of spirits with mortals does not seem to make anyone better. It is carrying out the philosophy that is taught by the most advanced in this life and in the other side of life that makes us better.

We need to be saved from our ignorance, and knowledge and wisdom are what we must seek to obtain before we can hav heaven within us. A. B. SEVERANCE.

TERRELL, TEX., Aug. 22, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: About March 15th our legislature (after a long petition of the preachers) passed a law, ordering an election the 4th of August to amend our state constitution, prohibiting the sale or manufacture of spirits, beer, or wine only by prescription of a physician, except for mechanical, scientific, or sacramental purposes.

If the election had come off in twenty days after it was ordered, I believe the state would hav gone strong for the prohibitory amendment.

As a class we are a sober and temperate people.

As soon as the canvass commenced, most every preacher of the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, and Campbellite—and many preachers from other states were imported—commenced all over this broad land at once to preach Prohibition from their pulpits and on the stump everywhere and at all times.

Never in this country was there such a live and thorough canvass by any party. For three and a half long months they preached, exhorted, prayed, and sang for God to come down and become a politician, and help their side, of course. So strong did they press their cause that no good member of the church, in their judgment, could oppose Prohibition. Mouths were locked and tongues stayed of their members whom they could control. The few preachers and school-teachers who had the manhood to oppose them were forced to resign, and were brushed away with the club or the sharp and keen whip of the church, who knocked out and lashed into line all they could.

The church appealed to the ladies, and lashed those who opposed them with more severity than they did the men.

Never in any election was there so much bitterness engendered. Epithets thick, sharp, and bitter were poured out against all who opposed them in a way that none could do except the clergy, who as usual claimed all the intelligence, virtue, and good.

So plain was the intention to capture and control the state, that many men who would hav voted Prohibition turned out in their might, with the love of freedom burning within, and defeated the amendment by one hundred thousand out of a total vote of three hundred and seventy thousand. And yet an overwhelming majority is for temperance. There were fifty speeches, sermons, and prayers for prohibition to one speech against the amendment.

Texas has achieved the greatest victory for freedom—a victory against the union of church and state—that was ever gained in this state. The great beauty of it is that we hav gained it at the expense of the churches named. These churches hav received a shock from which they will never recover.

We hav been trained here to regard preachers as a set of pure men—men who would not stoop to exaggerate a thing; who favor free speech and free press; men who would not pollute their pure tongues by misrepresentation. But all know better now. The public see them for the first time just as they are. The public hav learned that the politicians and the political parties of the country are pure, good, and tolerant compared to the clergy and their churches. History repeats itself that the clergy and churches are the most selfish and oppressiv men and organizations that ever afflicted humanity.

Freethought has also gained a great victory. As the shackles of orthodoxy are broken, Freethought is strengthened. Thus the light of truth gleams forth unexpectedly; the cause of virtue, of light, of higher morals, of mental freedom, and of true manhood is strengthened. Beacons of light are seen, and will continue to be seen, until the cloud of theological superstition has vanished, and man can stand in the light of reason. Then, and not until then, will man be free. T. C. GLASS.

BEARDSTOWN, ILL., Sept. 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just returned from Havana, where I was called by telegram to attend the funeral of Miss Weaber, a Liberal. The circumstances are unusual. A few days before the end came, a sky-pilot was sent to guide her to mansions in the clouds. He opened the "log-book" of the gospel ship at two localities where, on such occasions, the ship's bearings are always and only taken; namely, God and hell He then handed it to her to read. Her eye caught the locality. With a heroism worthy a voyager on a better vessel than the old gospel hulk, she replied, "Thank you, sir, but I hav long since sailed past those fog-wreathed points." She returned the book with the remark that, if she only had the strength to converse, she could show him some passages in the "log-book" which even he would not much admire. Disgusted and discomfited, the sky-pilot retired. Not satisfied with this, some of her church relativs, backed by a churchly public, urged the family to hav a sky-pilot officiate at the funeral. Her brothers insisted that some one who would honestly and adequately voice her sentiments be secured. By thus not giving the clergy the opportunity to damn her in their horrid hell, in outraging over her dead body and grave every sentiment of truth, and brutalizing the finer feelings, they saved the reputations of the clergy. When the church failed in this second attempt to capture the case, to make capital, then it circulated the falsehood that a young lady with such sterling qualities of heart and character, as were thus portrayed, and which they knew to be no over-painted picture, must hav been a "believer!"

Thus do the church minions ransack the universe to filch the laurels of Liberalism.

Many inspired by a morbid curiosity came to see what sort of a "circus" a Liberal funeral would prove to be. It was a magnificent opportunity, and she a splendid subject, for painting the superiority of Freethought principles in view of death. It was only one of a thousand instances which giv the lie to the orthodox slander that Infidels back down from their principles at death. This falsehood was started about Thomas Paine's death, and has gone the rounds of church circles ever since. But many on this occasion afterward said they should like such a funeral when they need one. There was no Bible, no prayer, no psalm-singing. The profusion of evergreens and flowers on the casket and the grave made even death beautiful.

The happy result of all this is that the Freethinkers and the Spiritualists will probably unite to sustain regular lectures. As we are at a convenient distance, we hope to often visit these stanch Liberals.

If all Liberals would do as did this courageous family; that is, secure Liberal speakers at funerals and other occasions, the cause of Liberalism would not need to skulk as is too often the case. It is "just too utterly utter" to liv liberal one's whole life, and at last "die just the opposit." It is an unpardonable injustice to every one. When the "clergy" hav anything to do with such cases, they make it out either a recantation, or send the subject to hell, or oftener both.

If there is a species of meanness despicable above every other sort, it is this orthodox mode of vilifying the memory of a Liberal, over his dead body, when it is known that he cannot appear in self-defense. It is cowardly. And cowardice and the ungentlemanly go together.

Though it is often inconvenient for Liberal families to carry out their wishes in this respect, let them see well to it that they suffer not the memory of their dear dead to be imposed upon. Devotion to principle will do much to make such important and affecting occasions tell favorably for Freethought. ZOA TOPSIS.

FARMDALE, O., Sept. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It is some time since I hav written to the dear old TRUTH SEEKER that I love so well, and this is an appropriate time to tell you and all the TRUTH SEEKER family that Charles B. Reynolds visited our Secular Union at Farmdale, Ohio, on the 28th of August, delivering six lectures, afternoon and evenings of Aug. 28th, 29th, and 30th, to small but appreciativ audiences. It is almost impossible to get the orthodox out to a Liberal lecture, and if they would continue in their blind faith I advise them to keep well away from Brother Reynolds's strong and logical reasoning. His arguments are invincible, and though in his enthusiasm for the truth and right he may seem a little harsh in his denunciation of the Bible (to those that hav heard it spoken of only in a reverential manner), it is far from him to purposely hurt the feelings of Christian people. He would only show its absurd and contradictory teachings, along with its wicked and cruel teachings, to prove that it is only the reflection of a half-barbarous people, and not the inspired word of a God. But a faithful Christian, blind with faith and full of fear, turns a face full of contempt, if not hate, upon a man or woman that dares to reason upon religion, Christian and pagan alike. I say faithful Christian, but where there is one ignorant and faithful, there are ninety and nine full of worldly ideas, and pure hypocrits, and not honest enough to thoroughly examin the gospel of humanity or, per chance, not intelligent enough; but they think themselvs capable of sitting in judgment against us as Secularists. One of our Farmdale Christians declared he would rather be found at the saloon drunk than in company with an audience before Mr. Reynolds. O young man, to be drunk is beastly and demoralizing, and while it may be out of the nature of things for you to seriously study and examin the principles of Secularism, you would surely find it paid you well; and even a man that preferred drunkenness to Liberalism could not fail to be benefited if he would studiously examin the coming religion of humanity or the principles of Secularism! But, you see, while the saloon-keeper is to be patronized, and, perchance, eulogized, by many a Christian, our good Reynolds is denounced, and his teachings declared harmful and dangerous.

If ever the people of America are free from ignorance and all the accompanying evils thereof, it will not be the work of the Christian church, with her army of eighty thousand priests and ministers, and their millions of dollars' worth of property, but will be the work of the few against the many. In spite of opposition and lack of popularity, my heart goes out in sympathy and love to all that are laboring for humanity, no matter what field of thought they may labor in, so it be a field of science and truth. Here let me say a word for our venerable and loving Aunt Elmina. The science she has labored so faithfully for is of just as much importance to humanity, and I think all scientific physicians familiar with the subject will say of far more importance, than any other one branch of science; and, as truth seekers, let us giv her our hand in sympathy and help sustain her in her hour of trouble. If each that appreciates her laborious work in the cause of humanity would say, Here, I shall send this dear, good woman a dollar, or fifty cents, as I can afford! and ask others to do the same thing, they would be surprised at what they were able to accomplish. Here is my experience. Some time ago I said, in the presence of her friends: I am going to send fifty cents to the Defense fund; it is not much, but all I can well afford; and, voluntarily, three women gave me fifty cents each to put with my fifty cents, making two dollars; then by agitating the thing in a mild way I received two orders for books, a dollar from another good woman on the Defense Fund, and fifty cents from one man. See, will you, how much more sympathetic and generous are the women. That is good for Aunt Elmina to know she has support and sympathy from her own sex. But I will say the one gentleman was all I asked personally. I felt sure of his sympathy, and trembled to ask support from others for fear of a cold rebuff. It is natural, I suppose, for a woman to very much dislike to ask for money and be refused, and I feel instinctivly that those who will not enter into conversation in a seusible manner about Aunt Elmina's case are the ones that would refuse to help sustain her. By request Mr. Reynolds said a few words in her behalf, and glowing words too.

Reynolds is bound to hav a host of friends wherever he may go. His sympathetic and genial nature givs him good power over an audience. I hav always thought myself proof against ministers, but I fear Mr. Reynolds could nearly hav won me over to his church, not from his arguments, but because I would like the sympathy and friendship of such an earnest, honest, and good man. His afternoon lectures here were the best, I thought, and only small audiences to listen, with a very good house for the evening lecture Liberals everywhere will do well to secure his services; th are sure to be pleased with him. It will not be out of p l here to say that I inclose three dollars to pay for paper up April next. I thank you for kindly waiting for your money.

Yours for justice and truth, MRS. NORA FERRELL.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Bereaved by Death.

For the second time the children will look in vain to this column for something from their beloved friend whose faithful labors hav made the Corner so welcome to them. When they read this account of the sad death of Miss Wixon's mother, they will know why they hav missed her from the usual place:

From the Fall River Monitor.

An accident occurred at Wareham, Tuesday afternoon, which resulted in the death of the venerable and respected Mrs. James Wixon, of this city, and the serious, if not fatal, injury of her sister, Mrs. E. D. Stanton, wife of the engineer of the Onset railroad. The two ladies had driven over from Wareham on a shopping expedition, and were on their way home when the shocking and fatal accident occurred. They approached the railroad crossing at Wareham Narrows about quarter past 4 o'clock, and held up their horse to allow the "flying dude" train, a train that has occasioned considerable loss of life in previous accidents, to pass. The horse became unmanageable, and in his terror dashed toward the flying train.

The efforts of the ladies to control him were powerless, even when aided by Flagman Sisson, who, at the risk of his own life, vainly attempted to stop the animal. The horse dashed into the tender of the locomotiv, and, together with the carriage and occupants, was thrown twenty feet aside and down an embankment. Mrs. Wixon in her fall struck a post and was instantly killed. Mrs. Stanton was very seriously injured, being made unconscious, and at last accounts had not recovered. Dr. Sawyer was summoned, and is very doubtful of her recovery. The horse was instantly killed, and the carriage was made a total wreck.

Mrs. Wixon went to Onset, her favorit summer place of recreation, a few weeks ago, in hopes of regaining strength and renewed health for the coming winter. She was accompanied by her daughter, Miss Susan H. Wixon, whose brilliant writings hav made her hosts of friends all over the United States, and who, in this hour of saddest trial, with other members of the family, will hav the tenderest sympathies of all.

Mrs. Wixon was seventy-nine years of age, and a very bright and intelligent woman, remarkably youthful for her years. Although her life had been activ and laborious, she was uncommonly vigorous for one of her years, and would enter into social pastimes with the spirit of a young person. In her day she had seen some sorrowful tragedies. On one occasion three of her sons were lost in a shipwreck at sea, one of whom was the father of her grandson, James H. Wixon. Of her large family only three remain—Deputy Sheriff Frank H. Wixon, Miss Susan H. Wixon, and Mrs. W. E. Phillips. Mrs. Wixon was a nativ of the Cape, and passed most of her youth and early married life in that section. She had a very large circle of acquaintances, and her sad death is a great shock to them. She was a regular attendant of the Unitarian church, and a member of its Sabbath-school. She was possessed of a large estate, which was left her by her late husband, Captain James Wixon, who was for many years a deputy sheriff in this city.

In a pathetic note, written with a trembling hand, Miss Wixon asks us to "explain to the children." We know that no further explanation than this will be needed, and that the disappointment of all who read the Children's Corner of The Truth Seeker will giv place to sympathy for their teacher whose life has been so often saddened by the death of relativs and friends.—Editor Truth Seeker.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By Geo. M. Davenport. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

An Offending Hat.

In 1885 your humble servant was skinned alive, or somewhat in that vicinity. A vagrant and rascally section of the Salvation Army was then fighting the good people of Elgin, Ill., and because some of the rose-water few had unjustly troubled them I did on several occasions take their part in claiming for them the right of free speech and free prayer. But what do you think? One evening the whole sanctified regiment, full of the Holy Ghost and drunk on the spirit, assembled at the city court house. On my way home I heard a fearful racket, and not knowing what was going on, and the house being a public building, I stepped in to see what the fuss was about. I found that the army were going through some of their antics. As I merely stood inside the door, for there was no room to sit down, and scarcely standing room, I did not think of removing my hat. I only intended stopping for a moment. The result was that I was ordered in a very peremptory manner to take off my hat. The order being so very imperativ, I declined doing so, when a policeman was summoned to arrest me, or rather the hat, for disorderly conduct in the court house of God (Elgin).

The hat was taken to the jail and I stuck to the hat. We were old friends. Angels and powers and principalities, Jesus, nor any other creature were not able to separate me from the love of that hat. In about five minutes the hat was bailed out, and when tried, found not guilty by an orthodox court. My friend Frank Felt made a few remarks on the matter, which the local paper published at the time. The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER all know Felt as a very pious rhymester indeed, and as these remarks were written in his best vein, I inclose a copy. which may be interesting to some of your readers.

I hav one question to ask you, which I would like to see in your paper, for the good of many, and that is this. I took my little girl to the public school yesterday, and they would not admit her because she was not vaccinated. I consider it an outrage. To think of being compelled to inoculate disease into my child or deprive her of an education. I left her at the school, but the teacher would not admit her to a class, and at noon told her she could not attend there unless she had a permit or certificate of vaccination. I sent her back after dinner, but she was sent home. Now, I want to ask, is there no redress? Can they expel a child for that reason? Would that be a sufficient reason for me not to pay my school-tax? An answer to these questions may interest more than me, and will greatly oblige your friend,

Everett, Mass. I. W. ARCHIBALD.

WICKED IKE.

Ike Archibald was an old sinner,
And so are we sinners all.
'Tis a world of sin that we liv in,
From Talmage way back to St. Paul;
For wisdom must hav its folly,
And folly will bloom into vice,
And vice has a thin compensation
That makes it seem wickedly nice.

Ike Archibald was an old sinner,
As godless as sinners could be.
He bowed at no shrine, and the stiffness
Was not all confined to the knee.
He wouldn't see God in goodness,
He couldn't see Satan in sin,
And scorned the conditions of mercy
With a coldly indifferent grin.

How man, with his eyes wide open,
Could ever become so blind,
Is more than a man can answer,
But certain it was—his mind
Was fixed—and the deepest logic
Was vain as the longest prayer
In changing a stubborn spirit,
That nothing could ever scare.

But Ike wasn't mean at performing
In general. He lived upon bread,
And paid his own money to get it,
And got all he wanted, and fed
The hungry that had none, whenever
He happened to see them about,
Or took his old sled in the winter
And hunted some starving soul out.

He would take a lame woman to meeting
With Topsy, his mare, not because
He wished to please God—but the woman;
And kindness had not many laws
He ever broke through, though his wherefore
Of kindness was not in the Lord,
And dollars had never a profit
To equal love's own sweet reward.

But Ike was a sinner, and sinners
Are sinful. He felt very sure
That sometimes a man might be foolish
Enough to be laughed at. Impure
As the thought was, he acted upon it
Sometimes in a glee most profane,
And ridiculed Moses and Moody
By quoting a verse from Tom Paine.

This world is a big one, and Isaac
Could take up considerable room,
But he never desired to go sweeping
The town with his Infidel broom;
But a little loose dirt, as he called it,
Would often lie kicking around,
And he brushed it away as a nuisance
That was not philosophically sound.

Religion might save those who sought it—
He cared not; it couldn't save him.
Yet he scarce laid a straw in the passage
Leading others to heaven—a swim
In the Styx had not washed the pollution
Of dark unbelief from his soul,
But never the faith of another
Sought he with a word to control.

But a recognized crank—one who murdered
The stillness of night with a yell,
That fumed all the air with its sulphur,
And filled all the city with hell;
He mocked and derided and swore at;
And did not know how to respect
A law that upheld in religion
An action it would not protect
In a man beastly drunk. He had lifted
His hat to a beggar, and stood
In the ranks of the humble, exalting
Himself in the name of manhood.

Yet he dared in the Lord's congregation,
When thinking the Lord wasn't in,
To stand with his hat on, and sternly
Persist in the damnable sin,
And was put into jail five long minutes,
Was tried, and released by a flaw
Connecting the "rude and indecent,"
And rudely defeating the law.

Ike Archibald! Sinful, rebellious,
Five minutes in jail isn't long,
But look out! A court that is higher
Than Elgin's shall right ev'ry wrong,
And Salvation's Army—no longer
Down-trodden—shall witness the woe
Of Isaac when sentenced to languish
Five mighty long minutes below.

Kelso's Books.

Permit me to call again the attention of the many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to Colonel Kelso's works, and especially his last, "Spiritualism Sustained." This book givs an orthodox the exquisit pleasure of being basted over the head with his own cudgel. The clergy affect to hate Spiritualism most intensely. Imagin their horror to find the object of their hatred and abuse proven true from the mouth of their own witness. I was with Colonel Kelso when he prepared and delivered the first lecture in "Spiritualism Sustained." I heard the wail of anguish and righteous indignation that "went up" to heaven from the mouth of the sky-pilot who supposed he was the exclusiv mouth-piece for the little flock of Bakersfield, California. But when a full house greeted Colonel Kelso's lecture, and respectable people applauded it, the agony of the minister was very acute. "Whom the gods wish to destroy, they first make mad."

Sherman's march through Georgia mowed a wide swath through rebeldom, so are the writings of Colonel Kelso making deep inroads in the rank and file of orthodoxy. Keep these works before the public.

Fall River, Kan. P. VAN HYATT.

The Widow Bemis's Parrot.

Mrs. Lucretia Bemis is a widow. Her husband was a sea captain, and when he died, about fifteen years ago, he left his wife, among other worldly goods, a large green parrot, versatil alike in plumage and in conversational powers. This parrot was named Neptune—a modest tribute to the trident-bearing deity whose domain had been traversed so often by old Captain Bemis. The widow Bemis enjoys the reputation of a devoutly religious woman—a woman whose conversation and deeds are marked by a singular piety. Since the demise of her beloved husband, she has lavished the wealth of her affections upon the parrot Neptune, and has devoted much time to teaching the bird religious hymns and phrases.

The Folsom boys liv next door to Mrs. Bemis. There are three of them, and they are fifteen, eighteen, and nineteen years old respectivly. Their father is a blacksmith, and he is an industrious man, but these three boys are so wondrously shiftless that they appear to hav given themselvs over, body and soul, to the devices of Satan. About a month ago, these abandoned youths turned their diabolical attention to the beguiling of the widow Bemis's parrot into sinful ways. From their back-door step they held artful discourse with the parrot as he perched in the window of the second-story back room, and ere long they taught the guileless and unsuspecting bird divers ribald words, profane expletivs, and wicked phrases likely to cause a blush of shame, if not a thrill of horror, when heard in polite society.

Last Saturday the widow Bemis happened to hear the parrot explode an oath, and to punish him for the shocking offense the proper dame locked him up in the garret for several days and fed him nothing but dry bread. On Tuesday she believed him sufficiently punished, and she brought him down into the sitting-room. The dejected countenance he wore, and the melancholy droop of his tail feathers, convinced Mrs. Bemis that Neptune was truly penitent, and thereat the good lady much rejoiced.

On Tuesday evening the regular old folks' prayer-meeting was held at Mrs. Bemis's, and the attendance was somewhat larger than usual. The ceremonies had reached the most impressiv point when the parrot, who had maintained a gloomy silence all day, ejaculated, suddenly and in harsh, discordant tones, "Rats!" It would be hard to conceive of an interruption more mal apropos, more shocking. The widow Bemis made a plunge for the depraved bird, with the intention of incarcerating him again in the garret, but, as if he foresaw her design, the parrot ripped out a volley of oaths so prodigiously shocking that the widow Bemis fell back and over on the floor and lay there like one dead.

Old Mr. Sawyer made a pass at Neptune with his cane, but all he did was to knock some veneering off the haircloth sofa. The profane bird thereupon opened out on Mr. Sawyer, and the hideous expletivs he rasped out drove that worthy old gentleman into an apoplectic fit. It seemed as if the bird had become possessed of seven devils; at any rate, never before had the ears of his auditors been burdened with such a flood-tide of ribaldry and profanity as he launched out from his perch at the back of the haircloth sofa.

The widow Bemis swore out a warrant against the Folsom boys yesterday, and Justice Kersten will hear both sides of the interesting story. The widow claims that the boys hav corrupted her parrot to such a degree that he no longer delights in goodness, but takes pleasure only in heathenish practices and sinful conversation.—New Haven Register.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents. For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

EMPEROR FRANCIS JOSEPH, of Austria, has conferred upon M. Pasteur the decoration of the Order of the Iron Crown, with the title of baron.

THE Progressiv Labor party, composed of the expelled portion of Henry George's United Labor party, will probably go into politics this fall with a county ticket.

THE Socialists of Rotterdam, Holland, tried to giv one of their agitators a reception on the 7th inst., but a crowd stoned the building in which the reception was held, and tore down and burnt a Socialist flag. Several men forced an entrance into the house and smashed the Socialist emblems, and made a general wreck of the furniture. The Socialists fled through a back door.

DR. MCGLYNN had a big congregation at the Academy of Music last Sunday evening. The collection amounted to $209.87.

THE Theater Royal at Exeter, England, was burnt last week during a play. The theater was crowded, and more than one hundred persons perished.

THE Rev. O. F. Ingolsby, Campbellite, was arrested at Starkey, N. Y., last week, on a charge of grand larceny. It is claimed that he secured $2,000 by false representations.

PLYMOUTH church was reopened last Sunday, and the Rev. Mr. Willis preached, but there is still no indication as to who will be chosen to rattle around permanently in Mr. Beecher's pulpit.

THE colored Methodists of Nyack, N. Y., had a pleasant church reception one evening last week. Prince Hankerson was fatally shot during the religious festivities, and there was a lively and satisfactory row.

A COLORED minister and Prohibition orator named Jackson, well supplied with ecclesiastical credentials, cashed a bogus $300 check in Atlanta, Ga., the other day, preached an effectiv sermon, and then skipped.

SUNDAY-NIGHT secular concerts are forbidden in New York, and all who want music on that evening must take the sacred variety. Policemen are detailed to attend Sunday-evening concerts to arrest secular musicians.

THE congregation in attendance upon a revival meeting at Needmore, Tenn., fell through the floor of a church last Saturday night. Sixty or seventy people are reported to hav been injured, one man fatally and many seriously.

THE aldermen and mayor of New York invited Mrs. Cleveland to take part in the ceremony of presenting testimonials to the firemen of this city who hav distinguished themselvs for bravery. The invitation said nothing about the president, and Mrs. Cleveland declined on the ground that she could not properly participate in any public ceremony in which her husband took no part.

AN open-air indignation meeting was held at Mitchellstown, Ireland, Sept. 8th, to protest against the prosecution of Editor O'Brien for inflammatory remarks made at a previous meeting. Seven thousand persons were present, and when a reporter and an escort of police attempted to push to the front they were assaulted with clubs and stones. The police fired into the crowd, and two men were killed outright.

Odds and Ends.

OMAHA man: "Talk about your reformers and philanthropists, I hav hit on a plan way ahead of them all." Friend: "Going to make this earth a heaven, eh?" "Pretty near it. You know that nearly all the crimes and offenses against good order are committed by men under the influence of liquor." "Yes." "And that a large proportion of these men are perfectly inoffensiv when sober." "Certainly." "But, nevertheless, after they hav served their terms, they are let out, and as quick as they drink they are as dangerous as before." "Of course." "Well, I propose to hav the word 'dangerous' tattooed on the end of their noses, but in white letters so it won't be seen." "What earthly good will that do?" "Why, don't you see? The word will become visible as quick as they begin to drink again and their noses get red."

DEACON SHARPLEY'S LAWN-MOWER, AND WHY HE SHOULD HAV A BELL-PUNCH.

"I tell you what," said a suburban friend of the Listener, as the street-car conductor came around bearing a particularly big and imposing bell-punch, "there's a deacon in our church that ought to be made to carry one of those things when he makes his collections, if ever anybody ought to be made to wear one."

"Why, what has the deacon done?"

"I'll tell you the whole story, and when I've done I want to know whether, if it had happened to you, it wouldn't hav destroyed your confidence in somebody. You see, I liv next door to Deacon Sharpley, and my yard is separated from his just by a light picket fence. I was whacking away at the grass on my little lawn the other night with a grass-hook; I was just finishing the job, and wondering whether I should ever be rich enough to swell out with a lawn-mower, when the deacon came out and leaned over the fence. 'See here,' said he, 'you're getting quite a lawn here, and so am I. We don't either of us hav quite enough business for a lawn-mower, and together we might hav. Say we go snucks on one?' I told him that I thought it was a good idea, and would go in with him on a machine. He said he would manage the purchase, and would tell me how much half the cost was. So I let him go on and buy the lawn-mower, and he brought a receipted bill for $12.50 in his own name. I gave him the $6.25, and left the machine and the receipt in his hands.

"About two weeks after that—I'd seen the deacon shoving the lawn-mower around in his yard in great style in the mean time—I thought my grass had got up enough to warrant cutting, and I went over to the deacon's to get the machine. The deacon was out, they said, but the lawn-mower was down at Mr. Smith's. I thought it was a little queer that the deacon had lent our machine, but I went down to Smith's and got it. I thought they looked a little cross when I took it, but I took it just the same and mowed my lawn. Next night the deacon came and got it again and mowed away awhile in his back-yard. A few days after that I thought it was about time to mow once more, and went over to the deacon's after the machine. No machine anywhere around. I asked at the back door:

"'Where's the lawn-mower?'

"'Mr. Smith came and got it a little while ago,' said the deacon's daughter.

Mr. Smith! What business had he with our machine? I didn't ask, but I trotted down to Smith's. I found Smith very complacently oiling the lawn-mower, and apparently getting it ready for action.

"'Well,' said I, 'I came over after that lawn-mower, but as you seem to be getting ready to use it, I suppose I can wait.'

"'Hum,' said he, 'I guess the deacon and I keep it pretty busy.'

"'So it seems,' said I, kind of sarcastically.

"'Well, we hav got to get our money's worth out of it, you know,' says he.

"That struck me as a mighty queer remark, and I couldn't help saying,

"'I should think you'd want to get one yourself.'

"'Well,' says he, looking up a little surprised, 'I own half of this one.'

"'You—you own half of this?' says I, astonished.

"'Why, certainly,' said he; 'Deacon Sharpley and I bought this lawn-mower together.'

"I tell you that took me completely down. The deacon had completely played us off, one against the other, and had got me to pay for one-half the machine, and Smith the other, calculating to get the use of it to mow all his own grass for nothing. If he had been as cautious as he was sharp, and kept the machine in his own barn, or else insisted on going after it himself, I suppose he might hav kept a-going that way. But since we've found it out, Smith and I get along first-rate, but the deacon has to hire an Irishman to mow his grass with a scythe.

"And that's the reason why I think the deacon ought to carry a bell-punch when he takes up a collection. Don't you think it would be a good scheme?"—Boston Transcript.

Gems of Thought.

THERE wou'd be justice in a few men owning the air and farming it out to those who wish to sustain life, equal to a few owning all the land and a portion of the water. All are equally gifts of nature, and all men hav a birthright inheritance in each.—D. M. Bennett.

IF, by neglect of its wings, an eagle should sink to a dodo, it would then recognize only the laws of dodo life. For the dodos of humanity, did not one believe in a consuming fire and an outer darkness, what would be left us but an ever-renewed Alas! It is truth and not impeturbability that a man's nature requires of him; it is help, not the leaving of cards at doors, that will be recognized as the test; it is love, and no amount of flattery, that will prosper; differences wide as that between a gentleman and a cad will contrast to a hair's breadth in that day; the customs of trade and the picking of pockets will go together, with the greater excuse for the greater need and the less knowledge; liars, the most gentlemanlike and the most rowdy, will go as liars—the first class shall be last and the last first.—Macdonald's Mary Marston.

ALL the religions and all the sects are in a state of flux. Even the Roman Catholic church, anchored though it be by the solid continent of institutions nearly two thousand years old, is yet partially afloat and dissolving. It, too, has its two parties, the fixed and the movable. All the leading religions, the Hebrew, the Christian, the Mohammedan, the Hindoo, the Confucian, hav been breeding in the last fifty years a race of souls too large or too free to stay within them. They all hav the ex-members or those just ready to step out. And all the denominations are in commotion, a part of the membership going backward, a part forward, and a part trying in vain to stand still between the two parties.—W. J. Potter

THE profoundly religious man of to-day never recognizes the identity between himself and the object of his worship; but he sees the applicability of this principle in times and among people having conceptions of God that are gross and low. The enlightened Christian readily admits this to be true of the ignorant savage. The well-informed Christian and the enlightened Hebrew of to-day admit that many of the Old Testament representativs of God are very imperfect, and they apologize for their grossness by saying that God, in those days, accommodated himself to the rude, ignorant of the people, since they were unable to entertain any conception of God unless he were a being like themselvs. But it is just as certain that the conception of God by the theologians of to-day is a conception of the nature of man; and whenever the Theist has recourse to volition to supply the nexus between cause and effect, he unconsciously invests nature with his own human personality.—Underwood.

WE blame Knox for his intolerance. Well, surely it is good that each of us be as tolerant as possible. Let, at bottom, after all the talk there is and has been about it, what is tolerance? Tolerance has to tolerate the un-essential; and to see well what that is. Tolerance has to be noble, measured, just in its very wrath, when it can tolerate no longer. But, on the whole, we are not here altogether to tolerate! We are here to resist, to control and vanquish withal. We do not "tolerate" falsehoods, thieveries, iniquities, when they fester on us; we say to them: Thou art false, thou art not tolerable! We are here to extinguish falsehoods and put an end to them, in some wise way! I will not quarrel so much with the way; the doing of the thing is our great concern. In this sense Knox was, full surely, intolerant. —Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

BUT Jesus turned unto Peter and said unto him: Get thee behind me, Satan; for thou art an offense unto me; for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men.—Matt. xvi, 28; also Mark viii, 33.

LET not this weak, unknowing hand
Presume thy bolts to throw;
Nor deal damnation round the land
On each I judge thy foe.
If I am right, thy grace impart,
Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, oh, teach my heart
To find the better way!
—Pope's Universal Prayer.

THE food of hope
Is meditated action; robbed of this
Her sole support, she languishes and dies.
We perish also; for we liv by hope
And by desire; we see by the glad light,
We breathe the sweet air of futurity,
And so we liv, or else we hav no life.
—Wordsworth.

DOTH any man doubt that, if there were taken out of men's minds vain opinions, flattering hopes, false valuations, imaginations as one would, and the like, but it would leave the minds of a number of men poor shrunken things, full of melancholy and indisposition and unpleasing to themselvs? —Bacon's Essays.

Notes and Clippings.

IT is reported that the inquest into the Mitchellstown, Ireland, riot reveals shameful brutality on the part of the police. No doubt.

A MAN stood on the street in New York one day last week soliciting alms. From his neck hung a placard, stating that while driving a beer wagon in Kentucky he had been struck by lightning and rendered permanently deaf and dumb. His affliction was regarded as a divine warning against driving beer wagons until he was discovered to be an impostor, with his organs of speech and hearing in a normal condition. He was sent to the workhouse for six months.

THE united German trades hav issued a manifesto addressed: "The workingmen of the United States of North America." It denounces all who had any part in the trial of the Chicago Anarchists except the condemned men and their supporters, and it says: "The judgment of blood is not yet executed. Let every man do his duty and it will never be." It is understood that the condemned men will not petition for clemency, but expect a commutation of sentence.

EDITOR BOWEN, of the orthodox Independent, left a horse and phaeton in front of his office the other day, and somebody got in and drove off with the rig. The Rev. Wm. Tully, of Hurricane, W. Va., slipped while going up stairs, and a pistol in his pocket was discharged, the ball traversing his body and killing him. The Rev. J. L. Danner, of Patterson, N. J., fell in his own yard and broke his leg. Owing to the large number of sparrows prevalent at this season of the year, these good and faithful servants are supposed to hav escaped divine notice.

A CORRESPONDENT of a London journal says: "A friend of mine, not long since, overheard a devotee interpreting to a poor woman the ceremony accompanying the penance of Ash Wednesday. The priests on that day, as he marks the penitent's forehead with ashes, pronounces the text: 'Pulvis es et in pulverem reverteris.' On coming out of chapel, this poor woman asked the devotee 'What the words were?' 'They're Latin; that's what they are.' 'But what do they mane?' 'Sure it's what they always says on Ash Wednesdays.' 'Yes, but what's the manin' of it?' 'Oh, the manin' of it? Well, it's this way, it is. It manes, in a way of spakin', "If it don't do you no good, it won't do you no harrum."'"

WM. ANDREWS, a resident of Caldwell county, N. C., asks the press to help him catch David Knight, a Baptist minister, who has deserted his wife and twelve children and eloped with Mrs. Martha Andrews, his mother-in-law. Mr. Andrews wrote the notice himself, and the following is a verbatim et literatim copy of it: "On or about the last of August 1887 David Knight and Martha Andrews run away together said Knight a baptist minister about five feet nine inches high dark complection Black beard some grey and when he preached or prays he makes a curious noise when he draws his breath he left a wife and twelve children and wife bed sick and not expected to live and the woman his mother-in-law and wife of Martin Andrews. She left her husband and one child. She has a wart or mole on the side of her nose near her eye and a small woman her age is about 48 and has two living husbands at this time."

THE patriotic Italians commemorated the other day by a parade the taking of Rome from Pope Pius IX. in 1870. Mayor Hewitt received a letter from a citizen of Albany advising him not to review the procession. He replied that "it has been customary for the mayor, when requested, to review from the City Hall steps any respectable body of citizens, and in this instance he would not depart from the usage of his predecessors, even at the risk of personal misrepresentation or of the loss of political prestige."

A CHICAGOAN, lately returned from Bar Harbor, Me., tells a curious story of the system by which drinks are served to those who desire them. "I went to the hotel clerk," he said, "and expressed my opinion of his town in very lurid terms. He asked me what was the matter, and I made no bones about telling him that I wanted a drink, and that I didn't think much of the hotel that didn't provide them for its guests. 'Well,' he said, 'I can't giv you anything, but I hav a friend, and maybe he can. I'll giv you a line to him.' Then he told me how to find his friend, and gave me a card bearing this inscription, 'Please save this man's life.' The card was efficacious, and I went back to the clerk and told him I wanted a pack of them."

NOT long ago an English parson, or curate, while passing by a house, had his dignity ruffled by a small stone, accidentally thrown in his direction by a boy of eight. The parson went home and wrote a letter to the lad's father demanding reparation. The parent paid no attention to his letter, and another written by the clergyman was equally ineffectiv. The parson took the matter to court with the avowed determination of finding out whether English law could not protect clergymen from insults, intended or otherwise, by people of low degree. He was ignominiously sat upon by the judge and had the costs for his trouble. The London Judy has done the case up in rhyme, after the following manner:

Good people all, giv serious ear
To my sad song, and you shall hear
A tale that well may prompt a tear
And banish all your glee;
Oh, hearken to the dread event
That happened to a reverend gent,
Who livs near Salisbury.

As forth he walked in saintly state,
A horrid ruffian, aged eight,
A pebble threw across a gate—
A pebble smooth and wee;
It was not for the parson meant,
But oh, it scared the reverend gent,
Who livs near Salisbury.

"Base child!" exclaimed the grand divine,
"Betwixt your social rank and mine
The gulf is great, as I opine,
And as yourself shall see;
For you shall find it is no joke
To frighten thus a reverend bloke,
Who livs near Salisbury."

The horrid ruffian, aged eight,
Was brought before the magistrate
Next day, to answer for his great
Assault and battery.
But, sad to say, the judgment went
Against, not for, the reverend gent,
Who livs near Salisbury!

Not only did he lose the day
And see his summons cast away,
But he had all the costs to pay,
Which came to one pound three.
Alack! it was a sad event
To happen to a reverend gent,
Who livs near Salisbury.

The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Secret of the East," etc.

II.—Mental Maxims.

CHAPTER IX.—PERSEVERANCE.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

In the course of evolution from brute to man some of our organs have been highly developed by constant use, while others have been stunted by habitual disuse. In special adaptions of the sense of touch and sight, for instance, man surpasses all his fellow-creatures, most of whom, in turn, surpass him in the acuteness of their olfactory organs. An analogous result seems to have been produced by the exercise or neglect of certain mental faculties and dispositions. The instinct of enterprise, for instance, has been developed from rather feeble germs of the animal soul, while the instinct of perseverance appears to have lost something of its pristine energy. The African termite ant rears structures which, in proportion to the size of the builders, surpass the pyramids as a mountain surpasses the monuments of the mound-builders. By the persistent coöperation of countless generations the tiny architect of the coral reefs has girt a continent with a rampart of sea-walls. The prairie wolf will follow a trail for half a week. The teeth of a mouse are thinner and more brittle than a darning needle, yet by dint of perseverance gnawing mice manage to perforate the stoutest planks. Captive prairie dogs have been known to tunnel their way through forty feet of compact loam.

An instinct, which one might be tempted to call a love of perseverance for its own sake, seems sometimes to influence the actions of young children. There are boys whose energies seem to be roused by the resistance of inanimate things. I have seen lads of eight or nine years hew away for hours at knotty logs which even a veteran woodcutter would have been pardoned for flinging aside. There are school boys, not otherwise distinguished for love of books, who will forego their recess sports to puzzle out an arithmetical problem of special intricacy.

Our desultory mode of education hardly tends to encourage that disposition which, nevertheless, is now and then apt to develop into a permanent character trait. There are young men who will act out a self-determined program of study or business with persistent disregard of temporary hardships, and pursue even minor details of their plan with a resolution only strengthened by difficulties. The moral ideals of antiquity seem to have been more favorable to the development of that type of character, which also manifests itself in the national policy of several ancient republics, and the inflexible consistency of their legal institutions.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

The advantages of perseverance are not too readily admitted by the numberless victims of that facile disposition that loves to ascribe its foibles to the "versatility of genius," or a high-minded "aversion to pedantic routine;" yet now, as in the days of yore, life reserves its best rewards for the most persistent competitors. Singleness of purpose, like a sharp wedge, forces its way through obstacles that resist many sided endeavors. The versatile poets and philosophers of Athens have wreathed her memory with unrivaled laurels, yet in the affairs of practical life her merchants were out-traded, her politicians outwitted, and her generals beaten by men whose nations had steadfastly followed a narrower but consistent policy. "Aut non tentaris aut perfice," "either try not, or persevere," was a Roman proverb that made Rome the mistress of three continents. In the Middle Ages the dynasty of the Abbassides, as in modern times the house of the Hohenzollern, attained supremacy by persistent adherence to an established system of political tactics. Even questionable enterprises have thus been crowned with triumph, as the ambitions of the Roman pontiffs, and the projects of Ignatius Loyola. The chronicles of war, of industry, and of commerce abound with analogous lessons. Patient perseverance succeeds where fitful vehemence fails. In countless battles the steadiness of British and North German troops has prevailed against the enthusiasm of their bravest opponents. The quiet perseverance of British colonists has prevailed against the bustling activity of their Gallic rivals, on the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, as well as on the Ganges and Indus. Steady-going business firms, consistently-edited journals, hold their own, and ultimately absorb their vacillating competitors. Dr. Winship, the Boston Hercules, held that the chances of an athlete "depend on doggedness of purpose far more than on hereditary physique." Even the apparent caprices of Fortune are biased by the habit of perseverance. "In the Stanislaus mining-camp," says Frederic Gerstaecker, "we had a number of experts who seemed to find gold by a sort of sixth sense, and came across 'indications' wherever they stirred the gravel of the rocky ravines. We called them 'prospectors,' and the brilliancy of their prospects was, indeed, demonstrated by daily proofs. But at the first frown of Fortune they would get discouraged, and remove their exploring outfit to another ravine. Most of the actual work was done by the 'squatters,' as we called the steady diggers, who would take up an abandoned claim and stick to it for weeks. Bragging was not their forte, but at the end of the season the squatter could squat down on a sackful of nuggets, while the prospector had nothing but prospects."

C.—PERVERSION.

The ambition of the ancients was encouraged by the conviction that life is worth living, and that all its social and intellectual summits can be reached by the persistent pursuit of a well-chosen road. But the basis of that confidence was undermined by a doctrine which denied the value of earthly existence, and made the renunciation of worldly blessings the chief purpose of moral education. The pilgrim of life who had been taught to spurn earth as a vale of tears, and turn his hopes to the promises of another world, was not apt to trouble himself about a consistent plan of secular pursuits, which, moreover, he had been distinctly instructed to trust to the chances of the current day: "Take no thought for the morrow;" "Take no thought for your life, nor yet for your body . . . for after all these things do the gentiles seek."

Indecision, inconsistency, fickleness of purpose, vitiated the politics of the Christian nations throughout the long chaos of the Middle Ages, and in their features of individual character there is a strange want of that moral unity and harmony which the consciousness of an attainable purpose gave to the national exemplars of an earlier age.

The Rationalistic reaction of the last two centuries has greatly modified the moral ideals of the Caucasian nations; the legitimacy of secular pursuits is more generally recognized, but still only in a furtive, hesitating manner, and the glaring contrast of our daily practice with the theories of a still prevalent system of ethics cannot fail to involve contradictions incompatible with true consistency of principles and action.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

For thirteen hundred years the importance of perseverance in the pursuit of earthly aims was depreciated by the ethics of Antinaturalism, and the word FAILURE is written in glaring letters over the record of the physical, mental, and moral enterprises of all that period. The nations of northern Europe, whom the prestige of Rome surrendered to the power of popish priests, were giants in stature and strength, and the love of physical health was too deeply rooted in the hereditary constitution of those athletes to be at once eradicated by the machinations of spiritual poison-mongers. Yet the poison did not fail to assert its virulence. Athletic sports were still a favorite pastime of all freemen; but the gospel of the Nature-hating Galilean insisted on the antagonism of physical and moral welfare; penances and the worship of cadaverous saints perverted the manlier ideals of the masses, the encouragement of ascetic habits and the enforced inactivity of convent life undermined the stamina of the noblest nations, and in the course of a few orthodox generations the descendants of the herculean hunter-tribes of northern Eurcpe became a prey to a multitude of malignant diseases.

The love of knowledge still fed on the literary treasures of antiquity; the flame of philosophy was now and then rekindled at the still glowing embers of pagan civilization; but the doctrine of other-worldliness denounced the pursuit of worldly love, and science degenerated into a medley of nursery-legends and monkish fever-dreams. Men walked through life as Sindbad walked through the perils of the spirit-vale, in constant dread of spectral manifestations, in constant anticipation of ghostly interference with their earthly concerns, the pursuit of which all but the wisest undertook only in a desultory, tentative way, haunted by the idea that success in worldly enterprises could be bought only at the expense of the immortal soul.

And how many thousand wanderers of our latter-day world have thus been diverted from the path of manful perseverance, and almost directly encouraged in the habit of palliating inconstancy of purpose with that "dissatisfaction and weariness of worldly vanities," which the ethics of their spiritual educators commend as a symptom of regeneration! The voices of re-awakened Nature protest, but only with intermittent success, and the penalty of vacillation is that discord of modern life that will not cease till our system of ethics has been thoroughly purged from the poison of Antinaturalism.

E.—REFORM.

That work of redemption should include an emphatic repudiation of the natural depravity dogma. Our children should be taught that steadfast loyalty to the counsels of their natural reason is sufficient to insure the promotion of their welfare in the only world thus far revealed to our knowledge. The traditional concomitance of perseverance and mediocrity should be refuted by the explanation of its cause. For a long series of centuries the predominance of insane dogmas had actually made science a mere mockery, and application to the prescribed curriculum of the monastic colleges a clear waste of time—clear to all but the dullest minds. The neglect of such studies, of the disgusting sophistry of the patriotic and scholastic era, was, indeed, a proof of common sense, since only dunces and hypocrites could muster the patience required to wade through the dismal swamp of cant, pedantry, and superstition which for thirteen centuries formed the mental pabulum of the priest-ridden academics. During that era of pseudo-science and pseudo-morality, of fulsome rant centered on a monstrous delusion, the eccentricity of genius was more than pardonable, being, in fact, the only alternativ of mental prostitution. The ideas of waywardness and mental superiority became thus associated in a way which in its results has wrought almost as much mischief as in its cause. The delusions of that idea have wrecked as many promising talents as indolence and intemperence.

The pupils of Secularism should be instructed to observe the benefits of perseverance in the pursuit of minor projects, and encouraged to apply that experience to the higher problems of life. Perseverance should be recognized as the indispensable ally of loftiest genius as well as of the lowliest talent.

Failure in secular enterprises should cease to be regarded as a symptom of divine favor; and for those who insist on claiming the protection of supernatural agencies, Goethe's grand apostrophe to the Genius of Manhood* should be condensed in the motto that "Heroic perseverance invokes the aid of the gods."

* Weibisches Klagen, bängliches Zagen
Wendet kein Unglück, macht dich nicht frei:
Allen Gewalten zum Trotz sich eshalten,
Nimmer sich beugen, kräftig sich zeigen
Rufet die Arme der Götter herbei.

Our Country's Right to Make What It Pleases.

Mr. F. M. Holland, in discussing the tariff question, represents it as being the question, "What business our government has to say we shall not buy our blankets, flannels, etc., as cheaply as we can."

Answer.—It will be time enough to discuss that question when the government makes the attempt. It is a mere misapprehension to say that in enacting a protectiv tariff the government deprives anyone of the power to buy anything as cheaply as he can. Each subject of the government keeps on buying as cheaply as he can after as well as before a protectiv tariff is enacted. In fact, a protectiv tariff, according to John Stuart Mill, is itself an instance of buying as cheaply as we can, since it is the act of a collectiv nationality in obtaining at the smallest possible cost the industrial privilege for each and all of its subjects or citizens of conducting a certain kind of industry at a profit to themselvs, which they could not otherwise conduct except at a loss. This right of "buying as cheaply as we can" inheres in the collectiv industrial body known as the nation as fully as it inheres in a private person. Whatever the nation deems essential to its most healthy development or highest life it buys in the cheapest market, when it secures its advent or introduction by means of a protectiv tariff, whether it be an iron and steel manufacture, or grain and produce raising, or whatever other branch of industry.

Mr. Holland says: "Why should not the free American be able, like the Englishman, to purchase foreign-made goods, when they are cheaper and better than domestic products, without being taxed for it?"

Answer.—The Englishman has no such right. The highest duty imposed on any foreign product by any tariff in the world is the English duty on tobacco of from 3s. 6d. to 5s. per pound, or from 1,200 to 1,800 per cent, and about 400 per cent of this duty is imposed avowedly and outright for the protection of the British tobacco manufacturer, and for no other purpose except the coincident one of revenue.

Mr. Holland says: "The laborer is much better off under free trade in England than under," etc.

Answer.—Trade is not free in England. The application of the phrase "free" to English trade is a simple misnomer. Nearly the whole export trade of England is an enforced trade, forced on barbarian purchasers by English treaties obtained by fighting, by conquest, by fraud, and by false pretenses. Such is her trade with China, Japan, India, Turkey, Egypt, the African ports, Portugal, and Ireland.

Mr. Holland says: I ascribe to the tariff the difference between wages in America, England, Germany, etc.

Answer.—The tariff is one of several factors that influence wages, not the only one, as sunshine is one of several factors in influencing vegetable growth. But as sunshine implies conditions, such as soil, moisture, fertility, etc., so protection, which in principle covers every act by which organized society as a whole reinforces by its associated power the effort of the individual man, also implies conditions, viz., natural facilities for the production which is to be protected, of such a character that under protection all the artificial facilities, viz., capital, skill, etc., will supply themselvs. The concurrence of all these causes activity and fertility in production, and the division of the value produced between the two factors, capital and labor, givs rise to the rate of wages. In this way protection influences wages as sunshine influences vegetable growth; but as vegetable growth cannot be exclusivly attributed to sunshine, so activity and abundance in production cannot be exclusivly ascribed to protection. It is sufficient that I hold it under proper concurring conditions to be a cause. It is unnecessary to misrepresent me as holding it to be the cause.

Mr. Holland does me the honor to inform me of something that Mr. J. Schoenhof has said or written. If I am rightly informed, Mr. Shoenhof is or was an authority on the value of hoop or felt skirts. I trust he has met with no misfortunes which lessen the weight of his opinion in matters relating to that business.

Mr. Holland says his main reliance is "on the well-known fact of the prosperity of the Northern laborer during those years of low tariff before the war."

Answer.—Could Mr. Holland hav been born before the war? Could he hav lived in this country then? In the winter of 1853–4, and from then on to 1860. free soup-houses were opened at the cost of the importers in every ward in the city of New York, and the class of men and women who now as the Labor party are asking for the earth, and a secretary of state of their own selection, were standing in long files before the soup-houses, haggard, wan, and hungry, waiting in line for hours to get their free soup. I myself lectured in 1853–4 on "The Causes of the Present Hard Times" in several towns on the Hudson river three years before the Bankers' Crisis of 1857. The crisis to labor preceded by so long the crisis in the money market. Instead of begging for bread at the hands of free soup-houses, independent labor now demands a division of the land between those who hav paid for it and those who hav not, to be obtained by taxing the former to the extent of what they hav paid or could get for it, and a division of the fund so raised among the latter in proportion to their needs, their merits, or their importunity and impudence. If protection is justly answerable for any sin, it is that of having given labor the big head.

Mr. Holland next pleads that it is the free traders who want manufacturers to flourish here.

Answer.—This plea will be valid when Mr. Holland succeeds in proving that he knows better what the interests of the manufacturers are than they know it themselvs. Not till then.

Mr. Holland's remarks concerning our ship-building industry might become a boy ten years old. He says "our ship-building flourished during our colonial period, but has sunk into insignificance under our high tariff."

Answer.—Does not Mr. Holland know that ocean-going American vessels hav had no protection as carriers, but hav been subjected to the perfect application of the free competition principle without subsidies since 1816, while the British carrying trade has been subsidized out of the fund in the hands of the British board of admiralty to the amount of about $6,000,000 a year for the past forty years? Does he not know that it was only while vessels were built of wood and sailed with canvas that Americans could outbuild the English, but that in 1855, when steam and steel came to supersede wood and canvas, our commercial marine went into its typhoid condition of decline, right in the midst of the free trade period? Does he not know that David A. Wells, Lieutenant Kelly of the navy, and all other free-ship hacks admit this cardinal fact? Does he not know that the reason why Great Britain was better prepared to manufacture iron and steel steamers than we was because from 1790 to 1842 she had protected her iron and steel manufactures far more assiduously than we, and that from 1816 to 1830 her import duties on bar iron and most other forms of iron or steel were twice as heavy as our American duties on the like products? If he does not know these facts, he should learn them. If he does know them, he should know that it was Great Britain's protection to the iron and steel manufacture that gave her her precedence in iron and steel steamer building; that this precedence she confirmed by annual subsidies without intermission; that our commercial marine has been running under the principle of a "free carrying trade" for seventy years, without an atom of tariff protection and only during the '50's a bare sop or delusiv hope of subsidy protection to some of our steamers. It is we that hav been applying free trade principles to our ocean-going vessels for seventy years, and yet most of our scribblers who assume to instruct public opinion are so grossly ignorant or malignantly lying as to talk of our carrying trade being ruined by protection and of England's as being built up by free trade. Whittier's round-eyed oxen, chewing hay in their stalls, know more of American political economy than such vealy charlatans. The ultimate test of our institutions consists in the problem whether intelligent government can endure when men so unscrupulously deficient in their acquaintance with the facts assume to teach.

Mr. Holland indulges in the nonsense of measuring imports and exports as if they were a test of national or economic welfare. Does he not know that if New York city were set off under a separate government as a free city, her imports and exports would far exceed those of any country on earth? If New England were set apart from the United States, so that her trade with the balance of the country would figure as imports and exports, its "commerce" would far exceed that of old England.

Instead of tables of imports and exports being a measure of economic prosperity, they are only a measure of the degree in which the political boundaries of a producing population fail to correspond with the residential boundaries of the consumers of their products. England being insular and urban, her imports and exports are large. Cut off Paris into a distinct nationality from France, and the imports and exports of Paris would exceed that of all France and Great Britain combined. The test of the prosperity of a people is their ability to consume. In metals, textil fabrics, etc., the American consumption per capita is somewhat in excess of that of the English people.

I hav found these bases of error in one column of Mr. Holland's argument! And yet he wrote two columns!

It is amazing that the perverted ingenuity of misinformation could embody so much falsehood and so little truth into so few words.

Whether I shall refer to the remainder of his article will depend on whether I hav time to waste in such an unprotected industry as that of trying to check the influx of imported errors. Mr. Holland can at least be congratulated on the fact that his political economy comes in free—without duty and without inspection.

The Revisers Revised.

In the revised version of the Old Testament, recently published in England, and presumably intended for the benefit of all English-speaking Christian communities, the revisers hav (whether unwittingly or not I will not presume to say) perpetuated a blunder, made by all their predecessors, which grossly obscures, instead of elucidating, the meaning of the original text, converting into a meaningless fable the plain statement of holy writ, and giving rise to a theory so utterly repugnant to common sense that it becomes a wonder in this enlightened age that it has not been exploded long ago. But poets and divines, from Milton downward, instead of explaining the real meaning, hav only amplified the fable, pandering to the ignorance and superstition, instead of appealing to the intelligence, of the public. Indeed, I hav never met with any writer (a professed skeptic of course ridicules the whole affair) who attempts to offer any rational explanation consistent with a belief in the divine authenticity of the book. Without claiming any merit of being the original discoverer of a truth which must hav been evident to many learned translators and commentators—only they dared not giv utterance to it for fear of upsetting the creed of Christendom—I venture to propose an amendment to the ordinary reading which will commend itself to all rational persons who really and honestly think anything about the matter.

By whom the book of Genesis was originally written, it is not my business to inquire. The question that concerns us, whether as believers or unbelievers, is this, What was the real meaning of the writer? It is supposed to be one of the most ancient books, if not the most ancient book, in existence, and was certainly written in the infancy of letters, when words were expressed by symbols, and nouns of quality by nouns of form and substance. Dr. Adam Clarke, whose acuteness as a scholar was neutralized by his obtuseness as a theologian, tells us that the Hebrew noun Nachash, which the Septuagint renders "Ophis," and the English translators, following the Greek, hav converted into "serpent," means literally natural perception, or common sense! With such a clue, the learned doctor ought certainly to hav hit upon the true reading of the passage; but no such thing. He sagely concludes that, as the serpent was never known to be gifted with the faculty of speech or to possess more than ordinary intelligence, the strange visitor to our mother Eve must hav been some kind of baboon, the most cunning and mischievous of his species. Other commentators, following Milton, tell us that it was the devil in the form of a serpent, and hav thus played the devil with common sense. My proposal is to leave snake, baboon, and devil out of the question altogether, and deal simply with the noun of quality, which is peculiar in a greater or less degree to all living and sentient beings. We shall then read that the common sense (of the woman) was more subtil (or refined) than that of the beasts of the field, and it said to the woman, etc. In other words, the woman's common sense told her that it was not decent for a respectable married woman to go about the world without any clothes to her back, and this idea she straightway imparts to her husband. It is just the same even to the present day—the woman is always the most sensitiv on this point, and the first to find out the deficiencies in her own and her husband's wardrobe. But now, unless her husband is one of the stingy sort, and refuses to supply her with the necessary dollars, this solicitude of the wife regarding dress is not considered an offense against the laws of either God or man, but rather a meritorious fulfilment of the woman's special duty.

Then why (it will be asked) did the first fulfilment of that special duty entail such a frightful curse on Eve and all her posterity as yet unborn? And here, I think, translators and commentators are again at fault; for, read by the new light, I do not find in the book of Genesis any record of that original curse of which professional theologians hav made so much capital. If mankind had remained in a state of nature, or retained what is called their primitiv innocence, they would still hav gone about in a state of nudity, dwelt in caves, and lived upon raw fruit and roots, or failing these, hav literally eaten dirt like the lowest class of savages. But since man, instigated thereto by the woman, elected to wear clothes, to dwell in houses made with hands, and to cultivate and lay up fruits and cereals for consumption all the year round, he entailed upon himself the necessity of working for these luxuries and earning them by the sweat of his brow. If this be the worst effect of the "curse," it is a fortunate thing for most of us that we are more or less damned! We need not envy the lilies who toil and spin not, for, however gloriously arrayed, their life is a very short one. Still less need we envy the primitiv savages, troglodytes and dirt-eaters as they are, for although longer lived than the lily, they drag out but a miserable existence during three-fourths of the year. Is not the "knowledge of good and evil" an inestimable benefit to those who are enabled thereby to seek the one and avoid the other? But no good in this world is unmixed with the other quality. The refinements of a civilized life render us peculiarly sensitiv to the discomforts of an uncivilized one, to the extremes of heat and cold, of hunger and repletion. Many of our troubles arise from the bare apprehension of ills that perhaps never come to pass, or, if they do, are found in actual contact not half so formidable as they appeared at a distance. If this apprehension induces us to work, so much the better, for labor is seldom unrewarded either in the performance thereof or in the benefits resulting therefrom. The happiest people in the world, if they knew their own good, "O fortunatos nimium, sua si bona norint," are those who liv in the country, work for their bread, wait upon themselvs, and know neither the extremes of poverty or riches. Common Sense, whom theologians hav converted into a devil, is their best and safest guide, and in the absence of those learned functionaries will supply the place of lawyer, doctor, and parson. It is true that Common Sense is somewhat of a Materialist, fulfilling the prediction, "On thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat;" but earth-hunger is not one of the most objectionable traits of humanity, and the successful man of business who accumulates property in houses and lands is generally thought well of by his fellow-men, and especially by his banker.

In a primitiv state of society, the earth-hunger of the serpent, or common sense, was sometimes productiv of cruelty and injustice, of which the story of Cain and Abel furnishes a striking example. It seems as if the law of primogeniture commenced in the time of Adam, for he named his first-born Cain, which signifies possession, and Cain became a tiller of the ground. He was the heir at law, and claimed the soil as his own. It is noteworthy that in all parts of the world those who utilize the land by tillage always manage to dispossess the aboriginal inhabitants if the latter use it only for a hunting-ground, and lead a nomadic mode of life as the original shepherd, having no settled place of residence. These of course resent the intrusion of the more industrious and thrifty race, but it leads in the end to their own discomfiture and annihilation. It was so in Palestine when the Jews dispossessed the Canaanites. It was so in America, when the red man disappeared before the irruption of palefaces. It is so to the present day in South Africa and New Zealand. Cain the agriculturist always manages to get rid of his weaker younger brother, Abel the nomad, and when questioned as to the morality of the act pertinently inquires, "Am I my brother's keeper?" The "seed of the serpent," or those who follow the teaching of common sense, always tread upon the heels of the "seed of the woman," or mere children of nature. This may not be according to the law of God, but it appears to be the law of nature. Jesus Christ, both by precept and by example, advocated a return to the simplicity of a nomadic life, taking no thought for the morrow, having no settled place of residence, possessing no superfluities, giving all to the poor, and living from hand to mouth. The modern professor of Christianity, finding it inconvenient, if not altogether impracticable, to obey the commands of his master, brings forward the doctrin of original sin and the total depravity of human nature to account for his deficiencies. In order to claim exemption from the punishment due to disobedience, and lay claim to the rewards of obedience, he propounds the extraordinary theory that the punishment was suffered, and the obedience performed, vicariously, nearly two thousand years ago. You hav only to believe this absurdity to enable you to participate in all the benefits thereof, however unsatisfactory your manner of life may hav been. Now, Jesus certainly taught his disciples to be "wise as serpents" as well as harmless as doves—that is to say, they were to exercise the common sense with which nature had endowed them, so far as it did not interfere with the rights and privileges of their neighbors. How far the orthodox doctrin is consistent with common sense, I will not venture to inquire, but will leave the question to the unbiased judgment of the reader. OUTIS.

The American Secular Union.

COURTLANDT PALMER, President.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary, - - 750 West Lake St., Chicago.
CHARLES ECKHARD, Treas., - - - 28 Lafayette Pl., New York.

Call for the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held at Chicago, October 15th and 16th.

The Congress will be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs—the President and Secretary and three delegates. All charter members and life members, all Vice Presidents, all Chairmen of state Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats, but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada who can will be present.

Per order Board of Directors:

COURTLANDT PALMER, Pres.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Sec.
E. A. STEVENS, Ch. Fin. Com.

News and Notes.

My closing lecture at Baker City was given on Tuesday evening, September 6th. The hall was full, nearly five hundred being present. After the lecture there was a festival of the members of the Secular Union, and it was a happy, sociable occasion, with much promis of future life for our work here. Our Baker friends are enthusiastic, and purpose to carry forward the campaign on a broad and humanitarian basis, so that intellectual and moral forces will be brought into play. With such genial and devoted supporters as John R. Coleman, Wesley F. Miller, John Kimberly, A. Dolph, Judge Schofield, Mr. and Mrs. Dave Kelley, Mrs. Mary C. Edgington, and others mentioned in previous letters, our cause will stand to the front in this rapidly growing country. I bid farewell to Oregon and its noble host of Liberals with joy and pride in the splendid enthusiasm they hav shown. Every toil has been amply repaid by the cordial alliance of its progressiv minds.

My veteran friend Geo. L. Hayes gave me a bright memento of Oregon's wealth, in the shape of a beautiful specimen of gold quartz from the "Thomas Paine" mine, which has yielded eight hundred and twenty-three dollars to the ton. My friends who own the mine gave it the best name they could in honor of him who flung such golden promis into our national life. I shall keep this specimen always, with its precious freightage, as a memorial of happy labors and brave-hearted comrades on the Pacific coast.

Eastward I go amid the mighty lava beds. Here and there little farms glisten on the banks of the winding stream, where settlers take it easy, having just enough to liv on, and plenty of tobacco; and under their rude shanties they pass the time as if they were kings and owned the whole world. What more does any man want than to let all care thus end in smoke? The settler raises his own potatoes, sells a horse or two every year to pay for groceries, has cows enough for butter and milk, and when the circus comes along bundles his whole family into a wagon, and goes seventy-five miles to witness the "greatest show on earth," and is preëminently happy when he returns to his cottage, where the lawyer, the doctor, and the ministers never intrude. They need neither mortgages, medicin, nor prayers in this happy climate, where the brightest of skies bend over the desolate hills, and the little patches of tillable land gleam like jewels in the rocky waste.

I come to Weiser, Idaho, where the endless sagebrush grows, and the sandy bluffs stretch away to the blue mountains. Here I find good friends, especially Mrs. M. Peferle and her bright family of four little children, all that are at home, the doctor being away among the hills on professional business. Mrs. Peferle has a woman's spirit for reform, and knows no such word as fail. It was through her efforts that the campaign was opened at Weiser, and quite successfully. The hall was full, and the lecture, the first of the kind ever given here, was well received. I was sorry not to be able to stay more than one night, for many Liberals were present from the surrounding country. But I had to hurry on with the hope of returning to this frontier land. Generous friends are here whom I hope to greet again amid the bright battle fields of thought—Judge Hart, Geo. Ebest, Wm. P. Glenn, editor of the Weiser Leader, who gave a fearless report of the lecture; Frank Harris, one of the leading attorneys of the place, who introduced me at the meeting; Morgan Kilborn, from Weiser Valley, twenty miles away; Thos. and John Yardley, the King brothers, Captain Chase, etc. This little burg will always be on the advance line—sage-brush, lava beds, sand heaps, and orthodox ministers to the contrary notwithstanding. The flame of civilization makes way for liberty.

At Caldwell, fifty miles east of Weiser, I greet one of our mighty warriors of this country, James Wardwell. After a night's rest I am ready for a twenty-mile ride over the plains to Emmett's, with Wardwell and Price Bane—whose good team lingers not on the dusty road. Dusty it is—and as wild and desolate a region as I ever meandered through—and if it had not been for my cheery companions, I might hav thought I should never look upon a human habitation again, so vast were the billows of sand that rolled away to the distant horizon. However, I hav got used to everything in this Western land—and no spot so barren but "hope rears its glittering crest." After awhile the bright Payette valley burst upon the view with its ranks of green trees along the river for miles away. How the harvest lands appear; the golden fields of grain and fresh-mown hay in the splendid noonday. Fording the streams and winding in and out the straggling groves we reach the great ranch of Mrs. James A. Bennett, white and comfortable amid the orchard and flower garden. Mrs. Bennett is a widow of James A. Bennett, who died about two years since, one of the stanch Freethinkers of the West, who, from youth up, has always been in the ranks of reform. He was born an Infidel, and couldn't help being so, although his parents were the strictest Baptists. Our cause suffered greatly in the death of this ardent Liberal.

They hav the brightest climate here, skies luminous and golden over the melancholy wastes. Emmett's is on the Payette river and beneath the shadow of Squaw Creek butte. It has only a few houses besides the saw mills, and prominent among these is Paine Liberal Hall, whose lights were greeting us as we entered the village. I wondered where my audience was to come from, but I found the large hall nearly filled. The audience increased every night. I gave five lectures. Dr. York was here about four years ago and made one of his rattling campaigns. Since then, I am sorry to say, two churches hav been built, which shows how much still remains of the old superstition. These churches don't amount to much, and hav poor ministers and poor congregations. They made a united effort on Sunday evening to offset our work, and had a union meeting at which three were present besides the clergyman. We had nearly two hundred. On Monday evening our ranks were crowded, and after the lecture there was a brilliant festival occasion, supper, dance, etc. Nowhere hav I found a better company than here. Some came twenty, thirty, and forty miles to the gathering. It only needs a leader to make this part of Idaho almost compact for Liberalism. Infidelity seems to flourish where people hav to fight nature with all their might to get a living. Every inch of land capable of cultivation is used, and there is talk of constructing an irrigating ditch by which about seventy thousand acres of the valley lands can be utilized.

My friend Wardwell has fought the good fight. He has been burnt out once, but his mills are as busy as ever, and he still expresses his thought in spite of orthodox fury. He is a Yankee all the way from Maine, and its dauntless spirit goes with him amid these Western wilds. He has suffered every variety of fortune with the Indians and the Christians, and so far he has come to the top, and has never bent the knee to superstition or tyranny. Whatever the blows of fortune, he loses no whit of courage or generosity. I enjoyed the hospitality of his genial and democratic home.

A. G. Church is known to TRUTH SEEKER readers for his no uncertain voice, and I guess many a reformer can bear witness to his open heart and hand. Alone he has been on the outposts of freedom, but no danger has ever made him flinch. It was a pleasure to meet this rough-and-ready soldier of Infidel advance.

Around the table of Mr. and Mrs. L. D. Gill I met genial comrades also. These are pioneers of 1863, and hav been through all the Indian wars and border tumults. In a serene old age they enjoy life and the glory of Freethought.

Among other friends whose ready greeting will not soon be forgotten are H. H. Clark, J. W. Hughes, M. Gill, J. A. Lippencott, Mr. and Mrs. Turley, Wm. F. Wardwell, Ed. Blanchard, John Mahon, Jas. Ewing, Ezra Bradford, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Smith, Nathaniel Martin, A. Kelley, Geo. Deitz, Nelson Fuller, etc. I cannot remember all the names. I hav not found a place of more delightful labor. It has been a pleasant journey to this remote fort, where the flag is flying so brightly, and the music is so gay, and heart and hand so cheerful.

I am now at Caldwell, Idaho, where I lecture this evening, and Wednesday, and Thursday. I shall be at Boise City Friday, Saturday, and Sunday; at Salt Lake Sept. 24th, 25th; at Canon City Sept. 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th; at Denver, Oct. 2d; at Osceola, Neb., 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and thence to Chicago for National Congress, Oct. 15th, 16th, where I hope to meet many friends. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

C. B. Reynolds's Western Tour.

WATERLOO, IND.—The Liberals, having paid largely toward its erection, succeeded in obtaining the use of a church for J. E. Remsburg to lecture in, and subsequently, although there was some demurrer, for S. P. Putnam, but since that time the church folks' faith has waned. God answered their prayers crossways, instead of as they had prayed in faith, believing that all would be disgusted by the Infidel lecturers and the well-to-do Liberals join the church. Some of their best-paying members became skeptical and stopped all contributions; so the fiat went forth, "No more Liberal lecturers, if possible to prevent them." But friend E. R. Shoemaker, who had successfully wrestled with the mighty rocks, delved into the stupendous mountains and gulches of California, and forced out the golden ore, where others had failed and given up in despair, had the matter in charge. With him obstacles only strengthened determination. Since neither church nor hall was obtainable, he advertised the lectures to be delivered in front of his house. He has a magnificent lawn of over three-quarters of an acre, studded with beautiful shade trees, fronting his mansion, on his farm, situated about two miles from the village. A more delightsome place to hold outdoor meetings could scarce be found.

By making seats with planks, as I used to do in the tent, the sons of friend Shoemaker speedily made seats for one hundred and fifty persons, and at 10 A.M. there was a large attendance of deeply interested listeners. I spoke on "Life's Duties; or, What Liberalism Teaches," and was assured that much of prejudice was removed from the minds of some Christians present.

Mr. and Mrs. Shoemaker, with more than regal hospitality, invited all who stayed for the afternoon lecture to enter the house and partake of dinner. About eighty enjoyed the sumptuous repast provided.

In the afternoon, not alone were all the seats occupied, but the road in front of the lawn was filled with vehicles, whose occupants listened and wondered, as I stated the facts in regard to "Whence the Bible Came, and What It Really Teaches." Mr. Shoemaker engaged a full string band for the afternoon and evening lectures, which added greatly to the interest.

In the evening, despite the dark and damp, there was a fair attendance. I informed them "Why I Left the Pulpit," and gave reasons why all should cleanse themselvs from the slime of superstition and bigotry, pluck from their hearts sectarian hate, and by living lives of love and activ benevolence, make a heaven for themselvs here and now, and at last die without a fear, comforted by the assurance that, even according to Jesus and the New Testament (Matt. xxv), Infidels only were on the safe side.

Three lectures in the open air, in one day, was a severe tax on a sick man's strength, but I greatly enjoyed it, and the kind greeting and the good wishes of the brave, loyal, and true Liberals of Waterloo and vicinity, and long to respond to their kind desire to come again.

SWEET HOME, IND.—I responded to the invitation of that devoted young Liberal, Miss Della Lindley to deliver two lectures at Sweet Home, Ind., September 8th and 9th. Mr. W. H. Barker, station agent at Warren, on the L. S. and M. S. R. R., met me at South Bend, and escorted me to his Sweet Home, that I could see and appreciate; but there is no village, not even the usual church and a blacksmith shop—not so much as even two dwelling houses near together. It really appeared more like arriving at nowhere than any place I ever before visited. The railway station is called Warren; Sweet Home proper consisted, as far as I could discern, of one building, in which was a little grocery store and the post-office. the home of the Lindleys, all Liberals, stanch and true.

I found Mr. Barker a genuin Liberal in the very best acceptation of the term, and greatly enjoyed interchange of thought with him, and the hospitality of his pleasant home. He and his wife are modest yet enthusiastic workers for progress and humanity, and command the respect even of the fanatical Dunkards because of their exemplary life. They are rearing their children not in fear of the Lord, but in knowledge of hygiene and Liberalism.

On Thursday, September 9th, I repaired to the school-house, which is away off in the wilderness, over a quarter of a mile from the Warren station and Sweet Home post-office. I was surprised and pleased to find it quite a good-sized building, and filled with intelligent people. There were more than one hundred present. Quite a furor of enthusiasm was enkindled, and the next night, long before time for the lecture, the school-house was densely packed, and despite hard seats, and discomfort of the crowd standing, all honored me with strictest attention. After this, let none feel discouraged, or hesitate to make effort to advance the cause. I cannot conceive of more disadvantages to overcome, and yet the two lectures were, under the hard labor and united efforts of Miss Della Lindley and Mr. Barker, in every way a grand success.

In writing to Lafayette I got letters from Lafayette, Indiana, and Lafayette, Illinois, and got dreadfully tangled up; so I dropped both Lafayettes, and shall lecture on Sunday evening, September 11th, at South Bend; from thence to Monticello, Ill., 14th, 15th, 16th; Mattoon, 18th to 21st; Centralia 22d to 24th; Belleville, 25th to 27th; Havanah, 28th to 30th; Minier, October 1st to 3d; Westfield, 5th to 7th; Olney, 12th to 14th; Chicago, 15th to 16th.

Letters addressed to me care of the Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York, will always be promptly forwarded to me. C. B. Reynolds.

Religion in Illinois Schools.

In your paper of the 30th of July you publish an article about the University of Illinois. The student there referred to is my son. You will see by perusal of the papers he sent you that no state in the Union has by its Constitution so carefully guarded the rights of the people against the encroachment of religious bigots. There is no honest way of evading those safeguards. Yet in almost every common school the Bible is daily read, and the Lord's Prayer repeated as a part of the school exercises. And in Chicago, in the face of protests, the reform city administration, following the lead of the Carter Harrison-Mike McDonald Leib and Winston-boodle administration which has so long deeply disgraced that city, the municipal property, to wit, water, of the yearly value of many thousands of dollars, is given away to all the churches, and to Catholic and other sectarian schools and institutions in defiance of the express prohibition in our constitution, which every officer is sworn to support. But religious bigots hav no regard for honesty when it stands in the way of their aggressiv policy, nor hav their pliant tools any respect for official oaths.

It seems that at the late thirty-second annual delegate assembly of the German Central Union of the United States, Bishop Wigger, of New Jersey, in his festival sermon, condemned the practice of sending children to free public schools, and declared that it imperiled the soul, and was a violation of the sacred duty of seeking first the kingdom of heaven and its righteousness! And now comes the Advance, a Congregationalist paper, a suitable emblem of whose principles would be a crawfish, and in its issue of the 1st instant is contained a communication from the Rev. Dr. Jenkins, of Freeport, Ill., in which that gentleman says:

> The Presbyterian synod of Illinois desires especially to secure uniformity of action upon the part of Christian people throughout the state, that our schools may not become the nurseries of Atheism.

The Chicago Tribune, commenting on this, says:

> Precisely the same spirit crops out here as in Bishop Wigger's sermon. Secular education [in which nothing is said about religion or theology] is held to be substantially the same thing as Atheistic instruction. There is a perverse confounding of unreligious with irreligious education. The assumption that a child's education is confined to the schoolroom is narrow, and ought not to be true of any child of religious parents. It is forgotten, apparently, by the ultra advocates of doctrinal teaching in the public schools that the home is after all the great educational institution.

And I will add: Where Sunday-schools are relied upon to teach morals I hav never known any great success to be reached. I hav practiced law forty-two years, and hav in the course of professional business had to advise with many disreputable persons, and I declare that, while many of them hav been educated in Sunday schools, I hav never found one who received there any clear notions of right and wrong or of moral obligation. There is no moral code taught by most teachers of these schools.

The instruction contained in Webster's old American spelling-book was worth much, and the catechism contained in the appendix to Volney's "Ruins" deserves the highest praise, and might be profitably read in any school. But any and all of these are merely aids as compared with correct example and instruction by parents. Levi North.

Daily Bread.

"Giv us this day our super-substantial bread," says the Douay New Testament, translated from the Latin Vulgate; and the Catholic commentator explains the text to mean, "the bread of life, which we receive in the blessed sacrament." But in the revised Protestant version the Greek word for "daily" is explained to mean "bread for the coming day." We suspect that both versions are wrong, because in the Syriac, or Peshito, which givs us the very language of Palestine eighteen hundred years ago, the word is "needful," instead of "daily" or "for to-morrow." The Latin equivalent is indigentiæ, and the evident meaning of the text is "bread of poverty."

It is a question, however, of small importance, for God knows that bread is always kneaded.

Confiscation of Mormon Church Property.

Mentioning the commission of Attorney Peters for this act of governmental usurpation, The Truth Seeker says: "Behold government engaged in the business of confiscating church property!" Yet it recognizes this act as instigated by the jealousy of other churches, which is perhaps the principal though not the only influence; for the Mormon church being also a government and an economic administration, the United States government is jealous on its own account, and the speculators, whom this church has held at bay by its system of coöperativ commerce, and the lawyers whom its free administration of justice, or what passes for such, keeps out in the cold.

The Mormon superstitions, neither more nor less absurd and pernicious than those of Christendom, might hav passed polygamy pulling wives up to heaven by the coat-tails of the saints, among the rest, but this church is hated because of its economic virtues, because it is the only one, except the Shaker, that has harnessed superstition to the car of justice in commercial relations and put a curb on the greed of the rich. What other church, when famin has been imminent, ever said to its rich members, Share with the poor and forgiv them their debts, and they did so? Confiscation of this church property does not reveal any tendency in that direction; it is not a liberal reaction, in the sense that confiscation of Catholic church property has been in France or Spain, but indicates simply the hostility of one set of fanatics toward another. The plunder is to go to education, i. e., to making salaried positions for gentile teachers who are not wanted. Next, probably, education will be made compulsory, orthodox, and governmentalist, so that the child will be a battle-field between its parents and its teachers.

Next, it must be made a penal offense for the parents to teach their children contrary to the Christian government's teachings, and it would not be surprising if the child was bulldozed into giving evidence to convict its parents; for when orthodoxy takes such a matter in hand, it goes the whole hog. Is it not God's police, and responsible to him for the souls of the people?

No truly loyal household should be without the portraits of Loyola, Torquemada, Ferdinand, Isabella, and Philip of Spain. The tendency of this Mormon church confiscation is the same as that of the extradition treaty with Russia; both attest the oneness of majorityism with the other forms of despotism.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. Remsburg has filled his engagements in Iowa, delivering thirty-two lectures in four weeks. He spoke in the following towns: Bedford, Casey, Campbell, Missouri Valley, Oto, Holstein, Castana, Sheldon, Spirit Lake, Armstrong, Postville, Elkader, Ossian, Fredericksburg, New Hampton, Bassett, Oxford, Ottumwa, and Salem. His appointments for the next three weeks are as follows:

|---|---|
| Morrill, Kan. | Sat. Sun. Sept. 24, 25 |
| Sabetha, " | Sun. 25 |
| Horton, " | Mon. Tues. 26, 27 |
| Everest, " | Wed. 28 |
| Oxford, Neb. | Sun. Mon. Oct. 2, 3 |
| Loup City, Neb. | Tues. Wed. Thur. 4, 5, 6 |
| Broken Bow, Neb. | Fri. 7 |
| Aurora, Neb. | Sat. Sun. 8, 9 |
| Seward, Neb. | Mon. Tues. 10, 11 |
| Valparaiso, Neb. | Wed. Thur. Fri. 12, 13, 14 |

During the remainder of the fall, Mr. Remsburg will work in Kansas and Missouri.

The annual conventi n of the Secularists and Freethinkers of Canada will be held in Toronto on Saturday and Sunday, October 29th and 30th, in Science Hall, under the auspices of the Canadian Secular Union. The prospects for Secularism were never more encouraging. This will be the most important convention ever held in Canada. The coöperation of every Secularist and Freethinker is needed to promote our common cause. All who sympathize with our principles are urgently invited to attend, whether they belong to our organization or not. Further particulars will be given in due time. By order of the Central Executiv. Wm. Algie, Alton, Ont., president; J. A. Risser, Toronto, secretary.

W. S. Bell and Elder T. J. Williamson are to hold a joint discussion at Salem, Neb., beginning November 1st, and continuing four nights, on the following questions: "1. Resolved. That Christ is a historic character, the logos of God, and hence the savior of the word." Elder T. J. Williamson affirms. "2. Resolved. That the Bible is of human origin, and hence not a revelation from God." W. S. Bell affirms.

Among Our Friends.

C. M. Overton and M. D. Leahy hav resuscitated the Liberal, Mo., paper under the title of American Idea. Mr. Overton's greatest effort thus far has been to endeavor to show that Liberal is a Christian town, and its people Christians.

The American Nonconformist is prodding the Rev. John D. Knox, of Topeka, Kan., for renting a house he owns for immoral uses. The inmates hav been arrested, and the Vincents want to put the Rev. Mr. Knox into the same cell. We fear, however, that this would only lead to more immorality.

Stephen Young is dead—died at Topolobampo, August 17th. Mr. Young was an old man, over seventy, an Infidel, a Spiritualist, a reformer in everything. Simple, kind, earnest, his death will grieve hundreds of Freethinkers and Spiritualists throughout the States. He went to Topolobampo from Memphis, Mo. He should hav stayed away, but sincerely believing in coöperativ communities, he was ready to sacrifice his life to establish one. Peace to his ashes.

Parson Briggs, editor of the Texas Christian Advocate, Methodist, lectured a while ago on "Ingersoll." He said that the proper way to put down Infidelity was by "the dungeon and the halter." The Galveston-Dallas News reported him, and when he saw his cruel words in type he repudiated them. The News says, and offers to prove, that in this repudiation Parson Briggs is the opposit of a truth-telling person. The war between the News and the Advocate is fierce, with the News ahead to date.

The American Flag is a large and handsome journal printed at 111 Nassau street, New York. Its principal reason for existence is to demand America for Americans, with no quarter to the pope and his cohorts. The American Flag contains valuable articles, in proof of which we need only to note that the leading article in its issue of September 10th was written by the Editor of The Truth Seeker and appeared in these columns under date of August 27th. That this small fact is not stated in the American Flag is of no particular consequence.

Mrs. Slenker, it appears, has some detestable enemy outside of the detestable Vice Society. We are in receipt of a communication charging her with giving advice of the vilest sort, and a picture of the beastliest character. The communication is signed Jane Richards, and was mailed from Philadelphia. We shrewdly suspect who sent it, and credit the picture to the same source. As the person may hav written to others as to us, we will say that we hav run down his slander and find him to be a wilful liar. No attention need be paid to this anonymous blackguard.

The Hebrew religion is about half as fraudulent as the Christian religion, for the reason that there is only about half as much of it. Hebrew journals, however, usually contain about twice as much sense as do the Christian papers. One of the best of the Jewish newspapers is the Hebrew Standard, of this city, which, though given to splitting hairs in Jewish theology, has found so much favor with the descendants of Abram that it begins its sixth volume in an enlarged form. A great many of the Hebrews of this city are Freethinkers; very few ever become Christians.

One of the erratic figures of Infidelity is Will Hubbard Kernan, now editor of the Home Advocate, of Mapleton, Iowa. He has been employed on a dozen or more papers, and always filled them with heresy till he lost his situation. He has, besides, started a half dozen journals of his own. He is tall, slim, nervous, with a Bohemian disposition, a poet's fire, and a Southerner's independence. "Incendiary," "infernal," and "liar" are the weakest words in his vocabulary, and he strings them down the column in startling style. He is not a very consistent or conservativ member of society, but he shocks the piety out of folks wonderfully quick.

A. D. Downes, an Australian Freethought lecturer, made a visit last May to Tasmania in the interests of his cause. The Christians did not receive him kindly, but through one of their number posted this notice on a tree:

> Warnas.—A. Dalziel Downes as announced that he will give an entertainment at Mr. Cocker's on Friday, May 6th.
> Now as one who as respect fo the Souls of His Fellowes man I would warn them against this fellow as He is a teacher of Athaisum and is yousing all his power in that dyrection. Now Dear Friends let me ask you to do what you can to red our Happy little Disttrect of such a D ——d and stand like the Brav with your Face to the Fow. Yours in love, Stephen Smith.

Mr. Downes left Tasmania when he got ready, and, in spite of the loving opposition of Christians, made many converts to Rationalism.

The Truth Seeker of August 27th announced that Charles Watts would lecture in Halifax, Nova Scotia, September 4th and 5th, which engagement was rather more than fulfilled. Mr. Watts was introduced by Rev. G. W. Kent, pastor of the Church of the Redeemer. When he had finisbed his lecture in the afternoon, Rev. John Moore took the platform and dissected Mr. Watts. When the latter gentleman had got the pieces of himself together, Rev. Pryor Almon strewed them around again. The Freethinkers in the audience were happy, for it was precisely what they wanted. Mr. Watts asked both ministers to attend in the evening and continue the debate, which they did. From the reports in the Halifax Chronicle we judge the result was eminently satisfactory to our side, for the Freethinkers were pleased, the Christians were angry, and many persons who are neither orthodox nor heterodox went home to think.

The Truth Seeker Company's Catalog of Freethought, Reform, and Scientific Books will be mailed free to any address upon application.

They Will Hang.

Unless the counsel for the Chicago Anarchists can transfer their case to the United States Supreme Court, the seven condemned men—August Spies, A. R. Parsons, Samuel Fielden, Michael Schwab, George Engel, Adolph Fischer, and Louis Lingg—will be hanged on November 11th, between the hours of 10 A.M. and 4 P.M., and Oscar Neebe will hav no hope of spending less than his sentenced term in state prison—fifteen years, shortened by commutation for good behavior.

The decision of the Illinois Supreme Court was given on the 14th inst. at Ottawa, by Judge Magruder of the Chicago district, the other judges present and concurring. Judge Magruder read the court's opinion, which, so far as the press has reported it, is as follows. We copy from the Sun:

After reviewing at length the facts in connection with the Haymarket riot, the fatal bomb-throwing, and the findings of the lower court, the opinion says:

"It is undisputed that the bomb was thrown, and that it caused the death of Degan. It is conceded that none of the convicted men threw the bomb with his own hands. Plaintiffs in error are charged with being accessories to the fact. Some of the counts charge that the eight defendants above named, being present, aided, abetted, and assisted in the throwing of the bomb; others, that not being present aiding, abetting, or assisting, they advised, encouraged, aided, and abetted such throwing. The Illinois statute on this subject is as follows, chap. 38, div. 2, secs. 2 and 3:

"Sec 2 An accessory is he who stands by and aids, abets, or assists, or who, not being present aiding, abetting, or assisting, hath advised, encouraged, aided, or abetted the perpetration of the crime. He who thus aids, abets, assists, advises, or encourages shall be considered as principal and punished accordingly.

"Sec 3. Every such accessory, when a crime is committed within or without this state, by aid or procurement in this state, may be indicted and convicted at the same time as the principal, or before or after his conviction, and whether the principal is convicted or amenable to justice and is punished as principal.

"This statute abolishes the distinction between accessories before the fact and principals by it; all accessories before the fact are made principals. As the acts of the principal are thus made the acts of the accessory, the latter may be charged as having done the acts himself, and may be indicted and punished accordingly (Baxter vs. People, 3 Gilm., 368; Dempsey vs. People, 47 Ill., 326). If, therefore, the defendants advised, encouraged, or abetted the killing of Degan, they are as guilty as though they took his life with their own hands. If any of them stood by, aided, abetted, or assisted in the throwing of the bomb, those who did so are as guilty as though they threw it themselvs. It is charged that defendants formed a common purpose, and were united in a common design, to aid and encourage the murder of the policemen among whom the bomb was thrown. If they combined to accomplish such murder by concerted action, the ordinary law of conspiracy is applicable, and the acts and declarations of one of them done in furtherance of the common design are in contemplation of law the acts and declarations of all. This prosecution, however, is not for conspiracy as a substantiv crime. Proof of conspiracy is only proper so far as it may tend to show a common design to encourage the murder charged against the prisoners. It may be introduced for the purpose of establishing the position of the members of the combination as accessories to the crime of murder. The questions which thus present themselvs are these:

"Did the defendants hav a common purpose or design to advise, encourage, aid, or abet the murder of the police? Did they combine together, and with others, with a view to carrying that purpose or design into effect?

"Did they or either or any of them do such acts or make such declarations in furtherance of the common purpose or design as did actually hav the effect of encouraging, aiding, or abetting the crime in question?

"The solution of the questions involve an examination of the evidence. The first inquiry which naturally suggests itself is, Who made the bomb which killed Degan?"

Here the opinion goes into details upon various kinds of bombs, showing their construction, the fact that the bombs were made by Lingg, the connection and implication of Seliger, Thielen, Hermann, and other parties in their construction, and finally shows the positiv guilt of Lingg by comparison of make and material of the bombs found in his possession and the pieces taken from the bodies of Degan and other murdered policemen, the chemical analysis being the same. The opinion than says:

"The record shows the existence of an organization known as the International Workingmen's Association or the International Arbeiter Association, generally called the Internationals, and sometimes designated for brevity as the I. A. A. The platform or declaration of principles adopted by this organization was published by a certain bureau of information and by certain newspapers called the Alarm and the Arbeiter Zeitung, which are more particularly referred to hereafter. It appeared in all the issues of the latter paper during the months of February, March, and April, 1885. It is too long for insertion here. It urges that the present system under which property is owned by individuals should be destroyed, and that all capital which has been produced by labor should be transformed into common property. It says:

"It is only when capital is made common and indivisible that all can be made to partake fully and freely of the fruits of the common possibility of acquiring individual (private) capital. Can every one be compelled to work who claims the right to liv?

"It charges that the government, the law, the schools, the churches, the press, are in the pay and under the sway of the property-owning and capitalistic classes, and that the laboring classes must achieve their deliverance through their own strength. This international platform thus addresses the workingmen:

"As in former times no privileged class ever relinquished its tyranny, no more can we take it for granted that the capitalists of the present day will forego their privileges and their authority without compulsion. It is therefore self-evident that the right of proletarianism (the laboring classes) against the bourgeoisie (the middle classes) must hav a violent revolutionary character, and mere wage conflicts can never lead to the goal. We could show by numerous illustrations that all attempts which hav been made in the past to do away with the existing monstrous social system through peaceable means—for example, through the ballot-box—hav been entirely useless, and will be so in the future. We know, therefore, that the ruling class will not voluntarily relinquish their prerogativ, and will make no concessions to us. Under all these circumstances there is only one remedy left—force. Therefore it is your right, it is your duty, says Jefferson, to arm yourself. Agitation with a view to organization, organization for the purpose of rebellion—herein is indicated in a few words the way which workingmen must take if they would rid themselvs of their chains.

"It is here admitted that the property of each individual in the community could not be taken away from him and put into a common fund, to be divided among all the members of the community, without resort to a revolution and force. The way to the result sought to be reached by the international platform here referred to leads through the crimes of robbery, theft, and murder to the destruction of the existing system of social order and of all the laws and institutions upon which the system is based.

"The association whose principles are thus outlined in its platform was divided into groups, of which there were eighty in the United States in March, 1885, located principally in the centers of industry. For some time prior to May 1, 1886, there was a number of these groups in Chicago.

"The preceding disorder in the southwestern part of the city had been mainly incited by a speech delivered to some 'lumber shovers' on the 'Black Road' by the defendant Spies, who was observed to be the most activ at the Haymarket meeting. Copies of the 'Revenge Circular' and of the handbill prepared by the defendant Fischer had fallen into the hands of the police. A rumor had also come to their headquarters that it was the intention of the parties at the Haymarket meeting to proceed to some neighboring railroad freight houses where non-union laborers were employed and blow them up. In addition to all this, it was reported to the officer in command of the force at the Desplaines street station that the defendant Fielden, who was then speaking, had just used the following language: 'You hav nothing more to do with the law, except to lay hands on it and throttle until it makes its last kick. Keep your eye upon it, throttle it, stab it, do everything you can to wound it;' and that the use of these words had produced great excitement and caused a noisy demonstration around the wagon. Upon the reception of this report, the officer in command decided upon the dispersion of the meeting, and his men made the movement for that purpose as already stated. As soon as the order to disperse was given, the defendant Fielden descended from the wagon, making use of the words, 'We are peaceable.' Whether or not these words were uttered as the English equivalent of the German word 'Ruhe,' which meant 'peace,' the evidence does not conclusivly show. Certain it is that no sooner had Fielden said, 'We are peaceable,' than the bomb exploded, and in a few seconds thereafter a volley of shots were fired.

"In the city of Chicago were three thousand of these armed Socialists, of whom the defendant Parsons then said that they were well armed with rifles and revolvers, and would hav dynamite and bombs when they got ready to use them."

Referring to the evidence as to the use and power of dynamite, the opinion says:

"While such testimony was irrelevant, yet it contained no point to justify a reversal of the judgment. As specimens of weapons which depraved men, or men with no heart, could use against their fellow-creatures, nothing in modern times can approach the exquisit means devised by these Anarchists, and they seemed to hav made a study of that awful purpose."

The court very carefully explains the law as to conspiracy in all the phases, and quotes extensivly from eminent authorities. The court further says it is a mistake to assume that a defendant cannot be charged with advising, encouraging, aiding, and abetting an unknown principal in the perpetration of a crime, and following that point his honor givs very familiar and trite and well-known examples, and follows it with a long list of reliable authorities. It is a very clear principle of law decided by many courts, that the man who, being present, aiding, and abetting or assisting, hath advised, encouraged, aided, or abetted the perpetration of crime, may be considered as the principal, and so is the case at bar; consequently some of the defendants are correctly charged as accessories before the fact. Among the instructions for the defense the court below said:

"Although the defendants, or some of them, may hav said or spoken or published their views to the effect that a social revolution should be brought about by force, and that the officers of the law should be resisted, and to this end dynamite should be used to the extent of taking human life, and that persons should arm to resist the law, that laws should be throttled and killed, and, although such language might cause persons to desire to carry out the advice given as aforesaid, and do the act which caused Officer Degan's death, yet the bomb may hav been thrown and Degan killed by some one unfamiliar with and unacquainted with the teachings of these bomb-throwers."

The court here enters into an elaborate argument upon the different instructions, quoting authorities which are not of general interest. The court concludes by saying:

"We think that the course pursued on the trial in regard to the manner of empaneling the jury was correct, and in accordance with the plain meaning of section 21, chapter 28, Revised Statutes. That section says that the jury shall be passed upon and accepted of by the parties, commencing with the plaintiff.

"The state is not called upon to tender the defendants a second panel before the defendants tender in back four. We cannot see that the remarks of the state's attorney in the argument to the jury were marked by any such improprieties as require a reversal of the judgment.

"In their lengthy argument counsel for the defense make some other points of minor importance which are not noticed. As to these it is sufficient to say that we hav considered and do not regard them well taken. The judgment of the Criminal Court of Cook county is affirmed."

After the decision, Leonard Sweet, leading counsel for the Anarchists before the Supreme Court, said:

The laws of the United States provide that a case can be carried from a state court by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, whenever a question is involved as to the construction of the Federal Constitution, or of the laws or treaties of the United States, but under no other circumstances. There are no laws or treaties of the United States affecting this case, therefore it can only be taken to the United States Supreme Court on questions pertaining to the construction of the Constitution. The only question of this character is in connection with unreasonable inquiries and searches. No man can be compelled to furnish evidence for his own conviction. We claim that the court below did not respect these provisions of the Illinois and Federal Constitutions, for the reason that the day after the Haymarket affair the police entered the Arbeiter Zeitung office, and, with the aid of a locksmith, broke open the drawers of Spies, where they found two letters of Herr Most, written three years before the riot, and containing references to bombs. These letters were introduced in evidence against all the defendants, and we claim that the Constitution was thereby violated. It is a rule of law that the introduction of unlawful evidence vitiates a verdict. The mode of procedure for taking the case to the United States Supreme Court would be to get a record of the whole case and assign errors, from which any judge can see that the construction of the Federal Constitution is involved. If it is found that such a question is involved, a writ of error will be granted, and the case brought before the full court. This writ of error would operate as a supersedeas by order of the judge granting the writ.

W. A. Foster, one of the lawyers for the defense at the time of the trial, said that, notwithstanding the talk of an appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the only hope now was in the mercy of Governor Oglesby. Mr. Foster claimed to hav no doubt whatever that the sentence of four of the seven would be commuted.

"Upon what do you base that opinion?" was asked.

"I hav reasons for believing that officers representing the prosecution will use their efforts to bring about such results. I hav not only my opinion that that will be the case, but I hav their word for it."

"Which of the Anarchists will hav their sentences commuted, if any?"

"I do not believe that Samuel Fielden, Michael Schwab, or A. R. Parsons will ever be hanged, and very much doubt whether Adolph Fischer will. As to the others, at present I must confess it looks pretty blue."

"Why should those four be let off easier than the others?"

"The testimony as to them was so different, and their conduct and actions as proved were such as to warrant a difference in the punishment."

Joseph R. Buchanan, the Socialist editor, who has charge of the Anarchist defense fund, said that, should the state Supreme Court refuse to grant an appeal to the United States Supreme Court, or not pass on the matter in time to hav their decision act as a supersedeas before the date set for the execution of the sentence, application will be made to a justice of the United States Supreme Court for a supersedeas. If these processes fail, an appeal to executiv clemency will be made. The petitions for clemency will be presented to Governor Oglesby.

Superstition, Ancient and Modern.

These old cruel stories about this barbarous people and their bloodthirsty deity come down to us from the past laden with veneration and sanctity. They may be repugnant to reason, yet to the minds of the superstitious, they must not be regarded rationally, but must be contemplated through the eye of faith. We can throw away an old fashioned machine for one with new improvements. We can giv up the canal-boat for the railroad car. We can giv up flag signals for the telegraph. Our ancestors had to giv up the copying of manuscripts to the printing-press, and so with thousands of mechanical improvements and methods of study. We hav had to abandon the inferior for the superior. But in religion it is not so. No matter how low and debasing the literature of the Bible, no matter how obscene many of its stories are, or how barbarous, cruel, and utterly worthless the God of the Old Testament has become, there are millions so superstitious, so enslaved by tradition and fear, that it would be almost impossible for them even to think for a moment of giving up these fetishes. Millions of them hav said about their neighbors, "Ephraim is joined to his idols: let him alone" (Hos. iv, 17), when the truth is they themselvs were more blindly joined to their own idols than those they pitied were to theirs.

Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men (2 Cor. v, 11).

They provoked him to jealousy with strange gods, with abominations provoked they him to anger (Deut. xxii 17).

They sacrificed unto devils, not to God; to gods whom they know not, to new gods that came newly up, whom your fathers feared not (Deut. xxxii, 17).

Therefore was the wrath of the Lord kindled against his people, insomuch that he abhorred his own inheritance (Ps. cvi, 40).

For a fire is kindled in mine anger and shall burn unto the lowest hell (Deut. xxii. 22).

God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him (Job xx, 23).

For our God is a consuming fire (Heb. xii, 29).

For the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, even a jealous God (Deut. iv, 24).

The highest duty of the Jew and Christian was and is to please this angry God. Hence sacrifices of the Jews were numerous. The truly faithful had to bring to the priest the firstlings of his flocks. He would not receive a lamb with blemish.

The Christian is not required to make offerings; but he must come down with first-class collections, donations, etc.

If the Christian does not offer living sacrifices, he nevertheless pays his dues and renders service, at the family altar, by returning thanks before every meal, by songs and prayers at conference and prayer-meetings, by attending upon the divine oracles two or three times every Sunday, by joining in annual feasts and fasts in honor of his God. Religion has a vast amount of routine work and hard cash connected with it.

Josephus, speaking of the Jews, says: "They also endeavor to move the gods as they would the vilest men, by gifts and presents, as looking for nothing else than to receive some great mischief from them unless they pay them wages."

"The minds of men," observes Grote in his History of Greece, "were prone to the belief that what they were suffering arose from the displeasure of the gods."

Gibbon declares that "fear has been the original parent of superstitions, and every new calamity urges trembling mortals to deprecate the wrath of heaven."

Hence we hav fast days and other forms of worship in which we try to please an angry God. In fact, nearly all forms of religious service are but little more than attempts to placate an angry God.

GOD'S WRATH.

Every great calamity is supposed to be a visitation of God's wrath poured out upon the people because of some particular sin, or sins.

An earthquake is a visitation of divine displeasure upon those who despise his holy laws by fishing or swimming on Sunday. Cholera and yellow fever are distinctiv marks of heaven's wrath. The burning of great cities, as Chicago and Boston, was, according to the clergy, a divine punishment of wicked people on account of their corruptions.

Every evil is supposed to come from the afflictiv hand of the great unknown.

In 1876 there was a general convention of grasshoppers held in the state of Minnesota. They lost no time in passing useless resolutions, but enacted that every particular grasshopper should appropriate as much green substance as he could conveniently carry away with him. The result in a short time was that all the grass and grain of Minnesota was eaten up. The granger was stricken with grief and alarm. He was not confident that the grasshoppers had finished their work. There was no telling what they might eat next. But it came to pass in those days that the Lord raised up a mighty man who was governor of the land. Now, this great man was called Pillsbury. And it came to pass when Governor Pillsbury saw how great an evil had befallen the land, he quailed and said, "This is one too many for me." While he pondered this thing in his mind, behold the angel of superstition came to him and said, "Arise, go forth, count your beads backward and forward, three times a day for seven days." And after he had counted his beads three times a day for seven days, lo! the angel of superstition rested down upon his bald pate again, saying unto him, "Write a decree, O governor, in all languages, and send it to the Danes, Swedes, Norwegians, Bohemians, Germans, English, and Irish, commanding them to assembly on a certain Black Friday for fasting, confession, and prayer. Let every dweller in Minnesota on that day put on sackcloth and ashes on account of his sins and the sins of the people. Let him confess to the great unknown that he justly deserves the visitation of the grasshoppers. Let him pray that they may take their flight into Nebraska, or Wisconsin, or anywhere out of this land." And the governor did according to the command of the angel of superstition. He writ a decree in all languages and tongues, appointing a day of fasting, confession, and prayer. And all the tribes of Minnesota assembled in their tabernacles on the appointed day, and with broken hearts confessed that they had broken the unknown laws of the great unknown, and that they were sorry for it, and would never do it again. And then the high priests came forward to take up a collection and to say unto their people that in the space of a time and a half time the grasshoppers would sojourn with them no longer. And it came to pass after not many days that there was nothing more for the grasshoppers to eat except trees and rail fences. Then they all arose as one grasshopper, and on a strong west wind were carried into the land of Dakota, or somewhere else.

But there was nothing remarkable in the great miracle wrought by the hand of Governor Pillsbury. God's people hav always done wonderful things, and they are bound to keep up the wonders. The world needs wonders, and the church is the market for all sorts of mysteries and wonderful things.

Pope Calixtus III. exorcised and expelled Halley's Comet in 1456 from the skies.

In 1474, at Berne, Maybugs were excommunicated by a bishop, and at a later date tradition has it that St. Patrick banished toads from Ireland. In view of these well-known matters of imagination, we must make some little allowance for the governor, and also because of his being a Christian.

The first execution fulminated against animals is recorded in the twelfth century. St. Foix, in his "Essais Historiques sur Paris," states that the bishop of Laon pronounced in 1120 an injunction against caterpillars and field-mice on account of the ravages they made on the crops (Credulities, p. 291, by W. Jones).

In our country and times people do not attempt to excommunicate anything. But they do resort to prayers against potato bugs and locusts. Generally, however, prayers against potato bugs are topped off with a few sprinkles of paris green.

In the "Annuaire du Department de l'Aisne" (1812) are full details of a sentence pronounced on a hog (June 14, 1494) by the mayor of St. Martin de Laon for having défacié and strangled a child in its cradle. The sentence concludes thus: "We, in detestation and horror of this crime, and in order to make an example and satisfy justice, hav declared, judged, sentenced, pronounced, and appointed that the said hog, being detained a prisoner, and confined in said abbey, shall be, by the executioner, hung and strangled on a gibbet, near and adjoining the gallows in jurisdiction of the said monks, being near their copyhold of Avin" (Credulities, p. 293, W. Jones).

A remarkable feature about this sentence is that the hog was sentenced to death without benefit of the clergy, and that the judge was very particular not to say, "And may God hav mercy on your soul." It is not quite so certain, however, that the clergy did not hav the benefit of the hog after he was killed.

THE HEBREWS WERE IDOLATERS.

There is abundant proof that they did not regard their God as the only god, but merely the greatest of all gods. There are evidences that the Jews were idolatrous more or less through all their history. It is simply a proof that they received their religion as all other ethnic peoples had received their, namely, from current traditions. The negativ features of religion, as fear, ignorance, superstition, manifested themselvs quite as naturally among the Jews as among other tribes.

Idolatry was simply a worship of other gods than those admitted in the Hebrew theology.

One of the wrongs done most frequently by the Jews was that of going after strange gods. When the Hebrew people were in the hight of their glory, they were the most idolatrous.

We read in all parts of the Hebrew literature of a plurality of gods, and that the people were prone to worship them.

Rachel steals Laban's household gods, and with Jacob, her husband, runs away. Laban pursues and demands his goods. "Wherefore hast thou stolen my gods?" (Gen. xxxi, 30).

"Thou shalt hav no other gods before me?" Then there were other gods? But if the infinit God said this, how foolish, stale, and flat for him to dignify scraps of wood, stone, and metal as gods! He ought to hav known better.

Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image [a god] or any likeness of anything [another god] that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth.

For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil (Gen. iii, 5).

Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? (Ex. xv. 11.)

For the Lord your God is the God of gods, and the Lord of lords. The Lord God of gods, the Lord God of gods, he knoweth, and Israel he shall know (Josh. xxii, 22).

They chose new gods; then was war in the gates (Judges v, 8).

Whereupon the king took counsel and made two calves of gold, and said unto them, It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalen; behold thy Gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt (1 Kings xii, 28).

Then Jezebel sent a messenger unto Elijah, saying, So let the gods do to me, and more also, if I make not thy life as the life of one of them by to-morrow about this time (1 Kings xix, 2).

Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord (Ps. lxxxvi, 8).

O giv thanks unto the God of gods, for his mercy endureth forever. O giv thanks to the Lord of lords, for his mercy endureth forever (Ps. cxxxvi, 2, 3).

I will praise thee with my whole heart; before the gods will I sing praise unto thee (Ps. cxxxviii, 1).

The king answered unto Daniel and said, Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings (Dan. ii, 47).

For great is the Lord, and greatly to be feared above all gods (1 Chron. xvi, 25).

And the house which I build is great, for great is our God above all gods (2 Chron. ii, 5).

For I know that the Lord is great, and that our Lord is above all gods (Ps. cxxxv, 5).

For the Lord is a great God, and a great king above all gods (Ps. xcv, 3).

For thou Lord art high above all the earth; thou art exalted far above all gods (Ps. xcvii, 9).

Worship him, all ye gods (Ps. xcviii, 7).

There are about two hundred places in the Bible where it refers to the gods. They were a common commodity, and of a very inferior quality. With the rolling ages their numbers hav gradually become beautifully less, and the luster of the few who still survive is greatly dimmed. W. S. BELL.

The Education of Men and Women.

The following statistical paragraph appeared in the Albany Argus of August 24, 1887:

Of the 365 colleges and universities in the United States, 278 are church schools, averaging 13 teachers and 193 students to a school; 78 are non-sectarian schools, averaging 15 teachers and 136 students.

Here we see the potency of organized theology as to education. The primary object and drift tend to the education of men (not women) to fill up the ranks of the priesthood and loafing missionaries.

Let us look at our own state, the state of New York. Two years ago I obtained from the regents of the university the following facts: Endowments to institutions exclusivly for males, $12,647,604; exclusivly for females, $2,007,960, of which Matthew Vassar, a Freethinker, gave $1,151,655.

Until then in our state the account stood more than $12,000 000 for theological manufactories, and less than $1.000,000 for the education of women.

Centennial of the Constitution.

In this jubilee at hand, seeming to be hastily sprung on the nation, there are doubtless secret aims and motivs, to be criticised, that call for first attention. Christians, as well as Freethinkers, should look for the underlying animus of the illusiv glorification ere they commit favorably to measures the councils devise or seek to consummate. The commission working up the convocation being ecclesiastical; the present attitude of the church toward democracy being aggressiv; its many powerful associations being zealously engaged in subverting the principles of the Constitution; the bold and general design evidently being to further usurp the people's chartered rights—all this, showing the sectarian bias of the demonstration, indicates the political and ecclesiastical importance of the assemblage to the movers of it. Signs of management to suppress the vital force of the Constitution hav long been apparent, and also certified by positiv declaration in frequent statements that God as revealed by the Bible must be the acknowledged head of the Constitution. Yet, all know, or ought to, that would annul it, for the creeds of both Catholics and Protestants, based on the Bible, allow no self government to a human being or to a collectiv people. But, seeing the American affection for a republic, the rights Revolutionary fathers achieved and embodied in a chartered government, both wings of the great church hav delusivly professed sympathy and countenance of the democracy; while, by every favor gained and added act, they hav mocked its provisions, counting on the stupor of the masses to suppose such a solecism as a Christian republic could exist. The gratitude to be expressed for past success in rejecting the intent of the republic and its basic documents will doubtless be sincere. Thinkers, instead of looking on the coming show as friendly to liberty, will see a gigantic effort to blind by enthusiasm, and win a victory by hurried, disguised influences. If the crowd, and especially the official authority expected, are swayed as anticipated, the tune will soon turn, and we shall hear the boast, It took the gospel but one century to reverse the Infidel policy of the Constitution. A TRUTH SEEKER editorial of August 20th put out a good leader on this affair. Two weeks' watching for Liberals to chime in discovers no sign of concern, and snatching my warning pen I invite all the would-be free who possibly can to attend the jubilee and try to learn something of its real inwardness.

TILLOTSON.

Arrant Hypocrits.

Among their inconsistencies and hypocrisies there is not one so bold and inexcusable as their treatment of the colored race in their midst by the Christian sects. It is no question of taste—it goes to the very root of Christianity itself, as taught by Jesus Christ. Who could hav believed that the professing followers of Jesus, more than a thousand years after the establishment of his religion, and after having held those black people in slavery for ages, and being freed by the power of Freethought to set them free, would leave the poor, ignorant creatures to themselvs, as though they were brute beasts. Wherever heaven may be and the "many mansions of his father's house," on this earth there is no room in a Christian church for the black people. There must be a black heaven and black mansions there—according to the Christian practice on earth.

The negro has been excluded from fellowship with white Christians until now, everywhere, his race is worshiping by itself, in its own buildings, of denominations peculiar to itself. "Come up, fellow-Christians, and giv us something for the missions. Help the Lord against the mighty." Yes, yes, we send millions of dollars to convert "blacky" away off in Africa's center, and there we preach to him and worship with him where nobody sees us. And right here are millions of them, except in lacking savagery, inferior to him of Africa, just like little children left entirely to their own guidance, and a most wonderful thing they make of it.

Socially this religion might be a benefit to the negro here by the influence of association with the whites. At least, the Christians believe so; and yet the only opportunity of doing any good is neglected. I will except the Roman Catholic church from this denunciation. The blacks come into that church the equals of emperors and kings. Unfortunately for the blacks, none of them, so to speak, are Catholics. Every excuse made by Christians in this matter is a pitiful evasion.

"The blacks won't unite with us"—since you kept them out for twenty years.

"They prefer to be alone"—since you hav educated them to go alone by your neglect.

No doubt some kind of superstition is adapted and required for the ignorant or uncivilized. The devil himself ought to be a Methodist. But whether we believe so or not, the pretended followers of "the Lamb" so profess; i.e., that it is a restraint. They all declare that if they thought as we do, they "would go out throat-cutting and robbing." No doubt they are right about it. Why, then, not associate blacks with them? HOLT.

The Ministers and the Constitution.

If there were anything that could make one dissatisfied with our national Constitution, it would be the comparisons the clergy make with it. For the Constitution, bear in mind, was the work of statesmen and not churchmen. Thomas Jefferson, the Materialist and Infidel, of Virginia, did more to shape our nation's policy and charter than all the Christians alive in his time.

The centennial of the Constitution, celebrated last week in Philadelphia, has been the occasion for too much ministerial swashbuckling. Said the Rev. N. B. Thompson, Free Baptist, from his pulpit last Sunday:

"More than a hundred years ago, certain God-fearing men who believed in the exercise of right thought they saw in this largely undeveloped continent great national possibilities. They believed God, who takes an especial interest in the nation that fears him, would make of the people for himself a 'kingdom of priests, and a holy nation.' Nor were they mistaken. I verily believe the framers of the Constitution were moved by a holy sense of inspiration. That instrument, our country's Bible and bulwark, has remained unchanged and unharmed through the vicissitudes of a century. No rude hand has torn it in shreds, no despotic heel ground it to dust, no traitorous hand has torn it from our national volume, but it still remains the best evidence of human greatness. And why? Because it is of man for the glory of God."

And then—to show his gentle and forgiving spirit, perhaps—he added:

"I thank God also for the judicial decision by which the action of the lower court was confirmed in passing sentence of death upon the seven Anarchists of Chicago. Hang these men? Yes, and every man who dare disturb the very divine mechanism of government by which this great nation livs. Woe to the men who aim at our overthrow! We offer all possible advantages to any and all who come to our shores to liv, and liv peaceably among us; but, I repeat, woe to any of them who would dare to disturb our society by their pernicious doctrins or seek to change or subvert our form of government! Hang these Anarchists? Yes, every one of them."

On the same day, the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, Presbyterian, oped his mouth:

"The chief reason of hope that as a nation we will endure in immortal youth is that our institutions are so inextricably entwined with God that no Infidel plot can unravel them into Secular weakness. Our nation can never be a sectarian nation with a state establishment of religion, but it has always been and always must be a Christian nation. The very flax from which our institutions were spun was Christian in its European roots. Christian in its American stalks, and to-day, with all the Infidels, Anarchists, Socialists, and atrocitists now among us, we are still a Christian people. Remember that we are distinctivly a Christian nation. Not only are the people, who are the finer threads in the national life, a Christian people, but the states, which make up its coarser strands, are Christian states. Clearly, in sentiment at least, the nation is Christian. Our work is to keep it so by better laws and better lives."

The Rev. Dr. Chesney, Methodist, after hitting his congregation for being cold in their Christianity—which being interpreted means, not paying the preachers sufficient cash—said:

"God is the author of national life. He has created not only the individual, but the nation itself. He has determined the periods and places of nations, and their boundaries in time and space. This doctrin needs no defense. It comes with the authority of God's word. Let me say here that it seems to me a good omen, a happy coincidence, that at the very time we are celebrating our national centennial the news should come to us that the sentence of the Anarchists has been confirmed. On the divine side our safety is in God."

The Rev. William Lloyd, Congregationalist, and of whom better things might hav been expected, made a fool of himself in this wise:

"Every nation is a tower of Babel or a temple of the living God. In looking at the dangers to America from irreligion we are met at the outset by the charge that the danger of religion, as shown by the Roman Catholic church, is very great. It is true that this church goes into politics, and any church that does this is a danger to the republic. The celebrated alliteration, 'Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion,' will not soon be forgotten, and the sting in it is the word Romanism. But no peril from religion is comparable to that of irreligion. The reason why some of the so-called leaders [of the workingmen] attack Christianity is because they recognize in it the surest guardian of the state. A great enemy of religion is the pure worldliness which seems to be increasing with our wealth. Our life is like that of Rome in the Augustan age. In our amusements we see thinly veiled the immorality which marked the downfall of the French. Our hoardings are an insult to our wives and daughters as they go to church. All agree that the theater is degenerating, and before long its greatest friends will be unable to defend it. Surely something may be done to better this. Decay of religion is indicated by the non-recognition of God as the giver of wealth. Decay of godliness results in decay of morality, as all history shows. Commerce did not save Tyre, education did not save Greece, armies did not save Rome. We should heed the lesson, and remember that righteousness exalteth a nation. Our liberties can be preserved by religion alone."

The preachers are bound to glorify their calling and exaggerate the importance of the Myth they serve, thereby strengthening the foundations and superstructure of the mammoth edifice of superstition they hav reared, and keeping the people still longer in subjection to them. But to anyone who knows the history and traditions of this country their talk sounds exceedingly childish.

"Dead Issues."

A great majority of the leaders and workers in the different labor parties and organizations, if we except the waning Knights of Labor, are practically Freethinkers. In Henry George's last fall campaign the orators of the Liberal Club were the orators also of the embryo United Labor party. The Anarchists, generally, are Atheists. The Socialists, to a large extent, are not of the church; and the United Labor party, the Anarchists, and the Socialists are in the forefront of the battle for Labor Reform. The old Land Reformers of the days of George Evans were Infidels, and their survivors are Infidels, but they hav either become inactiv or joined themselvs with other organizations under a different name. Dr. Edward McGlynn has put himself on record as in favor of the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and a great many of his followers would do the same if their opinion were to be given on the subject.

It is to be regretted that among all these there are so few to be found who put the first emphasis upon their opposition to the union of church and state, and upon the necessity of freeing the human mind from its bondage to the Christian superstition. "God," say some of them, "is a man of straw, which you Infidels are continually setting up and knocking over."

That statement can never be true while to "contumeliously reproach" this "man of straw," or to ridicule his so-called word, can land an American citizen in jail, or subject him to a fine.

"The church," say others, "is a moribund institution that is dying at the root. Let it alone. The whole matter is a dead issue."

That statement can never be true so long as the Catholic church continues to grow as it is growing in this country. It may be rotten at the root, but its branches are spreading and reaching into public offices and public schools. The church will not die while it feeds at the public crib. Freethought and the Demands of Secularism will not become dead issues until they are realized.

The Demands are plain, clearly defined, and easily understood, and that fact may be against them. We know what would result from their adoption. Perhaps if the Henry Georgeites knew exactly what would occur under the single tax system they would not advocate it. If the Socialists could look so far ahead as to realize precisely the meaning of Socialism practicalized, they might lose some of the enthusiasm which now distinguishes their propaganda. If Christians could guess what an eternity of praise singing must be to a lover of variety, how many would care to attain the orthodox heaven?

As a matter of fact, there never was a livelier and more vital issue than Freethought. Thought must precede action in order that the action may be intelligent, and Freethought must precede speech in order that speech may be honest. Unless a person be a Freethinker we hav no way of knowing whether an opinion which he may giv upon any subject is his own opinion, or an opinion the opposit of which he is not at liberty to either entertain or express.

An issue should not be allowed to die simply because it is undisputed and accepted. If that were to be done the social reformer must abandon the advocacy of his theories as soon as he becomes convinced that he thoroughly understands them, and Socialism and Henry Georgeism would thereupon become "dead issues."

While the Labor movement is opposed as it is by pope, priest, and preacher, its advocates ought to be able to see who their enemies are, and how necessary it is that religious prejudice and ecclesiastical authority be destroyed. The excommunicated McGlynn, who has just excommunicated the Socialists, is a standing example. Besides, what would the Socialists think if they should finally open their eyes far enough to discover that they are expelled from among Henry George's religious crusaders because they are Infidels? Would they still believe that the religious question is a dead issue?

The Gospel for France.

It requires not a little assurance to put the great republic of France alongside of Africa in its "need of missionaries," but the Christians of this land hav done it, and are appealing to American Christians for funds for "the evangelization of Paris." A writer from Paris in one of our religious journals pleads: "To American churches the appeal should come with fresh urgency. I cannot but feel that in this age of missions we should use a wise economy of means and men, and do the utmost for the fields that are in a critical condition. The next five or ten years of such evangelistic effort as has been expended may save France from Infidelity, and may awaken to a warmer and higher life its struggling Protestant churches. There are so many reasons why we should do more for this land that we are rather surprised we hav so tardily responded to the call to do for its white harvest fields."

This minister must be congratulated upon having reached the top of the mountain of Christian impudence. These insignificant preachers of the superstition of an ignorant tramp, sitting upon hills of their own conceit and patronizing the splendid republic of France, with her magnificent achievements for civilization, is a revelation which must astonish the common sense of the world. And when it is recollected that in France the great victories of civilization hav been won in spite of that religion, and in the very teeth of the opposition of its priests, which Americans are now asked to furnish funds to propagate, amazement is dumb. Christian audacity and conceit hav no farther to go.

The history of France is one of the inspiring histories of the world. The never-ending fight her people hav made for liberty, for enlightenment, for civilization of a high and refined type, is the theme for poets, the example for other countries, the guidance of statesmen in every clime. With scarcely an exception, every spot on the lilies of France is a splash of blood shed by the Christian church. All the tyrants of France hav been in league with the Christian church. The slavery of her peasantry is the work of that same church. The ignorance and superstition found in her rural districts are the result of and fostered by Christian authority. It was the Christian religion which selected her battlefields, built her inquisitions, and dug her graves in which was buried the brain of France, leaving alive only the cowards and the church's tools. It was the Christian religion, administered by the Roman Catholic church, which kept the common people of Paris in the gutters, harnessed the peasant women to the plow, made their children naked brutes, scarcely better than swine, starved almost the whole population, and finally forced them to become the fiends we read about in the histories of the French Revolution. Yet all this while these poor, abused images of humanity loved the church, submitted to the priests, reverenced the deity, and believed in the Christian religion. Finally their eyes were opened, the intelligent among them were chosen rulers, they broke the religious yoke, and sprang to the front of nations. Through centuries of misery to a glimpse of freedom, then back to slavery under king and priest, but never losing sight of liberty's goal, has the French nation, weary and bloody, pressed. To-day there is but one country—and that a republic owing its life to her—that stands as high in civilization and enjoys as much freedom as the republic of France, which these conceited descendants of the Roman Catholic church are asking funds to "evangelize." France has had her evangelization, and she desires no more. Her Christian evangels were evangels of blood, of murder, of rapine and unutterable ferocity. Her Infidelity was her rescuer and her savior, and is her bond and guarantee of future freedom and prosperity.

If the efforts of these self-seeking fanatics hav effect other than to make the people of Paris smile, it will be to excite in them feelings of angry contempt.

Pious Humbugs.

The religious press makes such great use of the observance of Sunday by the managers of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Road that the following from the Evening Post is interesting:

"The danger of assuming facts for the basis of an argument is frequently illustrated in the conduct of the religious press, but has never appeared more clearly than in an article in the last number of the Baptist Weekly, entitled 'No Loss by Sunday Observance,' which is designed to show that the price of Lackawanna shares is due to the fact that the company runs no Sunday trains. Says the Baptist Weekly:

"In the case of railroads, it is urged that it is a necessity to run Sunday trains, but there are conspicuous examples where the opposit necessity is urged—that of rest for all employees for one day in the week, and where so far no Sunday trains hav passed over the road. It would seem that this course, pursued by at least one important railway management, pays, viz., the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad. . . .

"From the beginning it has been in the hands of Christian men, who hav posttivly refused to do business or run trains on the Sabbath. Even when appealed to by the managers of a camp-meeting to allow trains to run for the accommodation and the profit of the managers, as well as for its own profit, it steadfastly refused, saying simply, 'Our trains do not run on Sunday.'

"And then our contemporary 'turns to the latest stock reports,' and finds that Lackawanna shares bear a high price, while many other shares are low, and it inquires: 'Does it pay to hav regard to the law of God in railroading?' Now, of course, the fact is that for many years the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Road has run trains out of Hoboken every Sunday morning, and, to make matters worse, they were 'theater trains,' ministering to a form of pleasure which some religious papers do not approve. The current time-table shows that, in addition to these, the company regularly runs six other trains 'on Sundays also,' which, furthermore, chiefly are through trains, going over the length of the main line and various branches. Worse even than this, there are, and for years hav been, two trains 'on Sundays only,' and these not trains for conveyance of passengers, which might be counted among 'works of mercy,' but 'milk trains,' the object of which is only to make money. It may be doubted whether the principle of the spiritual harvest is that 'it pays,' in the form of dividends, 'to hav regard to the law of God in railroading,' but it always pays to hav regard to facts in arguing."

It was only a few weeks ago that a Methodist organ commended this road for refusing to run a train to a Methodist camp-meeting on Sunday, and Sam Sloan, the president, and his managers were highly extolled. The solid facts are that the road does run trains on Sundays when it finds it necessary to do so to compete with other lines, and it refuses to run trains on Sunday only to those places where there is no opposition, and the traffic of which it has by the throat, so to speak, and can do with it as it likes. A picayunish economy, and not regard for the Sabbath, is the real secret of Sam Sloan's Sunday observance, and there is not a meaner conducted railroad in the country. Its Morris & Essex branch, for example, while enjoying a passenger traffic worth thousands of dollars a week, is a seedy little road, with slow engins, dirty coaches, and high rates of fare. The Pennsylvania road, which for a few miles runs parallel, sends out, for less traffic, and at lower rates, splendid coaches and fast engins, and makes no pretense to piety. The value of the Lackawanna road is derived from its coal-fields and the penny-pinching policy which controls its passenger traffic, and not because God smiles on its pious managers.

When we lived on the line of the D., L. & W. there was but one thing that enabled us to keep patience with it. That was that Samuel Colgate, the soap chandler, of John street, was shaken up twice a day in its rattling cars for six days in the week. Sundays he attended the Baptist church, and put on a humble look of piety as he played the usher. When he came to New York on Sundays he rode on another road.

An Undesirable Citizen.

Mr. John Most, the Anarchist, desires to become an American citizen, but the naturalization authorities will not permit him to file his declaration of his intentions. The grounds of the refusal are his answers to the following questions:

"Q.—Are you Herr Most? A.—Yes, sir.

"Q.—Do you believe in the Constitution of the United States, and are you well disposed to the good order and happiness of the people who liv under it? A.—Yes, sir.

"Q.—Do you believe in obeying the laws as they are passed by the proper authorities of the state of New York? A.—Yes, if they are good laws.

"Q.—If laws were passed by the properly constituted authorities that were detrimental to the interests of the people, would you consider it proper to seek a remedy by resort to the ballot, or would you use force and resistance? A.—If I believed that such laws interfered with the rights of the people I should consider it my duty to use force against the authorities.

"Q.—Hav you not been punished for violating the laws? A.—I hav; but those laws were unconstitutional, and I was unjustly convicted. If I had the power to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States my conviction would be reversed. I hav resisted tyranny everywhere, and intend to do so."

While the right to make this examination of a man merely declaring his intention to become a citizen may be properly questioned, there can be no doubt that a judge would be sustained in refusing to issue the final papers after these answers of Mr. Most. In the declaration of intention it is only necessary to affirm the purpose of becoming a citizen and to renounce allegiance to foreign rulers. Before taking the oath, however, the applicant must swear to sustain the United States Constitution. This Mr. Most positivly refuses to do. But the naturalization clerk has got the cart before the horse, and the courts may yet compel him to receive Mr. Most's declaration.

We do not imagin that the Anarchist would be any more dangerous as an American citizen than he is now as a windy revolutionist. But unless he proposes to support the Constitution and effect his social reforms in a constitutional manner, it is no infringement of his rights to deny him citizenship.

Catholicism in the Northwest.

The people of Melrose, Minn., are experiencing the blessings of possessing a Roman Catholic hierarchy willing and able to run their public schools. So great, indeed, has the blessing become that the non-Roman-Catholic population are disturbed lest their children shall hav no school privileges whatever. A committee of Melrose citizens set forth the facts in the St. Paul and Minneapolis Pioneer Press.

It appears that two years ago the German Catholic priest of Melrose built a parochial school, in accordance with the orders of his superiors. The school population of his district is about two hundred, one-half of whom are children of Roman Catholics. The usual term of the public school was about nine months. Last July, at the annual school meeting, the priest appeared with his horde and voted that the public school term should consist of only five months, and that only two hundred dollars should be voted for expenses. Twice thereafter the citizens called school meetings, at each of which the priest appeared with his parishioners, including the sisters of the order of St. Benedict, and defeated the attempt to extend the school term to nine months. The priest also elected one of his tools as clerk of the district, and another as school director. At the last school meeting the priest said to his parishioners: "The laws relating to public schools are made by men and to suit themselvs, but you are not allowed to send your children to those schools. God says so, for the church says so, and whatever the church says is the same as if God said it."

The policy of the Roman Catholic church shows very plainly in this matter. It is to establish parochial schools, and then by force of numbers cripple or discontinue the public schools, until the Protestant and Secular voters are forced to concede the full demand of the church, which is a pro rata division of all public school funds between the Roman Catholics and the rest of the people. In this instance the term of the parochial school is to be ten months, while the priest claims that for the public school five months is a reasonable term. In addition, and by the direction of the priest, the clerk of the district refuses to hire a teacher for the public school, so that parents are left with nothing but a parochial school to which to send their children.

Other school districts in the same county are also asking for aid to protect their schools from the influence of the Catholic church, and a call will be issued for a mass convention of the friends of public schools throughout the county to meet at Melrose to perfect an organization for the protection of the public schools of the county. The committee of citizens say: "Melrose is struggling with a stronger power than the press of to-day are aware of; but if the fight continues it will not be long before the eyes of the people of the state will be opened to the power that has crowded the issue here, possibly prematurely."

The friends of the public schools will do well to take note of this case, and it givs added force to Dr. McGlynn's charge against the German Catholics of the Northwest. The aim of the church is as plain as plain can be, and the wayfarer must indeed be a fool who cannot see it.

Bloodthirsty Chicago.

And so the Chicago Anarchists will be hanged unless Governor Oglesby or the United States Supreme Court interferes!

The people of Chicago are bloodthirsty and demand the death of individuals who desire to revolutionize society, and obtain a little more comfort for the workers of the world. To this end the police, by perjury, connected the defendants with some wretch who threw a bomb which killed seven policemen, the lower court by partiality secured their conviction, and the higher court by sophistry sustains the verdict.

That is all there is to it, and we hope the people of Cook county are satisfied.

The sightless eyes of Justice are filled with tears.

It is a pity, says the New York Times, that a competent lecturer on toxicology was not sent out with the soldiers who hav been doing disinfecting duty in Italy. He would hav explained to the anti-sanitary mob the difference between carbolic acid as a beverage and as a disinfectant. When the soldiers insisted that it was harmless, the crowd naturally demanded that they should try it on themselvs. One drank it and died. Two others refused to drink it and were killed. This is a painful showing for Catholic Italy, but it recalls the treatment of suspected witches in Puritanical England. The culprit was thrown into water over her depth. If she sank and drowned, it was admitted that the prosecution had made a mistake. If she floated she was promptly convicted and killed.

Among the letters from our friends this week is one from Mr. Jamieson, in which he endeavors to justify Freethought lecturers in debating with the unsavory Clark Braden. When Clark Braden's character is shown to be as good as D. M. Bennett's, or even as Talmage's or Cook's, we will withdraw our objections. But Clark Braden, in addition to being a reprobate in about all ways possible, has persistently, maliciously, and indefatigably slandered a family of Freethinkers, respected by every one who enjoys the slightest acquaintance with them, and then has the brazen hardihood to ask their friends to meet him as an equal on a public platform. It should not be done. Gentlemen will not associate with blackguards; and, for one, we are loyal enough to our friends to refuse to treat with their blackmailing foes. And no Christian church who knows Clark Braden will put him forward as a representativ. There are some things which even the Christians refuse to do, and we are willing to concede that Christianity is not responsible for Braden. His villainy proceeds from his own inherent, natural, personal rottenness of character. His ancestry must hav been terrible.

They Ought to be Ashamed of Themselvs.

From the Hinton, W. Va., Mountain Herald.

On last Monday the brethren and sisters met at Griffith's school-house, Summers county, W. Va., to settle a church difficulty. The trouble was adjusted and the offending brother taken back into the church. But it seems that his sores were not healed, and when the meeting was dismissed he could not resist the temptation to giv his enemy a punch in the short ribs with his umbrella. And then the row began. Samuel, indignant at the thrust, arose in his might, and seized the wicked John. 'Twas Greek to Greek, and great the tug of war. Each clansman to his chieftain rushed with shout and yell, bent on vengeance. Benches groaned, chairs flew high in air, women screamed, and clung desperately to their respcctiv lords; the parson through the window plunged in direful haste, and dread confusion reigned. Fortunately, however, no blood was shed, no bones were broken. John's coat was torn into shreds, one dear women got a black eye (accidentally, of course), some hair was pulled, some linen stained, and this is about all of the physical damage done; but who can estimate the moral evil that will result from it? Can these people imagin the injury they hav done the church, and religion generally, by this disgraceful scene? Each and every one engaged in this ugly affair should be heartily ashamed of himself, and resolve to so liv in the future as to atone for the evil done. They should each ask the other's pardon, and remember that they are under obligations to society to liv as civilized beings, not as savages.

Letters from Friends.

WYANDOTTE, KAN., Sept. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am a constant reader of your valuable paper, and am very much pleased with your way of handling the so-called Christian religion. I inclose $1 for pamphlets.

EDWIN M. SMITH.

NASHVILLE, TENN., Sept. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $1.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, my dearest friend, for I enjoy the various contributors in this paper. The Liberal element is weak here, and needs a good, vigorous organizer such as Mr. S. P. Putnam to raise us from our lethargy. Liberals are afraid of the long-faced man. They will speak in private what they would not say in the presence of church people or in public. Such men are worse than the ordinary church people. They are double-faced. I lived thirty-two years in Chattanooga. There is a marked difference in the outspoken. Nashville is fifty years behind.

J. P. MULLER.

NEW GLASGOW, N. S., Sept. 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The Secularists of Nova Scotia hav just been favored with an intellectual treat. Mr. Charles Watts has visited us and spoken grand, noble, and inspiring words. His visit was a splendid success, excepting that it was not his good fortune to meet in debate "foemen worthy of his steel" On Sunday afternoon and evening Orpheus Club Hall, Halifax, was filled by a very intelligent audience, and on Monday evening it was filled to overflowing, many being obliged to turn away. Mr. Watts says that in his twenty-seven years' experience in the lecture field he never had found such interest, patience, and good feeling manifested by people who were hearing of Secularism for the first time. I send you papers containing reports of Mr. Watts's lectures and debates in Halifax. Kindly let your readers know that the friends of mental freedom in Nova Scotia are not idle.

Yours fraternally, F. M. BORDEN.

CAIRO, ILL., Sept. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: When your "always fresh contemporary" reads your editorial of August 27th, there will doubtless be a better understanding of your views on the subject under discussion; though it seems to me you hav always been extremely clear on that question, and a very impartial judge, seeking justice only.

I wish to welcome Mrs. E. A. Hilton to our ranks. Although she may regret her fifty years of lost time, yet she will find much she can do now that she feels the necessity of work. I congratulate her upon her escape from mental bondage.

Your correspondent, "Alhaza," sounds the keynote in saying, "Women must hav some share in government, or submit to indignities forever." Of course. People who are "governed without their consent" can expect nothing but unfair discrimination. It has always been the case that those making laws for a class different from themselvs are unjust legislators.

Mr. Heston's "Rock of Ages" is a wonderful construction, but not so full of ideal beauty as bristling facts.

AMARALA MARTIN.

REDDICK, ILL., Sept. 7, 287.

MR. EDITOR: No reform journal that I hav seen do I like better than THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is filled to the guard with the best of wholesome literature of the spiciest variety. I will do without it no more.

One thing puzzles me very much, and that is this. In this country are thousands of Infidels that are entirely unknown to the world. They take no Freethought paper, and are entirely ignorant as to the advancement of Infidelity. If they would take courage and come out and stand on the broad platform of right and Infidelity, we would hav one of the greatest revolutions that was ever fought between the elements of science and superstition. I think a good many of them hav not thoroughly evoluted yet. They are like the sky-pilots of the church. They havn't evoluted from the ideas of the barbarous ages of the past. There are some church-members of good standing, as far as financial matters are concerned, and you might as well try to turn the Red River of the North over the Pole as to try to make them believe that at least a portion of the Bible is filled with barbarisms. There are some superstitious bigots living here who stubbornly hold to their erroneous doctrin. They are like the church. They were born of gnorance and stupidity, and reared by superstition, and wil. die in it. But, thank nature, evoluiion is working wonders in the moral world. Ignorance and superstition are getting so threadbare that the church is becoming ashamed of her works. She does not know how to let go, but the time is not far distant when she will drop her erroneous ideas as a dog would a hot potato.

C. B. HUNTER.

MYRTLE CREEK, OR., Sept. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Religion keeps the majority of people ignorant, poor, and criminally inclined, while it givs wealth, place, and power to a contemptible minority. This minority has established pernicious and false governments throughout the world to the extent of its ability, and where it has had the preëminence the most ignorance has prevailed, and the most horrible and atrocious crimes hav been committed.

Under ecclesiastical rule in Europe during the Middle Ages the population did not double in a thousand years. Take Italy and many other countries that hav long been under the rule of the church, and view their condition.

When an illiterate people are not allowed to become informed, but are imposed upon by the false and superstitious doctrins of a diabolical priesthood, ignorance, poverty, and crime result.

In countries farther advanced and under religious influence the laws make more criminals than the penitentiaries reform, and cause more insanity than the asylums restore. They are in favor of the rich at the expense of the poor, and they are for the church at the expense of education. They rob the people of their land, their homes, and evict them and drive them into crowded and unhealthy cities.

Does the Christian God feed the young ravens when they cry? If so, why does he not feed, warm, and clothe those starving, crying children who hav been rendered destitute by the influence of his church?

Why does a Christian millionaire sanction the punishment of a beggar who steals a mere trifle, while all his misdeeds he heaps on Christ? "There is a fountain filled with blood" for a rich Christian, but none for a poor Infidel. It is a blessed consolation that an Infidel does not hav to swim through blood to discriminate between an honest man and a robber.

L. C. HILL.

COLFAX, WASH. TER., Sept. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Putnam left here two weeks since, after delivering four lectures, and of the four it was hard to tell which was the best. But, if I made a preference, it would be for "American Democracy." Mr. Putnam works up the Nine Demands in good style, and would not we be a model nation if governed by them.

In the four lectures there was not one sentiment expressed that would not benefit mankind if lived up to, and yet the average Christians look for horns and hoofs when they meet an Infidel. Mr. Putnam was the first Freethought lecturer who has visited our town, and our regret was that during his stay with us we were being entertained by an outdoor patent medicin concert, which somewhat thinned the lecture audiences; but he left a leaven in our midst, which is silently working its way, in the shape of Freethought literature, of which he sold a large quantity.

The perusal of a few copies of "Bible Morals" will cause more Bible reading than a four weeks' Methodist revival. Some of the doubtful ladies are much interested in Helen Gardener's work. I think they will doubt no longer after reading that book, and seeing the estimation in which the Bible and ancient good Christians held women. We hope to hav Liberal lectures often in the future, and organize a Secular Union as soon as practicable.

I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER the first call for the Secular Union Congress. If Chicago was not so far from our home, my husband and self would surely attend.

My short epistles never suit me when I get them written; but, to quote from a letter in the last TRUTH SEEKER, "I was brought up in a time when the salvation of a soul was of more consequence than the salvation of the head, and the quarterly dues must be paid whether school kept or not."

THE TRUTH SEEKER is always a welcome visitor to our home. We could not think of doing without it. Inclosed find $1.20, for which please send to my address the Nine Demands, as published by Charles Eckhard; "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," by W. H. Burr; and "The Public Schools and the Catholic Church," by Washburn.

KATE P. WOLFARD.

BERLIN, N. J., Aug. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Were it not a fact that the majority of men hav been accustomed to be led by political and religious rulers, without much examination, thought, or reflection of their own, I should be astonished to see so many running after the errors of Henry George on the land question; for a better system than his to lead the laboring classes into greater poverty could not be devised.

He starts out with an error and goes on adding error to error through a book of five hundred pages that is worth more for paper rags than anything else.

He says the people of all civilized nations hav been made poor by private ownership of land, when the fact is directly the reverse. They hav in one sense been made poor by private ownership, but not in the true sense of that term. The working classes hav not been made poor by owning land, but by robbing them of it and permitting drones and Shylocks to own it and use it in enslaving the landless workers. Nothing but private ownership of land will ever lead to universal independence.

Where does he get the proof that private ownership leads to poverty? No civilized nation has ever yet tried it. The governments of all civilized nations hav robbed the people of their birthright to land and sold it to Shylocks in lots of from five hundred to seventy thousand acres or more, turning the workers into the streets, taxing their heads, leaving them to steal, or to become slaves to the land-sharks for but barely wages enough, and often less than enough, to keep their families together. It is not the ownership of land, but the want of it, that has made the workers poor.

A comparativ few hav managed to buy or redeem their stolen land, and all temperate, industrious men who hav farms of good land of their own are the most independent, happy class to be found in any country. I hav never yet seen a man made poor by owning a farm, but hav seen thousands kept poor by not owning one.

The working classes in Ireland are probably the poorest of any of the nations, and there land robbery has been the most prevalent. Seven hundred years ago bands of English robbers went into Ireland and took possession of the land, and the people of Ireland hav been slaves to those robbers or their heirs ever since, and millions of them hav died of starvation, and other millions would hav died if they had not left the country. In 1847 there was a great famin in Ireland in which thousands starved to death. That very year there was food enough raised in Ireland to feed all the people comfortably, but the earliest and best of everything had to go to England to pay the land-thieves for rent on the farms. There was little left for the people except the potatoes, and when the rot destroyed that crop, the workers who had not means to flee had nothing to do but lie down and starve. Had the people owned the land on which they worked, there would hav been food enough for all.

The Secular Review says that during the fifty years' reign of Queen Victoria 1,225,000 hav died of famin in Ireland; 3,000,000 hav been evicted by landlords, and 4,180,000 hav emigrated to other countries; and all this was because private ownership of land was not allowed to the men who cultivate it.

So much for the first error of Mr. George. More anon.

J. HAOKER.

BRONSTON, KY., Sept. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to see the following dialog in THE TRUTH SEEKER:

PECK'S BOY: Papa, did God make the devil?

PECK: Yes, my son, God made everything?

P. B.: Papa, why did God cast the devil into the bottomless pit?

P.: God has not done that yet, my son. That is an event that is to take place in the future. Men hav always been acting wickedly. That is the reason that we know that the devil has not been cast into the pit. When God lays hold of the devil, and casts him into the bottomless pit and seals it, then the devil will remain there one thousand years. Men will cease to sin, not being tempted by the devil, and then I think that we will hav the millennium.

P. B.: But, papa, the twentieth chapter of Revelations says: "And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years. And cast him into the bottomless pit and shut him up, and set a seal upon him that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years should be fulfilled. And after that he must be loosed a little season?"

P.: Yes, I know it does, my son; but that is what John saw in a vision which was to take place at some time in the future, and the only way that we can tell when that actually does take place will be that men will cease to commit sin, not being tempted by the devil.

P. B.: It does seem to me that God ought not to hav made any devil, for then everybody would hav been good; but don't you think, when they do put the devil in the bottomless pit and seal it up, that, as the pit has no bottom to it, the cunning old devil will get right out, and that then, as he would know what they want to do with him, they could not catch him any more?

P.: Hush, my son; you ought not to speak about scriptural things in that way. I think that you had better go to bed.

OXFORD, N. S., Sept. 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: New ground has been successfully broken in that most unpromising region, Nova Scotia. Mr. Charles Watts was billed to lecture in Halifax, N. S., on priests' day and Monday, 4th and 5th insts. As Oxford is only 115 miles from Halifax, a party of Infidels concluded to step down and hear Mr. Watts and see the saints squirm. We had very modest expectations, diluted with fear of trouble or failure, but all went merry as a marriage bell. The audiences were large, orderly, and intelligent. A goodly array of ladies was at all meetings.

At the close of the first lecture a Rev. Mr. Moore, Presbyterian, gave battle. At the evening lecture the same gentleman opposed, assisted by Rev. Mr. Alman, Episcopalian, who bewailed his limited time so he could not properly present his views. Mr. Watts offered to forego Monday's lecture and giv either or both gentlemen equal time with himself, and debate the question, "Whether Secularism or Christianity was best adapted to meet man's needs;" also to giv them a synopsis of opening speech so they might post up. A triangular debate was arranged in the one-down-t'other-come-on style.

Mr. Alman opened, then Mr. Watts, then Mr. Moore, then Mr. Watts, and so on. Both reverend gentlemen are evidently earnest, amiable, and able in their chosen sphere—preaching—but all at sea in debate. At least, in Mr. Watts's hands they were as clay in the hands of the potter. The result is cyclonic. Not only is Halifax violently agitated, but through the copious reports of the city press the whole province is perturbed; staid people want to know what has happened, and who unchained the tiger. When we got home we found the storm had struck this remote region, and religious society was shaken to its deepest depths, down, down, even to the Salvationists. They had loud, lachrymose public prayers offered up to heaven for their depraved and desperately wicked fellow-citizens, who, at home, will not go around the corner to hear their almighty God's self-appointed instructors and assistants howl hell and deal damnation freely round on all they deem their foes, but who would travel 115 miles to hear a wicked Infidel blaspheme God's holy name (which Mr. Watts did not do, nor intend to do). They keep telling us that their God is all-wise and almighty, etc., and yet they speak and act as if he was an impotent imbecil, who would not know when his name was taken in vain unless they told him, and could not defend himself from insult or assault, or vindicate his own honor, so they take up the cudgels and do it for him. 'Tis strange, passing strange, that men, otherwise rational, will keep up the solemn farce of supplicating, cringing to that which they themselvs must instruct, uphold, defend. As for the cry of blasphemy—that chamelion creation of crafty priests, that ever changes its hue according to its geographical location—we think those who severely leave God alone because they know nothing of him, and no man can know, are blameless. The real blasphemers, if there be any such, are those who postulate an omni-powered, omni-virtued God, and then accuse him of performing, commanding, or teaching all the puerilities, all the absurdities and obscenities, all the cruelties and crimes recorded in that Christian paper fetish, the so-called holy Bible. Their prayers did not seem to be those of the righteous, as they availed naught. We all got home safe, sound, and happy, except that one of our party had a slight attack of cholera, perhaps due to their prayers. If so, the devil-drubbers should study Queensberry rules, and aim for the head or heart, and never, coward-like, strike below the belt. Our holy howlers still fire at us at long range, or under cover of the coward's castle. It is much pleasanter mumbling musty creeds than gnawing at old files.

WILLIAM GRAY, SR.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We must hav some mode of reckoning the lapse of years. We do not know what "1887" does mean, except that it is this year, and is a certain number of years after any other known date. As the time of the event intended to be commemorated is admittedly uncertain to the extent of four years, it is evidently not essential that the beginning of the epoch should be exactly fixed. If Bruno had been burnt anywhere within four years of the time he was, earlier or later, we might call this year 287, just as reasonably as 1887, if we prefer to commemorate the later event.

In the ordinary chronology, I am writing on Sept. 8, 1887. Suppose I call it Sept. 8, 287, what does that mean? The "8" indicates that I am writing in some hour of the 8th day of the month, which 8th day is not yet completed. "Sept." indicates that it is in some part of the ninth month of the year, which month is not yet completed. So "287" would naturally mean that it is in some part of the 287th year from the beginnirg of the epoch, and that the 287 years will not be completed until this year is ended—that is, until the beginning of January, 1888. The epoch therefore began 287 years completed before Jan. 1, 1888—that is, on Jan. 1, 1601. So the epoch begins, in that view of it, on the first day of January next following the event which it is intended to commemorate.

But if we prefer to consider the expression "287" to indicate completed years, in addition to the odd 8 months 7 days and some hours and minutes, just as we usually reckon our age by completed years, then it would indicate that the 287 years were completed last Jan. 1st, in which case the epoch would be understood as beginning on the first day of January next preceding the event commemorated—that is, on Jan. 1, 1600. I consider the other explanation the best. We cannot begin the epoch on the day of his execution, and it really makes no practical difference which view we take so long as we understand that the fact really is that Bruno was executed Feb. 17, E.S. 0. The following Jan. 1st would be Jan. 1, E.S. 1, being the first whole year after the execution, and when Feb. 17th arrived, the orator of the evening would say: "This is Feb. 17, E.S. 1; one year ago to-day Giordano Bruno was put to death by the church for his devotion to science." LONGMONT, COL., Sept. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Is there any such thing as Liberalism? If there is, what is it? Or, rather, what isn't it? Will you, friend Eugene, or some one of your many able contributors, please answer these questions? I ask them because I really desire the information for which they call.

Without any hope of reward, other than that of an approving conscience, I hav cheerfully given the thirty-two best years of my life to what I supposed to be the cause of Liberalism. Faithfully and earnestly hav I labored to add all I could to the sum of human advancement and human happiness. To this work, I hav sacrificed many fine opportunities to acquire wealth and to attain high official positions. I hav brought upon myself all the persecutions that ignorance, bigotry, and intolerance hav power to inflict. I hav helped grade the bed, bridge the chasms, and lay the track of the road on which the so-called Liberal trains are running. And now, in my life's autumn, when I would so gladly hear, from those for whose good I hav labored, the grateful words, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," I am told by the crowds of well dressed and respectable tourists, who now safely and pleasantly travel this road, and whose Liberalism it would be heresy to doubt, that I, and many of the other pioneers who hav worked with me, "hav no right to longer pose as Liberals, and no right to march under the banner of Liberalism." This they say to us, not because we are thought to be unsound on any of the planks of their platform; not that they doubt our valor on the battle-field, but simply because we hav dared to advance farther than they are prepared to go; because we hav dared to carry our Liberalism into all the departments of human life, instead of limiting it, as do they, to one single department, that of religion. They substantially inform us that the "U. M. L." on our banners and our badges does not mean, as we supposed it did, "Unlimited mental liberty;" that it means, "Unmitigated misleading lie;" that if we extend our Liberalism to the department of love and marriage, we cease to be Liberals and become Free-lovers—abominable creatures unfit to be tolerated in any civilized society; that if we extend it to the department of labor, or to any other political department, we, in like manner, cease to be Liberals and become Anarchists, Socialists, Communists, Nihilists, or some other dangerous kind of foreigners, fit only to be hanged.

Under these circumstances, I hav come to fear that there is no such thing as Liberalism. I hav come to fear that, for thirty-two years, I hav been following a phantom—just such a phantom as I followed in those far agone years when I was earnestly preaching the exceedingly hot hell-fire religion of the Methodist church South. And now, if there chance to be any such thing as Liberalism, I wish to know exactly how far it may be carried without changing into something else—into something very bad. JOHN R. KELSO.

LEXINGTON, KY. Sept. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: How thankful we ought to be that the people hav arisen in wisdom and might and demanded a reform of the government! In their presence how ignoble seems the usual din of politics. Patriots seem again at the helm of state, and hearts warmed by the love of justice hav ignored forever the silly delusions of religion. How beautiful is the figure of truth to the mind that craves such a sight. But storms are yet to be encountered, and some say that there will be always minds which will cling to superstition and arrest the course of progress. The only way to carry the mind entirely out of its present darkened sphere is to spare no expense in instructing the masses. So should the surplus revenue of the country be employed. The most enchanting places of resort, alone, will leave the dreary churches unfilled. A gift at every poor man's door will cause him to follow the giver. Do people crave excitement, let there be a holy rush toward the abodes of wretchedness. Make the movement fashionable and it will succeed. How criminal and vulgar is the attitude of the rich toward the poor! Pagan Rome gave a weekly allowance to the poor, but the Christian soon abandoned this practice. Monthly receptions, assembling all classes, with gifts to those who need them, would save thousands from vice and suicide. It seems that the government is to be made more responsible, doing the work of monopolists, but who is to govern the government? Not a people who liv in selfish luxury, but those who seek out the virtuous and talented poor, not to mock at, but to relieve and draw them from obscurity. Vigilance alone will save us. Daily reports of progress sent in every direction—daily instruction. Rousseau said, "The family was heathenish unless the center of a larger family. The happy heart livs for all."

So it seems that Dr. McGlynn's mind and motivs are undergoing vivisection, but the deep sympathies of his kind heart cannot be reached by criticism. Henry VIII. allowed no man to own more than two estates. The government ought to make every person a present of a piece of land or property sufficient to enable that individual to earn his living, otherwise no surprise should be expressed if he goes to ruin. Every city boasts of a rich man who buys up cheap lots, managing them in a most greedy and improper way. It is a vulgar and shameful outrage to hav property snatched in this way from the poor, leaving them in wretched dens to die in misery. The finger of scorn ought to be pointed at the monster who thus defrauds fellow-beings, rolling in senseless luxury at their expense. The possessions of these fiendish ingrates ought to be seized and put in the hands of known philanthropists to manage for the people at large. Is it right to sell a poor man's house to pay his taxes? What crimes, worse than heathenish, are perpetrated in the nineteenth century in the name of civilization. If laws hav failed, if religion has failed, if humanity has failed to arouse the sleeping, stupefied energies of benevolent men in behalf of the poor and oppressed, is it Anarchy to seize the reins of perverted and abused power, directing it without delay to some good end? Some wiseacres remark that Anarchists hav no creed, no principles, or plan of action. Perhaps that is not their business? Their business may be to keep alive the spirit of liberty. Without their warnings and terrible denunciations, very soon the name of freedom would be blotted out forever. A man is not without a creed who fixes his burning glance upon the titled or crowned villain and tyrant, and, pointing his finger in the same direction, exclaims, Thou art the man!—reminding him in the most fearless manner of his crimes, predicting his downfall, alluding, perhaps, with terse and pointed expressions, to the means which will be taken to deprive him of his ill-used and ill-gotten power. The words of Cromwell were, at times, mightier than his sword, and withered his antagonists to the bone; and when Charles the Bold drove burgomasters out of his council-hall on their knees, they would hav preferred, perhaps, a more severe and honorable punishment. MONTE VISTA, COL., Sept. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Ought Freethought lecturers to debate with bad Christians? is a proposition which involves a fundamental principle of Liberalism. If I am wrong in my view of this question, I am willing to be set right. It is not true that "our lecturers refuse to debate with him," Braden. Had you said that some of our lecturers thus refuse, that would be the fact. Let us be "truth seekers" upon every subject. The "testimonials" which you print in your issue of August 20th do not in the least change the principle for which I am contending, namely, that it is our duty to debate with Christian opponents put forward by any Christian community as representativs of Christianity, though they be as black in character as the clergy, in general, tell their congregations we "Infidels" are! If the Christians can endure a clerical debater with a soiled reputation as their representativ, that is their affair, and harmonizes exactly with their bad theology.

I had read the "testimonials" of Braden's bad character which you print, and more of the same sort; but they furnish no reason why I should refuse to debate with him. I expect other lecturers to decide the point for themselvs, as I always do in such matters for myself. But if we Freethinkers are ready to get back on to Christian ground, and refuse to debate with an individual not as moral as we are, it will be well to draw the line sharply. If it can be shown that any principle of Liberalism warrants such a course, I would like to hear what it is. In my view it is a one-sided, I-am-holier-than-thou element of nearly all religions which hav cursed the world. Religionists, generally, believe in "sheep and goats," saints and sinners; and it would not be "respectable" for a sheep to talk to a goat, nor for saints to condescend to hold controversy with sinners. The Liberal principle is that "there is good in all, none all good."

I submit right here, with the utmost kindness, that it is not in good taste, and not according to the spirit of Liberalism, as I understand it, for you to call Mr. Braden "a moral polecat," an "unfit man for any gentleman to associate with." We can never elevate mankind on that line. "Reply to thine enemies with gentleness," was a maxim of Zoroaster, and a more effectiv weapon a man never carried. That does not imply that we should show any mercy to errors of opinion entertained by an opponent. If Braden, or any other Christian, depends upon bluster and blackguardism, I need not imitate him. While he is abusing me I am riddling his Christian system. But if any lecturer does not wish to meet such a man, that is his own business. Nevertheless, when reasons are assigned for not debating with him, it is my province, as a member of that class, to examin the reasons. I do not want to see THE TRUTH SEEKER take a single false step.

If I hav no right to debate with a man because he has the reputation of being a liar, I fear we will hav few Christian opponents to meet. We would giv all such as Paul the cold shoulder, and throw all the Peters overboard. Again and again you hav given the proofs that Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage is a voluminous liar, yet Ingersoll has held a printed controversy with him, and would hav held a public oral debate if the Christian had had more courage. This same Talmage on one occasion, at least, publicly declaimed against the "slanders," as he called them, which were put in circulation about him.

Let me come a little closer home. You object to debate with Braden because of his bad character. Christians objected to debate with D. M. Bennett because of his (as they alleged) bad character. They could quote from the Index and R.-P. Journal to "prove" it. Many ministers are so good, in their own estimation, that they would not, on any account, deign to debate with a man who had been in the penitentiary. In my judgment, D. M. Bennett was a good man and a moral hero. But even some Freethinkers condemned Bennett, and to this day say that he was a bad man. A nobler, more honest man never wielded an editorial pen. But not so did the Christians think. In their view, his own confession revealed him as an obstinately wicked man. Now, suppose all the charges of those uncharitable Christians had been true, did it afford them just ground for declining to meet him in debate?

When Joseph Cook was challenged to debate with a Freethinker, he sent for answer that he could not "help advertise Infidelity," "nor stand upon the same platform with Mr. Bennett." When it was shown to the cunning Cook that Bennett would not be on the platform, then his excuse was that he would not hav anything to do with his Infidel opponents because they "publicly fraternized with a man just out of jail for violating righteous American laws intended to secure the purity of the mails."

Remember, the Freethinkers of the country were in high glee over the prospect of an oral debate between Robert G. Ingersoll and Joseph Cook; but Cook's heart failed him. Now, who is this man Cook? I could fill one whole issue of your paper with testimonials. D. M. Bennett, writing from India, says Cook is a "falsifier and maligner;" "pedler of dogmatic absurdities and barefaced falsehoods and slander;" "defends perjury and the worst villainy;" "spoken falsely of me;" "he has poured upon us all the vile epithets which he was able to command."

This is the character which D. M. Bennett gave Cook. Nevertheless, the Freethinkers were anxious that Ingersoll should associate with him in debate. I think the Freetbinkers were right; and I now want to see how many of them will turn their backs upon their own history. With this "malicious falsifier" Mr. Bennett was willing to associate in the way of public debate. He sent Cook a challenge, worded, "Meet me face to face and answer the statements I shall make." Cook's reply to Olcott was, "No honorable man can keep company of this kind."

Bennett, in his public address, said, "No matter how bad a man he can make you believe me to be, it will not prove Christianity to be true." This shows that Bennett had a clear perception of the distinction between persons and principles. If we lecturers are not justified in debating with bad Christians, like Talmage, Cook, and Braden (and Braden is the most brainy of the three, and a far better debater than either Cook or Talmage). where shall we find opponents? How few virtues may a Christian minister possess to enable him to "pass muster" and be just good enough to debate with an Infidel?

My good friends, this is a more lengthy letter than I hav written for the press in some time; but the principle treated upon is fundamental, and deserving of our closest thought. I wanted to show you that in taking the position you did you got off the Bennett onto the Cook platform. Let the Christians raise the question of character as an excuse for not debating. It is too flimsy and weak for a robust Infidel to employ. Let us debate with Cook in spite of his falsities, detraction, abuse, and lying. Talmage ditto. Braden ditto. It ought never to worry us that the ablest advocates of Christianity are so grossly immoral. Let us be truly Liberal and charitable, and allow for their weaknesses. We should bear in mind that they hav lived under Christian influence all their lives. They are the logical fruits of Christianity; and it is unreasonable in you to expect as much truth from them as if they had imbibed the higher ethics of Liberalism. I was sorry to see you refuse even to associate with them and lift them to a nobler life. As Liberal editors and lecturers we ought to reach down and assist them, disentangle them from the meshes of their superstition, and not treat them as if they are utterly beyond hope and help. Hosts of good men and women there are who believe in Christianity. They are good in spite of their system, which encourages lying, defends perjury, sanctions every form of vice and crime, and at last, in heaven, awards the "chief of sinners" the first prize for bad behavior and agility in jumping over Canada into Kingdom Come without a scratch on the soul, all washed wool-white in the red, red blood of the lamb.

Cook, Talmage, and Braden are logically true to their system. W. F. JAMIESON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Words and Deeds of Heroes.

The hero true will speak for you
When cowards' lips are sealed with fear;
He pleads your cause when comes the pause
That chills with doubt the eager ear.
He dares defend
The absent friend,
And he will bare
His heart to share
The threat'ning, poised, and pointed spear.

How brave his deeds, when fashion pleads
For gorgeous gilt and trappings gay!
He will not wear the feathers fair
For which he has no means to pay.
He dares to meet,
Upon the street,
In garments old
Men decked with gold,
Who dream not of the debtor's day.

How brave is he who fearlessly
In battles dangers dares to meet,
And share the blows of angry foes
In storms of flame and leaden sleet!
True courage high
Its flag will fly
In front of wrongs
When shouting throngs
Trample the right beneath their feet.

His word a bond, he looks beyond
The courts to keep him just and true;
And we can trace upon his face
The honest courage shining through.
Hail heroes just,
All men can trust,
Whose words and deeds
Like scattered seeds,
Spring up like roses wet with dew!

From the Editor.

DEAR CHILDREN AND FRIENDS: You will remember my letter to you from Onset, Mass., only a few weeks since. Little did I think then that so soon would you be made acquainted with the saddest sorrow, the hardest trial, of all my life.

On the 30th of August my dear mother, with whom I hav always lived, the sharer of all my joys and sorrows, my ready sympathizer in all troubles, my dearest, truest, best, and most trusted friend, was snatched from me in an instant by a terrible railway accident. The blow that dashed out her dear life, struck me—with such dreadful force that I am still dazed, bewildered, crushed. I cannot tell you how much I suffer, for you cannot know how much my mother was to me. They tell me she did not suffer—that in an instant of time all was over, and that this should be a consoling thought. But I was not ready—I was not willing to hav her leave me. We are never ready, I suppose, to say farewell to those we love. It seemed to me, at first, I could never take up life's work again. Still it is better that I should, and, with a sorrowing heart, through many blinding tears, I pick up life's threads once more, and, with tremhling fingers, try to weave them into shape and form. The many messages of tender sympathy and regard from hundreds of sympathetic friends giv me strength and courage to try to bear this heavy burden of grief and pain until the sun shall shine for me again. I thank all for kind words in this trying hour of bereavement, and while I shall miss the dear familiar face at every turn in the road of life—miss her at morning, noon, and night—at all times, all places, and in all seasons—I shall endeavor to imitate her virtues, to practice the precepts she instilled in my mind in early life, and do all the good that is in my power to do, in accordance with her wishes and desires. SUSAN H. WIXON.

Little Lela and the Sugar.

Lela was a little girl four years old, and I will say she was pretty—although I do not know about that, but I do know anybody would rather read about a pretty little girl. All I can remember about Lela's appearance is that she had a few stray locks of white hair dangling down over her round, red cheeks.

She had a sister, Maud, two years older than herself, but somehow Lela preferred the company of Lottie and John, two colored children who lived on the place. As soon as she got up and ate breakfast she would run off to "Aunt Medie's" to play with them, and would not return except for her meals and when company would come and her mother sent for her to come and show them how pretty and smart she was.

Eating was their favorit amusement, as is common with all children, so they would try to think of as many dishes as possible. The dish that they seemed to like best was a queer mixture of buttermilk and cornbread, stirred together until it was thick. This was original with Lottie, who was three years older than Lela.

Aunt Medie had a large tin cup which she allowed them to eat out of, but she only had one spoon, a large spoon without a handle, so they had to eat together, Lottie taking one mouthful and then Lela. John wanted some too, but Lela declared she would not eat out of the same spoon as he, and he had to choose between doing without and dipping his hands in. It is needless to state that he always chose the latter.

On Sunday Lottie's mother took her to "meetin'" to stay all day. This same day Lela's mother was in the kitchen making preserves. This same little girl kept bothering her mother, hanging to her dress, whimpering. and getting into something that she ought not, until she said sternly, but at the same time handing her two large lumps of sugar: "Take this, Lela, and do not bother me any more."

She took the sugar, perfectly delighted, and ran off to eat it, but suddenly she thought how nice it would be if Lottie were present to help her eat it. Lela was not a selfish child, so she stored the sugar away and did not taste it until her dear crony had come to enjoy it too. She ran to meet her and said, "Look, Lottie, what I hav got! I will giv you some." They walked together to Aunt Medie's house, then Lela laid both pieces of sugar on the old greasy trunk and said, "Don't eat it until I get back; I will get some milk and bread to eat with it."

I forgot to mention that Lottie was unfortunate, like most of little negro children, and had to carry her mother's baby in her arms wherever she went. She never had chance to rest only while it was asleep.

Now it began to cry fearfully for the sugar, and poor, tired Lottie broke off two or three little pinches and gave it. John, too, began to beg for some, and she repeated it till both lumps were considerably smaller. When little unsuspecting Lela came in with the milk and bread she did not notice this at all, and so no tears were shed. They were soon all eating what they considered such a delicious repast. The baby, of course, had to dabble its hands in also.

Every day, for a long time, Lela would get sugar from her mother and repeat the feast. Whenever she asked for the sugar her mother would always say that she'd hav to whip her, but never did, and always gave her whatever she wished.

One day the mother was surprised to notice that the little sugar-eater did not come upon her usual errand of begging sugar. The next day it was the same, and so on for a week. She was very much puzzled, but did not say anything about it to Lela.

Maud, who was jealous of Lela, as older children will be of younger ones, especially the baby, had already become suspicious as to the cause of this, and so she hid herself one day near the sugar barrel and watched.

That day, as usual, Lela said, in a low voice, to her friend:

"Lottie, if you will go with me and open the door, I will giv you some sugar." The little rogue was not tall enough to reach the door herself. But Lottie readily consented to open it, and they both walked in together. It was difficult for Lela to get her hands into the barrel, but she managed to do so, and filled her own pockets and hands and Lottie's pockets and one hand; the poor girl held the other hand tightly around the baby to keep it from falling.

Maud did not make her presence known until they were leaving; then she jumped up, ran to the door, and called:

"Mamma, mamma! come here; the rogue is found!"

The baby was frightened, and commenced crying; Lottie jumped out of the room and ran as fast as she could to her mother's welcome house.

The mother ran as quickly as possible to see them, and found Lela snuffling and crying, and emptying all her sugar out on the ground.

Of course, Lela's mamma thought her too pretty and sweet to be chastised, but she talked to her a little while and told her how badly she felt that her little girl had got to be a rogue. This only made Lela feel worse and cry more.

About then they both heard some terrible cries of agony coming from Aunt Medie's house. Lela was so distressed that she did not notice it, but her mother said, "Come on, dear, and we will see what is the matter with Lottie."

The poor child, weeping, followed close behind her mother, holding to her dress.

It was soon determined that Aunt Medie had come in from the field to get a drink of water and Lottie had told her all the trouble. The woman was displeased, so there she stood most unmercifully beating the screaming girl.

"Look," said Lela's mother; "by stealing sugar you hav not only done a very bad thing yourself but you hav caused Lottie to be whipped."

Lela turned her back and would not see Lottie's trouble. Her mother said, "Medie, I think you hav whipped her enough." And Aunt Medie released Lottie, and the two children promised not to steal any more sugar.

Poor martyred Lottie resumed her old task of minding the baby, and all three—Lottie, Lela, and the baby—spent the next half-hour in pitiful yells and real tears. John was so badly frightened that he joined his voice in also. DARLINA BELL.

Correspondence.

BURNETT, NEB., Aug. 15, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: W. S. Bell, of Chicago, was here and delivered a lecture on the evening of July 25th. The subject was "Liberty and Morality." We liv seven miles in the country, and when returning from the lecture the night was very dark and rainy, and our buggy ran off a grade and upset. In the accident mother had her collar-bone fractured, and is not well yet. Father said jokingly if they had been returning from church the accident never would hav occurred. We hav one of Mr. Jamieson's photographs. Your true friend,

ESTELLE WHITNEY.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 27, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is quite a while since I last wrote to you. I was very glad to think that you were so kind to publish my letter. I think my mother has changed since I hav been talking to her about THE TRUTH SEEKER. Another thing that put my ma against Christianity is that I went by invitation to play a piece of music, at the Sunday-school—mind you, and d you know what they did?—they stole my music! That's the way they rewarded me for playing for them. I will never go there again upon any consideration. I think I can learn more in the Children's Corner than by going to religious meetings. I don't know whether this let er is worthy of printing. I am afraid it will find its way to the waste-basket. I wish success to the Children's Corner and to the dear old TRUTH SEEKER. I will close now, for I think my letter is long enough now. Yours truly,

FLORENCE M. SMITH.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Sept. 7, 1887.

KIND MISS WIXON: Every time I read the Children's Corner. with its correspondence of many little friends of our grand mutual educator, I feel as if we were all one family, for familiar are all the thoughts expressed and the desire that lies in them—the search for truth and knowledge.

I hope it will remain so, and gain from day to day. No one must feel discouraged because the first letter wasn't printed, but try it again.

It is just the same as in life. If success won't follow the first time, it has to be tried over again.

And then, children, there is another thing I wish to tell you. Do all you can to expresss your ideas to other little friends of yours, boys or girls, whatever they may be and to whatever church they may belong. Tell them about our cause, and do not fear they may not care for you any more. Show courage to stand for your own faith, and show them that you are that far ahead that you think and learn for yourself, and after all they will respect you and follow you. Don't care if some one will make remarks about you that you are children of parents that are Freethinkers and Secularists, but show men by your own conduct that your parents hav taught you much more than all the ministers and preachers—that they hav taught you to be honest, and good, and kind-hearted children; to respect the aged and pity the poor. And never feel downhearted because our followers are not so numerous as their congregation of beggars. Did Christ ever beg? or ask for salary? or slander others? No, he didn't; but the clergymen do. They say we hav to liv, but Robert G Ingersoll says that every man making a living by religion is dishonest; and that's just the right name for it.

But my space is limited, and I hav to close. If some readers between fifteen and twenty-two should like to correspond with me, I will be glad to reply to their letters.

Hoping to see many letters of your little friends and helpers in print in the future, I remain, For truth and right,

FRED L. HOFFMAN.

DILLON, MON., March 10, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see so many letters from our girls and boys that I thought I would like to join the little truth seekers and write to you also. Although I am nine years old I hav never been to school yet, but mamma helps me with my studies at home. We had a glorious trip East this fall. In New York we met several of our great Liberals. but our first visit was to THE TRUTH SEEKER'S office. We met Miss Gardener several times, and we all like her ever so much. About a week beforc leaving New York Miss Gardener joined us, and we had a delightful drive through Central Park and Riverside. Two of our most pleasant and enjoyable evenings were spent at Colonel Ingersoll's. I think Miss Ingersoll is the dearest and prettiest lady I ever hav known, excepting my mamma. Mamma read to me in one of THE TRUTH SEEKERS how Colonel and Mrs. Ingersoll celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their marriage. We think exactly the same as the correspondent in regard to Colonel Ingersoll's family an home. I am sure it is one of the happiest places in the world. I should like to get a Secular song-book, so that if Mr. Putnam visits us again we can hav some music. Do you think I could get one at THE TRUTH SEEKER office?

Dear Miss Wixon. mamma and I hav read "The Story Hour" all through, and I think it is just splendid, especially about dear little Susie.

I am afraid my letter is getting too long, so, with best wishes to all my little Liberal friends, I remain, A little truth seeker,

PERCY B. CARRINGTON.

[Percy writes a lovely letter, and although it was mislaid for so long, it is as welcome and as readable as if just written. We hope he will write again. We think a Secular song-book can be obtained at the TRUTH SEEKER office.—ED. C. C.]

SAVANNAH, Sept. 2, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I write to beg a favor of you, dependent on your probably possessing a set of last year's TRUTH SEEKER. It was, I think, in September or October of 1886 that you published in the Corner Miss Darlina Bell's poem on "The Captiv Bird's Lament." That was our earthquake season here, and preoccupation is the only excuse I can plead for missing that production, which, when I read it at Overton recently, excited warm admiration. Unfortunately, I could not learn the number of the paper in which it appeared, and my present request is that you would do me the special favor of finding out what number it was, and letting me know.

I hav another correspondent, a South Carolinian of noble family (yes, that is the expression), ultra-conservativ and Christian (Freethought "vulgar" in his eyes), and I want to show him that a woman can (and, of all women, this young lady) write something with some "vim" to it. Very oddly, his style is just as pessimistic as that of Miss Bell. But he has not the excuse of living in a low, malarious tract of country, with mournful, desolate woods on each hand, and the isolation, comparatively speaking, of Darlina's home is a feature that the hurly-burly of Charleston should contrast with very sharply. So I take her pessimism for justifiable, his for morbid.

Overton consists of one house. It pleads, in palliation, that it has two stories—neither are ghost-stories. There are very few inhabitants in that section of Elbert county I traversed to call on Miss Bell—three miles of road to each house, more or less.

Please excuse the paper, and believe me, dear Miss Wixon,

Yours very respectfully,
HUGO B. PLATEN.

[The editor of the Corner is not well. When she recovers her health she will giv the information requested.]

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks." Price, $1.50. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Outcast. A deep, finely written Radical story. From the London edition. By Winwood Reade, author of Martyrdom of Man. 30 cents.

Book Notes.

The significance of the sentence of excommunication in the Roman Catholic church, will be explained in the Forum for October, by the Rev. Professor Huiginn, whose acquaintance with the canon law, says the editor of the Forum, givs him special fitness for the task.

"Christianity and the Slave Trade" is a 91-page pamphlet by "Saladin," editor of the London Secular Review. An idea of the nature of the work may be gained by imagining a condensation of all the well-known and other facts upon this subject, with the addition of such comments as only "Saladin" can make.

Professor Swarts, of Chicago, has, as he reports, been "led of God" to issue his "Spiritual Healing Formula and Text Book." The design of this pamphlet is evidently to acquaint the public with the fact that the author givs instructions in "Christian science" for a fee, which, we infer, is $12 50. He may be addressed at 161 LaSalle street, Chicago, Ill.

"The Popular Religions, and What Shall Be Instead," is a discourse delivered by Parker Pillsbury in Boston and sundry other places. In it the author touches upon the many imperfections of mankind, particularly the clergy, and renders passages of scripture in a way different from all former methods. It is good, healthy, elevating reading. Price 10 cents.

"The Savagery of Boyhood" is the title of an article by John Johnson, Jr., to be published in the Popular Science Monthly, for October, in which the author points out that, since a boy's development is an epitome of the development of the human race, he naturally passes through a stage when cruelty is so characteristic that a tender-hearted boy must be deemed diseased.

James H. West's little manual, "Uplifts of Heart and Will," published by Kerr & Co., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago, is a book designed to fill a want with those who, having abandoned the use of prayer, still desire to gratify the yearning to aspire. The author tells us that this yearning will never pass away. Therefore he has replaced the ordinary stereotyped prayer with a method of "uplooking" calculated to hav a pacifying influence upon the perturbed spirit. The price is fifty cents.

J. Luella Dowd Smith writes a book of poems called "Wind Flowers," and dedicates it to her mother, who, she says, "has found her rest amid the fadeless flowers of heaven." A certain number of the poems are devoted to each month of the year, and it may be said that those inscribed to any one particular month are as good as those inscribed to either of the others. Apart from this commendable impartiality, the merits of the work are somewhat obscure. Handsomely printed and bound; Charles H. Kerr & Co., Chicago. Price $1.

J. D. Shaw, editor and proprietor of the Independent Pulpit, Waco, Tex., has issued a second edition of his pamphlet, "The Bible—What Is It?" The inquiry, "What is the Bible?" is made necessary by the claim of theologians that the book is "the pure word of God, revealed by plenary divine inspiration, and therefore true in every book, chapter, verse, and word; containing neither falsehood nor error; infallible in all its precepts, promises, and predictions." In the present pamphlet, which he mails for 25 cents, Mr. Shaw shows by an examination of the Bible that these claims for it are exactly the reverse of the truth.

We hav received a Theosophical discourse in pamphlet form from Madras, India, by S. Sundaram Iyer, who is undoubtedly a Hindoo. The discourse is entitled, "Absolute Monism; or, Mind is Matter, and Matter is Mind." One of the author's statements is no less than this, "that Infinit Space is One Infinit Monad, and that this Monad is the Absolute Intelligent Potentio-Kinetic Motion"—which is a statement that we are not prepared to dispute. The whole discourse is of so metaphysical a character that many persons would not read it if they had it before them. It is published by the National Press, 100 Mount Road, Madras, India.

On the 31st day of last July the Rev. W. F. Black delivered a sermon on the lawn of the female college at Waco, Tex., in which he endeavored to convince the young ladies in his audience that Christ was the son of God without human paternity, and that he was, in fact, as divine as God himself. A week later the ex-Rev. J. D. Shaw hired the court-house at Waco, and delivered an answer to Mr. Black's sermon, which answer is now published in pamphlet form, price 20 cents. It routs the minister completely. Mr. Black is a believer in miracles, having himself, according to his own statement, performed the miraculous feat of converting twenty-eight members of an Ohio Liberal League which never numbered but thirteen persons on its membership roll.

In discussing the relations between Ireland and England, some time ago, THE TRUTH SEEKER hinted that with the continued existence of the present enslavement of the Irish people by the Catholic church, Home rule would mean practically Rome rule. The suggestion and the phrase were adopted by those who held the same view, and Home rule and Rome rule hav been the subject of numerous articles. Now Mr. Adolf Hepner, of Philadelphia, has published "A Plea for American Home Rule contra Rome Rule, on Account of the McGlynn Case." He regards the order from the pope, summoning Dr. McGlynn to Rome, as an attempt to supplant home rule in America with Rome rule, and givs good and conclusiv reasons why any person acting under papal orders is a "traitor to the independence of the country." Price 10 cents.

A Tin Prevaricator.

A number of professional men in Denison, Texas, hav recently purchased and caused to be placed on their office-doors, a contrivance invented for the purpose of making vicarious announcements, and which serves the purpose of heralding to the world bright and glittering falsehoods respecting the whereabouts of the owners of the offices. The contrivance referred to is circular in form, made of pasteboard bound with tin, and has a circular section of tin with a slot in it which overlies the pasteboard disc and which moves upon it and can be set at any angle, like the fire-alarm on a bull's-eye clock. Printed upon the pasteboard disc, in the form of radii of the circle, are a number of announcements which are concealed from view by the overlying section of tin, but any one of which can be seen through the slot by turning this wheel to the proper angle. Of these announcements the following is a sample:

"Gone to the country."
"Return this evening."
"At dinner."
"Return in ten minutes."
"Engaged."
"At court-house."
"Not at home."
"Return in half hour."
"Return in an hour."

These is also an indicator attached to the affair which is supposed to register the time at which the owner of the office went out, but which always indicates an entirely different time. In fact, the entire ambition of this wicked invention seems to be to prevaricate and asseverate falsehoods, and lie and stick to it. For instance, on the first of the month it will declare, with the calmest complacency, that the professional man has gone to the country, when, as a matter of fact, he is seated in the rear office with his chair tilted back and his feet upon the table, smoking a corn-cob pipe and listening to the subdued murmur of the bill collector as he impatiently tries the door and walks dejectedly away. It will announce without a blush that he will return in the evening, or in ten minutes, or in a half hour, when he is up in the Kimeshi mountains on a hunting expedition and does not get back for a week. It will proclaim to the world that he is at the court-house, when he is at the beer saloon; and will announce that he is at dinner, when he has no dinner to go to.

It will asseverate that he is at the bank, when his business never takes him near the bank; and declare that he is at church when he is actually at home in bed wrestling with the delerium tremens. It heralds forth the announcement that he is engaged, when his oldest friend knows that he never has an engagement; and states that he is at the post-office, when he is leaning against a counter in a long apartment up-town, waiting for a preparation of mint and other medicins which are being compounded for him and another invalid by the gentlemanly chemist in the diamond shirt-studs and white apron.

This office-door indicator is a glittering tin delusion and a circumambient snare, and he that is deceived thereby is not wise. It may fill a want long felt, but it does seem sad that our professional men cannot lie enough by word of mouth without calling upon machinery to assist them in their wholesale mendacity.—Gazetteer.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

THE people of Scotland are beginning to think of home rule for that country. The leaders of the movement hav appointed a committee to consider the question of bringing the matter before the English Parliament.

MONDAY, the 19th, was Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, 5648.

HENRY GEORGE was notified to appear as a juror the other day. He didn't appear, and was fined $100.

THE police arrested ninety-one persons for selling liquor in this city last Sunday in violation of the law.

THE yacht Volunteer won the trial races with the Mayflower, and will defend the America's cup against the Scotch cutter Thistle.

THE Rev. Frank H. Decker has resigned the pastorate of the East Congregational church in Brooklyn. Cause: Miss Ella Bates.

FRED MUNEHRATH, one of the murderers of the Rev. Geo. Haddock, the temperance advocate, was convicted of manslaughter at Sioux City, Iowa, on the 17th.

ABOUT 4 000 people attended the meeting in Union square to ratify the nomination of Henry George and other candidates on the state ticket of the United Labor party. Speeches were made by George, McGlynn, and others.

Two gold armlets from Cyprus of great value hav been stolen from the cases of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in Central Park. There is $700 worth of gold in these antique ornaments.

THE faith-cure lunatics are holding what they call an annual conference in a barn in the suburbs of Jersey City. A portion of the exercises is the relation of miraculous cures by those who imagin they hav experienced them. All ordinary prevaricators are thrown in the shade by the stupendous fabrications of these deluded fanatics.

QUEEN VICTORIA prorogued her Parliament last Friday, and the lord chancellor read a speech which she had written. The speech states that the queen agrees with the president of the United States to refer the fisheries business to a joint commission; that she trusts the remedies now being applied to the Irish difficulties will restore harmony; and that she thanks God for the continued etceteras.

THE Constitutional celebration in Philadelphia last week was a great affair. Militiamen were there from all parts of the country, as were bands of music, and great orators. President Cleveland made a speech, F. Marion Crawford contributed a very good national hymn, the relics of the last century were wheeled out in procession, and there was everything calculated to fire the popular heart. By some idiotic arrangement, Cardinal Gibbons, the prince of Catholic impostors, was given an opportunity to deliver a prayer. Otherwise the outward portion of the celebration was all that could be desired.

THIS news comes from Boston, September 16th: "All new England and New Brunswick was lighted up last night at 8.15 o'clock by the fall of an immense meteor. A despatch to the Journal to-night says it fell near McAdam Junction station in New Brunswick, close by the Maine state line. It is as large as a passenger car, weighs many hundred tons, and plunged ten feet into the earth with a terrific crash, shaking the country for miles around. Many people visited the spot to-day, but the great mass is yet too hot for near approach. It made an intensely bright light in its descent, and even in Boston it was so noticeable that it attracted general attention, and was by many people indoors mistaken for a flash of lightning."

Gems of Thought.

THERE can never be a full measure of prosperity, things never will be as they should be, so long as the soil is owned by a few, and so long as those who till it hav no ownership in it.—D. M. Bennett.

LISTLESSNESS, and boredness, and nothing-to-do-ness, are the best of soils for the breeding of the worms that never stop gnawing.—Geo. Macdonald.

AFTER all, a bonny sight is always a bonny sight when the cost of it does not come out of one's own pocket.—It is ill work plucking nettles with bare hands.—The thing was a fact, and facts, when once established, hav to be taken for granted.—Spiritual vanity is as true a fact in human as personal pride, and people like to feel that they hav guardian angels and patron saints who giv themselvs a host of trouble in protecting from physical dangers, and listening to the prayers of "miserable sinners" of no more value to the universe than so many tadpoles in the water, or so many harvest mice among the corn.—No matter how much intellect a man may hav, he is nothing but a lump of plastic clay when an astute woman undertakes to mold him.—When men are in love, there is no miracle that may not be expected, no transformation that may not be wrought.—A woman can do better for herself and the world than by incarcerating herself, and renouncing all practical usefulness. A mother is of more value than a nun.—Mrs. E. Lynn Linton.

JACOB WEEPETH.

And Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice, and wept.—Gen. xxix, 11.

IT may be confidently asserted that no lasting sect could hav been formed upon the basis of the few truths taught by Jesus himself, and the fact that he became the founder of a new religion must be attributed as much to the state of Judea at the time as to his personal influence. That the influence of Socrates was not small in his own lifetime might be inferred from the bitterness of the prosecution alone, even if Plato had not remained to attest the abiding impress he left upon an intellect by the side of which those of Peter, James, and John are but as little children to a full-grown athlete.—Amberley.

It's hardly in a body's pow'r
To keep at times frae being sour,
To see how things are shar'd;
How best o' chiels are whiles in want,
While coofs on countless thousands rant,
An' ken na how to wair't;
But, Davie, lad, ne'er fash your head,
Tho' we hae little gear,
We're fit to win our daily bread,
As lang's we're hale and fier. —Burns.

FIRST, men sacrifice and pray in order to escape sickness and death; or if they are a little more advanced, that they may not be punished in a future state. Secondly, they desire to win the esteem and affections of the gods; they are ambitious of obtaining a heavenly reparation. And lastly, prayer and praise, disciplin and self-denial, become habits, and giv pleasure to the mind. The rough hair shirt, the hard bed, the cold cell, the meager food, the long vigil, the midnight prayer, are delights to the mind that is inured to suffer; and as other men rejoice that they hav found something which can yield them pleasure, so the ascetic rejoices that he has found something which can yield him pain.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

O DEATH, death, death, thou ever-floating cloud,
There are enough unhappy on this earth;
Pass by the happy souls, that love to liv;
I pray thee, pass before my light of life,
And shadow all my soul, that I may die.
Thou weighest heavy on the heart within,
Weigh heavy on my eyelids: let me die.
—Tennyson.

OH, how I shall admire, how laugh, how exult, when I behold so many proud monarchs, so many fancied gods, groaning in the lowest abyss of darkness! So many magistrates, who persecuted the name of Christ, melting in fiercer flames than they kindled against the Christians.—Tertullian.

TERTULLIAN was a man of strength and violent passions—he loved and hated with intensity. He possessed considerable culture, and was well-versed in Roman law, in ancient philosophy, history, and poetry. He was not deficient in philosophical power, but he was narrow, bigoted, and uncharitable. He shows no sympathy with Greek speculation, or with the freedom of human thought; and he shows little sympathy with the joys and pleasures of man, being strongly inclined to asceticism.—Chambers's Encyclopedia.

THEN might ye see
Cowls, hoods, and habits, with their wearers, tost
And fluttered into rags; then relics, beads,
Indulgences, dispenses, pardons, bulls,
The sport of winds: all there, upwhirled aloft,
Fly o'er the backside of the world far off,
Into a limbo of fools, to few unknown
Long after, now unpeopled, and untrod.
—Milton's Paradise Lost.

THE essence of religion is the strong and earnest direction of the emotions and desires toward an ideal object, recognized as of the highest excellence.—J. S. Mill.

Odds and Ends.

TEACHER: "Can anyone help Johnny to finish the Fourth Commandment?" Small boy: "Yeth'm. And the Lord blethed the Thaturday and made it a holiday."

PROFESSOR: "Thomas, how many toed is a toad?" Thomas (interrogativly, to gain time): "Tree-toad?" "No, four. Its posterior feet contain five. You hav evidently neglected your lesson, sir."

TOMMY'S mother has a terrible time teaching him to remember to say, "If you please." As thus: Tommy: "Mamma, pass me the butter." Mamma: "If what, Tommy?" Tommy: "If you kin reach it."

PAT: "Moike, th' tells me as yez hav quit worrukin' in the powder factory. Was it too dangerous!" Mike: "Dangerous? Well, be gob! I belave if I had worruked there till now I'd a b'en dead a year ago."

"IT is my painful duty, madam," he said, "to inform you that lightning has just struck your husband." "Did it strike him more than once?" "No, ma'am." "Thank heaven it's no worse!" she said with a sigh of relief. "If lightning only struck John once he'll pull through."

A COUNTRY clergyman was boasting of having been educated at two colleges. "You remind me," said an aged divine, "of an instance I know of a calf that sucked two cows." "What was the consequence?" said a third person. "Why, sir," replied the old gentleman very gravely, "the consequence was that he was a very great calf!"

"WHEN I was twenty-one years of age," he said, "I thought that if I wasn't rich at thirty I would be too old to enjoy wealth." "How old are you now?" "Seventy." "And rich, of course?" "No, I'm a poor man yet, but I've got a scheme in view that will make me as rich as mud before I'm eighty, and then I propose to take things easy and enjoy life."

SHE was a widow, and, perhaps, a little sensitiv on that account. When she answered a summons the other day she found a good-looking, ministerial chap standing at the door. "Good-day," he began, "I represent a loan association—" "So do I," she responded shortly, "and I mean to stay alone; good-day, sir." He hasn't thought it out yet to his entire satisfaction.

"MY boy," said an aged tailor to his son, a young man who was about to go West to make his fortune, "I hav given you a good start along the seam of life. It depends on you to keep at it with a strong and even stitch. And don't forget to fasten off your work with a knot at the end of the seam." That youth never forgot his father's admonition. He was hanged in Arizona three years afterwards for stealing a horse.

JUDGE: "Of course, you hav an excuse ready?" Prisoner: "I hav, your honor. I was full, but it was for medical purposes. Whisky is good for snake bites." Judge: "Were you bitten by a snake?" Prisoner: "No; but, your honor, 'an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.'" Judge: "I see, I see. But you should hav confined yourself to the ounce. I fine you $10 for prescribing medicin without a diploma."

"TALK about mean men," said Ex-Alderman Seagrist, the sage of Bloomingdale, "why, there's that Bill Johnson, he's the meanest man I ever heard on. Bill was a constable here. Why, don't you think, he had an execution against me for a little matter of groceries, and he came out and levied on my old mother's ducks, and wanted me to drive 'em up and catch 'em for him, and I told him to catch 'em himself; and so he chased 'em round and round the house, and every time he'd catch a duck he'd sit down and wring its head off and charge mileage!"

IT may or may not be new, but here it is as related by a Texas minister. Through the persuasion of a reliable friend, whose word he trusted, Deacon Goodman bought a handsome poll-parrot for his son. The deacon purchased Polly only after being doubly assured that she had been reared in a godly family. That night the good deacon bowed his head in family prayers, and said: "O Lord, bless thy humbly servant, and his wife, and children, and maid servant, and—" Here the deacon, pausing for a moment, was startled by a voice which shrilly croaked: "Well, where in —— do I come in?"

A PRINTER'S PROPOSAL.

Dear maiden * of all the race,
Before thy iii I bow;
Please do not hide thy pretty face,
But here my ? now.
The . has come, my own,
When I must take a mate,
And as I o .hee alone,
We'd better - 8.
The maid looked ttt at the bore,
And hit him on the nose;
Then = upon the floor
He lay quite , tose.

A MINISTER WHO MEANS BUSINESS.

While the minister was preaching last Sunday in a Dakota town which is having a boom, a man in the congregation, who was sitting near a window, arose and said:

"I beg your pardon, elder, but just one word."

"Go on, deacon."

"There are a couple of big, fat men who look as if they might be capitalists, outside here looking at the churchyard."

"What's that?"

"Couple o' fat-looking capitalists hanging over the fence and acting 'sif they wanted to buy the lots the church is on."

"Is that so?" replied the minister, beginning to get excited, and stepping up on the altar rail to see out. "You go right out and talk to them, brother, go right out and 'tend to the matter. Giv them an option on it, and if they've got the money to buy this real estate we'll snake this church off into the street so quick it will make their heads swim."

Notes and Clippings.

ONE of the attractions of Sacramento, Cal., is a mummy show—the remains of the people of the Aztec race, it is supposed.

THE Pennsylvania Railroad Company sold 650,000 excursion tickets between New York and Philadelphia during the three days' celebration there of the adoption of the Constitution.

THE Catholics of Malden, Mass., hav leased a public school building at a nominal rent for parochial purposes. The state thus practically helps to support a denominational school.

THE state of Delaware still retains the pillory and whipping-post. Last Saturday eleven criminals were publicly whipped at Wilmington, and two were given an hour each in the pillory.

THE first real estate investment made in Portland, Or., by a Chinese was the recent purchase of a building lot by Seid Back for $9,000. Not poverty, but an impression that they cannot legally hold real estate, has kept the Chinese there from making similar investments. Seid Back's purchase is counted a good bargain.

THE wife of the Rev. Peter Eirich, of Hoboken, N. J., found living with her husband intolerable because he wanted her to pay all the household expenses, with a view to which he married her. She therefore went to liv with her parents, in Brooklyn, and he sued for a divorce on the ground of abandonment. She declined to contest the matter, and on the 23d ult. the divorce was granted. Mrs. Eirich says that the decision of the court is satisfactory in the extreme.

Two young men of Garden Plain, Kan., fought with slungshots in church to determin which should escort a young woman to her home. One of them had his skull fractured and he died. The minister and his wife suffered slight injuries.

BROOKLYN has at present but two pastors under a cloud. One of them, the Rev. Mr. Decker, has been investigated and his resignation accepted. The other, the Rev. Mr. Millen, will be investigated Oct. 4th, pending which he will continue to preach.

THE more the Glazebrook scandal at Middletown, Conn., is investigated, the more apparent it becomes that the Rev. Mr. Glazebrook is guilty. His ministerial conduct toward the woman involved was witnessed by several persons. He is a married man.

WHEN the religious editor, says the Jewish Times, is afflicted with intellectual sterility there are three subjects he falls back upon, namely, a tirade against Mammon, a diatribe against modern skepticism, and a bilious effort to annihilate the English language in discussing some subject about which he knows nothing.

THE following labor note is from the Union Printer: "For some time past there has been troub.e in the office of the Catholic Ex miner, of Brooklyn, on account of the non-payment of wages to the compositors. and on Monday the men struck for wages two weeks overdue. Some time since the paper changed hands, and owing to bad management its prosperity has been declining. As yet the strikers hav not been paid, and under the circumstances the proprietor is unable to secure men to take their places. Unless a settlement is made this week the Examiner will not make its appearance as usual."

THE New York legislature at its last session voted to allow the appointment of inspectors of election for the party that supported Henry George for mayor last fall. Now that the party is divided against itself both factions are asking leave to appoint the inspectors from their own ranks. The matter must be settled soon, as election is but a few weeks away.

TOWNS along the Mexican border are in favor of an international dollar—good for its face in both countries. As it stands now, a man can cross over to Mexico, put down a Mexican dolla for a drink, and get a United States dollar for change. The he can come back, put down the United States dollar for a drink, and get a Mexican dollar for change. And then he can repeat. No financial situation could be more demoralizing, in a small way.

DURING the meeting of the National League in Cork last week a crowd, which had gathered outside the building in which the meeting was held, made an attack upon the rooms of the Protestant Young Men's Association. The police charged the crowd, but the mob continually gained fresh accessions and resisted, and a fight occurred, the police using their batons and the crowd using stones. The conflict continued until Mr. Tanner, M. P., who was present at the League meeting, came out and implored the crowd to desist. After this the police made another charge and dispersed the crowd. Three valuable panes of glass were broken in a warehouse. Several constables were cut with stones.

A MAN named Vanderpoole has been palming off literary productions upon the editor of the Cosmopolitan Magazine as unpublished manuscripts of George Sand. The editor finally found him out, and lodged him in jail for obtaining money under false pretenses. The defense is that Vanderpoole is subject to psychologic influences, and wrote the articles at the dictation of George Sand's spirit.

WILLIAM O'BRIEN, editor of United Ireland, was found guilty of inciting a riot at several meetings in Ireland recently, the police being attacked and a number of persons killed. O'Brien was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, but was released under bail, pending appeal. Mr. O'Brien's alleged offense is practically the same as that charged against the Haymarket orators. A slight difference in the penalty of conviction will be observed.

IN a recent issue of the Journal of United Labor Mr. Powderly relates an incident that occurred on a railroad train. Mr. Powderly, in talking with a group of six men, took a paper from his pocket and read a paragraph beginning, "We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal," etc. One of the group exclaimed: "The man who wrote that was a d—d agitator. It is just such stuff as that that is turning the heads of the honest laboring men of the country." Only one of the six knew what the paragraph was, and they were all employers of labor, and one of them was a director of a national bank.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Secret of the East," etc.

II.—Mental Maxims.

CHAPTER X.—FREETHOUGHT.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

The Brahmans have a legend that the first children of man ascended Mount Gunganoor, to visit the castle of Indra and inquire into the secret of their origin. Speculations on the source of life, on the mystery of creation, the cause of good and evil, and similar problems which we might sum up under the name of religious inquiries, seem, indeed, to have occupied the attention of our ancestors at a very early period. An irrepressible instinct appears to prompt the free discussion of such questions, and in a normal state of social relations the attempt to suppress that instinct would have appeared as preposterous as the attempt to enforce silence upon the inquirers into the problems of health or astronomy. A thousand years before the birth of Buddha, the Sakyas, or ethic philosophers, of northern Hindostan, visited the mountain-passes of Himalaya to converse with travelers and seek information on the religious customs and traditions of foreign nations. The book of Job, probably the oldest literary product of the Semitic nations, records a series of free and often, indeed, absolutely agnostic discussions of ethical and cosmological problems.

"Canst thou by searching find out God?" says Zophar. "It is as high as heaven: what canst thou do? It is deeper than hell: what canst thou know?"

"Is it good unto thee that thou shouldst oppress the work of thy own hand?" Job asks his creator; "thine hands have made me; why dost thou destroy me? Thou huntest me like a fierce lion. Wherefore, then, hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? Oh, that I had given up the ghost and no eye had seen me! I should have been as though I had not been; I should have been carried from the womb to the grave. Are not my days few? Cease, then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little, before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death."

And again: "Man dieth and wasteth away; man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? As the waters fail from the sea and the flood dryeth up: so man lieth down and riseth not; till the heavens be no more he shall not awake nor be raised out of his sleep." . . . "If a man die, shall he live again?" "Wherefore is light given unto them that are in misery, and life unto the bitter in soul? who long for death, but it cometh not; who rejoice exceedingly and are glad when they can find the grave?"

Or Elihu's interpellation: "Look up to heaven and see the clouds which are higher than thou: If thou sinnest, what doest thou against him? If thou be righteous, what givest thou to him, or what can he receive of thine hand?"

Could a committee of modern skeptics and philosophers discuss the problems of existence with greater freedom?

For a series of centuries the monkish custodians of the literary treasures of Greece and Rome expurgated the writings of the bolder Freethinkers, and for the sake of its mere parchment destroyed more than one work that would have been worth whole libraries of their own lucubrations; yet even the scant relics of pagan literature furnish abundant proofs of the ethical and metaphysical liberty which the philosophers of the Mediterranean nations enjoyed for nearly a thousand years. The marvelous development of Grecian civilization in art, science, politics, literature, and general prosperity coincided with a period of almost unlimited religious freedom. Speculations on the origin of religious myths were propounded with an impunity which our latter-day Freethinkers have still cause to envy. The possibility of all definite knowledge of the attributes of the deity was boldly denied two thousand years before the birth of Emmanuel Kant. The Freethinker Diagoras traveled from city to city, propagating his system of Agnosticism with a publicity which seems to imply a degree of tolerance never yet re-attained in the progress of the most intellectual modern nations. The skeptic Pyrrho ridiculed the absurdity of all our modern Secularists would include under the name of other-worldliness. A Roman actor was applauded with cheers and laughter for quoting a passage to the effect that "if the gods exist, they seem to conduct their administration on the principle of strict neutrality in the affairs of mankind!"

Democritus, Euhemerus, Anaxagoras, Epicurus, Aristotle, Libanius, Pliny, Lucretius, and the latter Pythagoreans, almost entirely ignored the doctrines of Polytheism, which, indeed, never assumed an aggressive form, the attempted suppression of the Christian dogmatists being an only apparent exception, dictated by motives of political apprehensions, rather than by religious zeal; for at the very time when the followers of the life-hating Galilean were persecuted as "enemies of mankind," a large number of other oriental religions enjoyed privileges bordering on license. The Grecian colonists of Asia Minor never interfered with the religious customs of their new neighbors. They studied and discussed them as they would study the curiosities of other social phenomena; and a purely naturalistic system of education would undoubtedly lead to analogous results. Intelligent children often evince a remarkable tact in avoiding certain topics of conversation, such as allusions to personal or national defects, scandals, the arcana of sexual relations, private affairs, etc., and the experience of after years may confirm such habits of discretion; but no conceivable motive but deference to an arbitrary precept could dictate a similar reticence in the discussion of purely metaphysical topics, or of dogmas which by their very pretense to a mission of extreme importance should justify an extreme frankness in debating the basis of their claims.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

Religious liberty guarantees every other kind of freedom, as every form of slavery walks in the train of priestly despotism. In America religious emancipation led the way to the Declaration of Independence, and still continues to make this continent the chosen home of thousands of Liberals whom the material prosperity of the New World would have failed to attract. It is possible that a policy of intolerance would have averted or postponed the fate of the Moorish empire, which was ultimately overthrown by the fanatics of a creed which the followers of a more rational faith had permitted to survive in their midst; yet it is not less certain that for nearly five hundred years religious tolerance made the realm of the Spanish caliphs the one bright Goshen in a world of intellectual darkness. In northern Europe the history of civilization begins only with the triumph of Rationalism. Protestantism, in that wider sense which made the revolt of the Germanic nations an insurrection against the powers of superstition, has laid the foundation of national prosperity in Great Britain, in the Netherlands, and in the rising empire of northern Germany. The real founder of that empire was at once the greatest statesman and the boldest Freethinker of the last fourteen centuries. His capital became a city of refuge for the philosophers of Christian Europe. The eastern provinces of his kingdom were colonized by refugees from the tyranny of clerical autocrats. His absolute tolerance protected even the Jesuits, expelled by the Catholic rulers of France and Spain. During the reign of that crowned philosopher the religious and political dissenters of Prussia expressed their views with a freedom which in semi-republican England would have involved them in a maze of endless lawsuits. Among the fruits of that freedom were products of science and philosophy which have made that period the classic age of German literature. "Before the appearance of Kant's 'Critique of Pure Reason,'" says Schopenhauer, "the works of duly installed government professors of philosophy were mostly medleys of sophisms, pretending to reconcile science and dogma, or reason and despotism. Here, at last, a state university could boast of a man who lived at once by and for the service of Truth—a phenomenon made possible only by the circumstance that, for the first time since the days of the great Aurelius and the greater Julian, a Freethinker had mounted the throne of an indepenent monarchy."

The protection of Freethought is likewise the best safeguard against that virus of hypocrisy that has undermined the moral health of so many modern nations.

"What an incalculable advantage to a nation as well as to its ruler," says a modern philosopher, "to know that the pillars of state are founded on the eternal verities, on natural science, logic, and arithmetic, instead of casuistry and immaculate conceptions!"

The consciousness of that advantage has more than once upheld the birthland of Protestantism in its struggles against the allied powers of despotism, and should uphold our republic in the inevitable struggle against the allied despots of the twentieth century.

C.—PERVERSION.

The experience of the last sixteen centuries has made priestcraft almost a synonym of intolerance; and yet it would be a mistake to suppose that the interests of Freethought are incompatible with the survival of any system of supernatural religion. The myths of polytheism were for ages accepted as the basis of a creed enjoying all the prerogatives and emoluments of an established religion, but the priests of that religion had no need of protecting their prestige by the butchery of heretics. With all their absurdities, the rites of their creed were essentially a worship of Nature, naturally attractive to all lovers of earth and life, and by their harmlessness conciliating the favor of philosophers who might have studied the baneful tendencies of a different creed—a creed which could propagate its dogmas only by an unremitting war against the natural instincts of the human race, and by constant intrigues against the protests of human reason. "The Nature worshiping Greeks repeated the harmless myths and practiced the merry rites of their creed for centuries without troubling themselves about the myths and rites of their neighbors. Their superstition differed from that of the church as the inspired love of Nature differs from the ecstatic fury of her enemies, as the day-dream of a happy child differs from the fever-dream of a gloomy fanatic. 'Procul Profani!' was the cry of the Eleusinian priests. They had more followers than they wanted. Their joy-loving creed could dispense with autos-da fé. The Hebrews, in stress of famine, conquered a little strip of territory between Arabia and the Syrian desert, and then tried their best to live in peace with heaven and earth, and their sects contented themselves with metaphorical rib-roastings. The Saracens spread their conquests from Spain to the Ganges, but their wars had a physical, rather than metaphysical, purpose. They needed land, and made a better use of it than the former occupants. They contented themselves with assessing dissenters, and did not deem it necessary to assassinate them. But the Galilean pessimists could not afford to tolerate an unconverted neighbor. To the enemies of Nature the happiness of an earth-loving, garden-planting, and science-promoting nation was an intolerable offense: reason had to be sacrificed to faith, health and happiness to the cross, and earth to heaven" (The Secret of the East, p. 62).

And even in the modified form of Protestant Christianity, that creed remains the rancorous enemy of Freethought. The doctrine of the Galilean Buddhist is essentially a doctrine of pessimism, of other-worldliness and Nature-hating renunciation of human reason and earthly prosperity, and therefore wholly irreconcilable with the promotion of progressive science and secular happiness. Philosophers have for centuries assembled their scholars undisturbed by the songs and dances of pagan festivals; the exponents of secular science have enjoyed the good-will of health-loving Hebrews and Mohammedans, and will find a modus vivendi with the Spiritualists and Theosophists of the future; but Secularism, "the Science of Happiness on Earth," can never hope to conciliate the dogmatists of a creed that denies the value of life itself, and wages war against Nature as well as against the claims of natural science.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

Wherever Reason surrenders to Dogma, the exponents of that dogma will claim unreasonable prerogatives. Irresponsible dogmatists have never failed to pursue the interests of their creed at the expense of the interests of mankind. The lessons of Science could not be reconciled with the doctrines of Anti-naturalism, and in the interest of that doctrine the spiritual taskmasters of medieval Europe suppressed Science by methods that have retarded the progress of mankind for thirteen hundred years. The suppression of Freethought enabled the enemies of Nature to complete their triumph by the suppression of social and political liberty; and for ages the church has been the faithful ally of Despotism. The priest-ridden rulers of the expiring Roman empire and the priest-ridden rabble of the Roman provinces assisted in the persecution of Freethought, and that crime against reason was avenged by the development of a system of spiritual tyranny which at last forced even princes to kiss the dust of Canossa and degraded the lot of peasants beneath that of savages and wild beasts. The war against natural science avenged itself in the neglect of agriculture, and the enormous spread of deserts, which the priests of the Galilean miracle-monger proposed to reclaim by prayer-meetings. The surrender of Freethought to faith sealed the fate of millions of heretics and "sorcerers," who expiated an imaginary crime in the agonies of the stake. Not the abrogation of civil rights, not the intimidation of princes and commoners, but the eradication of Freethought, enabled the priests of an unnatural creed to enforce their hideous superstitions upon the prisoners of the numberless monasteries which for a series of centuries combined all the conditions for the systematic suppression of moral, intellectual, and personal freedom.

"I am not come to bring peace but the sword," said the ingenuous founder of a creed which could not fail to produce an irrepressible conflict between the delusions of its doctrines and the inspirations of nature and science—and, of course, also between the would be followers of its own preposterous precepts—and neither the lust of conquest nor the jealousy of rival nations has ever stained this earth with the torrents of blood shed by the bigots of that creed after its triumph over the protests of Freethought. The fatuous attempt to crush out dissent by substituting a roll of parchment for the book of Nature avenged itself by murderous wars about the interpretation of those same parchments. The dogmatists who had tried to perpetuate their power by the murder of modest rationalists, were assailed by hordes of their own irrationalists, raging about the ceremonial details of the wafer-rite and the immersion rite

The bigots who had refused to heed the pleadings of Bruno, and Campanella, were forced to acknowledge the battle-axe logic of the Hussites.

E.—REFORM.

Truth that prevails against error also prevails against half truths, and the recognition of just claims cannot be furthered by unjust concessions. Uncompromising right is mightiest, and Freethinkers would have served their cause more effectually if they had contended, not for the favor to enjoy a privilege, but the right to fulfil a duty. The ministry of reason imposes obligations to posterity, and to the memory of its bygone martyrs, as well as to our help-needing contemporaries; and the defense of its rights is a truer religion than submission to the yoke of a mind-enslaving dogma. The Rishis, or sainted hermits of Brahmanism, used to devote themselves to the service of a forest temple, and guard its sanctuary against vermin and reptiles; and the believers in a personal God cannot devote their lives to a nobler task than by guarding his temples against the serpent of priestly despotism.

The disciples of Secularism should learn to value the right of Freethought as the palladium of their faith, as the basis of all other blessings—moral and material, as well as intellectual. They should learn to revere the memory of the martyrs of their faith, and recognize the importance of their services to the cause of modern civilization and its sacred principles; but they should also learn to recognize the magnitude of the remaining task. It is no trifle that the prevalent system of ethics and the temporal and eternal hopes of millions of our brethren are still based on a lie. It is no trifle that the health and happiness of millions of our fellow-men are still sacrificed on the altar of that untruth by the suppression of public recreations on the only day when a large plurality of our working-men find their only chance of leisure. It is no trifle that honest men are still branded as "Infidels," "renegades," and "scoffers," for refusing to kneel in the temple of a nature-hating fanatic. The struggle against the spirits of darkness is by no means yet decided in Italy, where the arch-hierarch is spinning restless intrigues to regain the power which for ages made Europe a Gehenna of misery and despotism. Nor in Spain, where a swarm of clerical vampires is still sucking the life-blood of an impoverished nation. Nor in Austria and southern Germany, where the alliance of church and state remains a constant menace to the scant liberties of the people.

Freethinkers need not underrate the influence of individual efforts to recognize the superior advantage of organized coöperation, so urgently needed for the reform of Sabbath laws, of press laws, and the educational system of the numerous colleges still intrusted to the control of the Jesuitical enemies of science. The strength-in-union principle should encourage the oft-debated projects for the establishment of Freethought colleges (as well as Freethought communities); but still more decisive results could be hoped from that union of the powers of knowledge and of moral courage which has never yet failed to insure the triumph of social reforms. We should cease to plead for favors where we can claim an indisputable right. We should cease to admit the right of mental prostitutes to enforce the penalties of social ostracism against the champions of science; but we, in our turn, should deserve the prestige of that championship by scorning the expedients of the moral cowardice which strains at gnats and connives at beams, attacking superstition in the harmless absurdities of its ceremonial institutions, and sparing the ruinous dogmas that have drenched the face of earth with the blood of her noblest children, and turned vast areas of garden-lands into hopeless deserts. The skeptics who scoff at the inconsistencies of a poor clergyman who tries in vain to reconcile the instincts of his better nature with the demands of an anti-natural creed, should themselves be consistent enough to repudiate the worship of the fatal founder of that creed, and not let the hoary age of the Galilean doctrine palliate the tendencies of its life blighting delusions.

Bible Geology and Evolution.

Geology as a science was entirely unknown to the ancient writers of the Bible. Yet it was impossible for them to giv an account of the alleged origin of the world and living things without encroaching upon the ground of geology.

God having made man five days after he had formed the earth, and these days having been expressly defined as comprising "evening and the morning," it was easy to calculate from the time of the birth of Adam down, say to the Babylonish captivity, from thence to the alleged birth of Christ, and from thence again to the present day—to fix a definit date to the Mosaic account of the creation.

As soon, however, as men of science made known to the world the fact that vast epochs must hav elapsed, which are not even mentioned in the Mosaic story, to account for the numerous changes in the formations which compose the earth's crust, the theologians did all they could to read into the text a meaning which the writers obviously never intended. By this process "evening and morning" were rendered "vast periods of time," although when they came to the seventh day, upon which the writers of Genesis declared that God "rested" from his labor and was "refreshed," the theologians were content to interpret this particular day as one of ordinary duration.

Playing fast and loose in this way with Bible declarations, the theologians hoped somehow to explain away all difficulties.

Even this method of treatment, however, broke down at last, and now the learned among the clergy gravely assure us that "the Bible does not pretend to teach science."

Here is an admission indeed! The Bible is not an authority on science. But if this is so, is it an authority on ancient history? Or is its morality only to be regarded as divine? Hereafter we shall hav to examin its statements in respect to these points; for the present, however, let us consider what are its teachings in relation to geological phenomena. In the first place, it represents that when deity first created the earth, it was created much as we find it to-day; that grass, herbs, and fruit-trees grew upon it immediately, and this despite the fact that the sun had not yet been created to shed his radiance upon it, and, in coöperation with the water, to call the grass and trees into being.

We hav seen that men of science to day regard the earth as an offshoot from the sun, and Sir Wm. Thompson goes as far as declaring that it would hav taken at least several millions of years to cool down sufficiently to allow any form of life to exist upon it at all. The Bible writers do not regard trees, or vegetation, in the light of lowly forms of life. They knew nothing of life apart from man and the lower animals, the birds of the air and the fishes of the sea.

And in stating the order of the creation of these, the Biblical writers arranged them in a fashion altogether out of harmony with the known facts of modern science. Nor is this all; to complete their long list of errors, they allowed only a day or two to intervene between the creation of the very lowliest forms of life and the highest.

A profound study of nature has in a variety of ways demonstrated the absurdity of all this. Indeed, it is no mere figure of speech to say that all the physical sciences combine to proclaim the great doctrin of evolution—or, as the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher felicitously described it in his last lecture in England, all the physical sciences combine to teach the doctrin of "gradualism, or the gradual unfolding of natural phenomena from the lowest to the highest."

Geology teaches that when the earth had become solid, the outer crust was converted by reason of the intense heat of the interior of the earth into hard, granit-like rock, which was subject to periodical upheavals, and which no doubt produced the inequalities of the surface which characterize it. This first formation was called by geologists the Plutonic formation (from Pluto, monarch of hell), on account of its resulting from intense heat.

The second rock formation, which differs materially from the first, and results from the action of air and water on the earth, is described as stratified rock formation, as distinguished from the previous formation (the Plutonic or unstratified formation). Let me here quote from Dr. Hardwicke's recent work on "Creation and Evolution" (Watts & Co.), page 4 of chapter on "Man: Whence and Whither," in reference to these geological formations. He says: "Geologists hav divided the stratified rock into three chief divisions: the Paleozoic (ancient life), or Primary; the Mesozoic (middle life), or Secondary; and the Kainozoic (last life). or Tertiary. Each of these, again, has been subdivided into smaller sections according to the particular kind of deposit met with, the particular places where the best examples are to be found, or the particular life forms existing." Then follows a long list of further subdivisions of the Primary, such as:

1. The Laurentian.
2. The Huronian.
3. The Cambrian.
4. The Silurian.
5. The Devonian.
6. The Carboniferous.
7. The Permian.

The Secondary are divided thus:

1. The Triassic.
2. The Jurassic.
3. The Cretaceous.

And the Tertiary as follows:

1. The Eocene.
2. The Miocene.
3. The Pleocene.
4. The Pleistocene.

Now, for these formations great periods of time are required; and it is in the highest degree unreasonable to imagin that they could hav been called into being in a few days in the order in which they are now discovered, by the mere fiat of some intelligent, man-like ghost less than six thousand years ago. In support of this contention, that excellent Biblical commentator Dr. Kalisch in the introduction to his "Commentary on Genesis" has demonstrated that geology and Genesis are altogether irreconcilable. He says: "According to chronological computations based on the Old Testament. the earth, as a part of the universe, was created 4160 B.C., or about six thousand years hence."

"Even the larger chronologies of the Septuagint, Hales and others, fix this date not farther back than between seven and eight thousand years. But the researches of the natural sciences, especially geology, lead to widely different conclusions; they prove an antiquity of the earth of such vastness that our imaginations fails to conceive, and our numbers are almost unable to express it" (page 2). And on page 8 he gives the following facts: "The old red sandstone includes the fossils of zoöphytes, conchifera, some tribes of fish, some traces of land plants; perhaps also the first perfect birds, some of small, others of gigantic size; and the footprints of those batrachians which hav attracted the most zealous attention, and to which we shall later hav occasion to allude in a very curious connection. But both in the new red sandstone, and still more in subsequent oölitic strata, occur in great abundance the huge lizard-like animals of extraordinary size, power, and armature; the voracious ichthyosaurus, of the length of a young whale, fitted both to liv in water and to breathe the atmosphere; of the general form of a fish to which, however, were added the teeth and breast-bone of a lizard, the paddles of the whale tribes, the beak of a porpoise, and teeth of a crocodile; the plesiosaurus, of similar bulk and equal rapacity, with a turtle-like body and paddles, and the most extensivly preying upon the finny tribes; further the megalosaurus, an enormous lizard forty-five feet long, a carnivorous land creature; the pterodactylus, or flying saurian, a lizard with bat like wings; crocodiles, some of which were herbivorous, as, for instance, the iguanodon, reaching the amazing length of a hundred feet, or twenty times the size of the iguana of the Ganges, its present representativ. Strongly, indeed, do these monstrous and terrible forms remind us of those strange creatures of fancy popular in ancient times and in the Middle Ages, the winged dragons and griffins, the gorgons, hydras, and chimeras; their huge jaws threatened with fearful teeth; their necks were almost equal in length to half that of the entire body of the boaconstrictor; they had enormous, mail-like impenetrable bodies, and terrible claws, and all darted upon their pray with irresistible vehemence. The oölitic beds contain further the remains of about twelve hundred other astonishing species and forms, the first specimens of insects, and about fifty plants.

"But only in deposits about the chalk formations do we meet with mammifers. About four thousand forms, all different from the present species, are found in the tertiary strata; some of them the most remarkable for their size and form, as the palectherium, the ponderous dinotherium, with the bent tusks in its lower jaw, and many other thick-skinned animals (pachydermata), like the hippopotamus and rhinoceros. Some of the species of elephants were of enormous magnitude; the mastodon, with his tusks projecting from both upper and under jaws, reached the hight of twelve feet; the mammoth, the megatherium, with claw-armed toes more than two feet in length, and the megalonyx were of gigantic proportion and iron-like organization; we find, further, the bear, the horse, and the dog, seals, dolphins, and whales; the majestic Irish elk, with its broad plank-like horns, and even several feline or carnivora, and traces of monkeys (quadrumana) till all the older creatures became extinct, and were succeeded by the existing occupants of the land and the water."

And then this learned writer asks, "If the earth was created within six days, how and for what conceivable purpose were these numberless and often huge and appalling forms of being, exhibiting every state of growth, imbedded in the different strata of the earth?"

No rational answer can be furnished by the orthodox theologian to such questions as these for this reason. The evidence of the gradual formation of these granit rocks and then of stratified series, and so on until we come to the latest geological strata, evidence that the fauna and flora of one period differ altogether from that of an earlier or later period; evidence of the existence of all sorts of strange and huge animals which hav long been extinct; evidence of the gradual evolution of the lowliest forms of life into higher—all this is demonstrated with overwhelming force by multitudinous facts drawn from the study of geology. And what is this but evidence of the truth of the doctrin of evolution? No wonder that, when the Geological Society numbered among its members more clergymen than men of science, it sought to stifle such facts as the above. No wonder that when Mr. Vivian first brought forward some of the facts discovered in Kent's cavern, before this society, his paper was suppressed. But to-day science, like murder, will out. Facts, though they hav no tongue, will speak "with most miraculous organ." And as the spirit of inquiry is abroad, who can doubt that in time geology will tell its wonderful story so that everyone with common sense shall understand?

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

UPON the great questions of origin, of destiny, of immortality, of punishment, and reward in other worlds, every honest man must say, "I do not know." Upon these questions, this is the creed of intelligence. Nothing is harder to bear than the egotism of ignorance and the arrogance of superstition.—Ingersoll.

Call for the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held at Chicago, October 15th and 16th.

The Congress will be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs—the President and Secretary and three delegates. All charter members and life members, all Vice Presidents, all Chairmen of state Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats, but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada who can will be present.

Per order Board of Directors:

COURTLANDT PALMER, Pres.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Sec.
E. A. STEVENS, Ch. Fin. Com.
CHAS. ECKHARD, Treas.

Lines.

ADDRESSED TO THE SECRETARY OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

Putnam! tell us of the fight,
What its signs of triumph are;
Is the army of the right
Brave beneath our banner's star?
Putnam! can you see ahead
Aught that promises success?
Is our army being led To victory? Speak! Confess!

Putnam! tell us of the fight,
What is done and what to do;
Are the Liberals upright,
Are they brave, and good, and true?
Putnam! are our soldiers bold?
Will they stand their ground like men?
Is truth more to them then gold?
Will they sell their tongue or pen?

Putnam! tell us of the fight,
How the battle looks to you;
Are we climbing up the hight?
Are we going forward, too?
Putnam! you hav traveled far,
You hav seen our bravest, best;
Tell us, brother, is our star
Rising in the growing West?

News and Notes.

Caldwell is a bright and lively place on the Oregon Short line, in the midst of sage-brush, but with plenty of water for irrigation, and so it has a good foundation for growth. It is only about three years old, and there is a bit of competition between it and Boise City for the trade of the river valley and the surrounding country. I guess it has come to stay, whatever its future growth may be. It has a solid look. Large brick buildings are constructed, and elegant private residences. It is one of the brightest little towns I hav struck, and it looks forward and not backward.

Of course, I found some congenial spirits here among the leading citizens of the place, who are not afraid to express their sentiments, notwithstanding the two or three churches that are being built; for the churches always go where there is a boom, and, since they hav to pay no taxes, can invest with apparent safety, and wait till fortune's wind shall fill their sails, while other speculators go by the board, being compelled to do their share for the support of government.

Sherman Coffin, L. D. Potter, Geo. H. Holbrook, Wm. Barr, Jacob Hamm, O. M. Peterson, and others are the generous and cordial friends whom I found at Caldwell, and with whom it was a pleasure to associate in the pioneer work. They are all ready to lend a hand, with strong heart and faith in humanity. I gave three lectures in the little school-house, which was filled every night. When I return next year I expect to find a great change—a splendid school-building and all other signs of prosperity and civilization. I hav had a pleasant sojourn in this three-year-old encampment, whose majority will place it, I think, among the most brilliant cities of the West.

Thursday night, after the lecture, I travel over the endless sage-brush beneath the solemn stars to Nampa, which I reach after midnight. A short sleep, and I leave in the early morning for Boise City via the new railroad which was opened about a week ago. Boise City was left out in the building of the Oregon Short line, and, as the phrase is, received a "black eye." But it is evidently recovering, and proposes to come to the front again. The new railroad is crowded with passengers coming and going to the capital city of Idaho. It is about twenty miles from Nampa on the banks of the Boise river. It presents a pretty and attractiv appearance from the high bluffs as you look down upon it in the morning's splendid radiance. It is indeed a beautiful city, embowered in trees and surrounded with orchards and harvest fields and bright meadows. It was nothing but sage-brush at the beginning, not a tree or spear of grass, but now it is a picture of fertility. There are about four thousand inhabitants in Boise, and it does look as if it were on the tide of fortune's ample stream. If the Northwestern Railroad passes through it en route for Yaquina bay on the Pacific coast, it has an assured career, for it will then be one of the great transcontinental routes, and will command the trade of Boise river valley and of an immense mining region which, they say, is the richest in the world, and only in the first stages of development.

Idaho territory has advanced wonderfully for the last three or four years. Its farming prospects hav increased. Vast herds of cattle roam over its pastures. Its climate is simply delightful. There is but little snow in winter, and the summer's heat is not oppressiv. The elevation is three and four thousand feet above the sea. It is an excellent fruit country—apples, pears, peaches, cherries, plums are produced in abundance. One apple in this section weighed twenty-eight ounces. I ate a large pear and peach from Ireton's orchard, and the flavor was delicious, surpassing that of these fruits in California. Extensiv canals are being built, and these will largely enhance the resources of the country. The time is coming when every bit of these sage-brush plains will be watered and cultivated.

There are seven churches in Boise City besides the Salvation Army, which was in full operation, with music and parade, on my arrival. However, I had good audiences at Capital Hall, and on Sunday evening I had more than all the churches and Salvation Army combined, several hundred being present. There is a large Liberal element in Boise City, although there is much indifference and timidity. But the Liberals are really in a majority if they would assert themselvs. There are those here who are not afraid to stand by their colors, and through them I believe Idaho will become a noble representativ of Freethought.

T. J. Pefly is now mayor of the city, and has ever been an activ Liberal. An out-and-out Christian was run against him, and it was an ecclesiastical fight. And freedom was victorious. It is quite a hope for our cause that, in spite of seven churches, our candidate was so signally successful. Mr. Pefly is a man worthy of the honor, for he is a fearless and strenuous supporter of Infidel principles, and has won respect by his unflinching devotion to advanced ideas.

T. C. Galoway is another of our outspoken advocates, who has been in the country from the start, and has the backbone of the pioneer. He has been in the legislature and watched the Christians there. They undertook to pass a Sunday law prohibiting work on the "Sabbath." Mr. Galoway introduced an amendment, that no pay should be given for any work on Sunday, including the work of clergymen. The amendment passed. The Christians took no further interest in the Sunday law, and it went by default. J. A. Davis, H. R. Boynton, A. O. Miller, Harlan Pefly, John Jones Smith, Wilson Nye, department commander of the Grand Army; I. A. Gould, Jas W. Harrel, E. M. Crawford, E. A. Curtis, John B. Broadhent, T. P. Woodcock, I. P. Wilson, sheriff of the county; John Lemp, Jacob Deihl, D. W. James, John Atkinson, Daniel Bacon, editor of the Republican; James Stewart, T. Driscoll, Fred. Iseli, J. H. Morgan, Mr. Lawton, and many others are the outspoken allies of Freethought in this place, and I hav found nowhere a more inspiring welcome and entertainment than at Boise City. I like the country and the people, and it has been a pleasure to mingle with them on the high planes of thought and action, where the to-morrow's sun gilds to-day.

I was also pleased to meet Dr. Jennie Bearby, of Mountain Home; Mr. Richards, of Hailey, an editor who dares to speak the truth; Mr. and Mrs. O. P. Johnson, of Bliss, etc. Mrs. Johnson is Catholic, but says that she always takes the good things of the Bible and leaves the bad. On this point we cordially agree to disagree. There would be little conflict if all Christians were of that mold.

My friend, James Wardwell, of Emmett's, was with me all through the campaign; and so, of course, I could never hav a dark moment with such a jovial comrade about.

So I leave Idaho with memories of bright skies, desert lands, busy people, and live Liberals, and my homeward journey has been made brilliant with hope of future work.

A long night and day's ride, and, in the evening's glow, I am again in Salt Lake valley, with its many-hued mountains, its shining fields, its glistening waters flowing away like a sea into the remote and burnished sky. There is no more lovely valley in all this world. Here, I believe, our bright banners will flash in victory. The convention of Utah Liberals is this week. Next week I am at Canyon City, Col.; October 2d at Denver. October 4th, 5th, 6th, at Osceola, Neb., and then through Iowa to Chicago for Annual Congress. I hope to see a noble gathering of the friends of Freedom. This is an important meeting for future work. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Reynolds on His Western Tour.

September 11th I am at South Bend, Ind. Mr. D. Newton Strauss, a cultured and fearless young Liberal, of Sweet Home, took me to South Bend and introduced me to young Wm. Farr, the indefatigable news agent, who, educated a Catholic—under the ministrations of that noble old veteran in the cause of human progress, H. C. Van Liew—has evoluted to a most devoted Liberal. I love to meet the aged veterans who hav borne the brunt of battle against bigotry and superstition; but my heart always throbs with hopeful joy to find the young, with all the enthusiasm of youth, devoting their best efforts to spreading abroad the principles of Liberalism.

South Bend is a city of great enterprise and thrift. Its most successful business men claim to be Liberals, but when I ascertained that only two persons took any Liberal papers, I knew at best it would be difficult to get the people out to hear a Liberal lecture, and, with such short notice, next to impossible. Liberal mollusks, too stingy to pay for a Liberal paper and keep posted on the success of the good work, soon lose all interest and imagin the cause is as dead as they themselvs hav become to every generous, noble, or unselfish impulse.

Notwithstanding the indomitable efforts of Wm. Farr, who, although suffering from severe sick headache, most thoroughly advertised the lecture for Sunday evening at Knights of Labor Hall, there was a meager attendance, the hall being only half filled. A Professor Myers, principal of the high school and secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, interrupted me by asking questions, and gushed at length over the blessed Bible and God sending the dear savior to die for us. I asked him if he would retain faith in the savior if God himself in the Bible positivly declared "there was no other God besides him—that besides him there was no savior?" He replied, No, of course, he would not. I read to him Isa. xliii, 10, 11, and Hos. xiii, 4. After gasping in astonishment and fright, he finally rallied and said that was all right. Jesus had declared that he and his father were one. I read to him the prayer of Christ (John xvii): "That they may be one, as we are one: I in them, and thou in me." He then dodged off to the Mosaic account of creation, and challenged me to public discussion. With the help of a friend he wrote out his proposition, "That the Mosaic account of creation, as given in the scriptures, is in strict harmony and accord with the latest scientific and advanced thought." He insisted I should take the negativ and open the debate. Said he, "You prove it is not, then I will answer you." His friends had great difficulty in making him see the absurdity of his request. Finally, it was agreed he should speak for half an hour, I three-quarters of an hour, and he a quarter of an hour to close.

I am informed the ministers, instead of helping him, berated him severely for provoking a debate for which he was totally unqualified. Quite a number of Christians, however, accompanied him to the hall on Monday night, affording me opportunity to present ideas for their consideration they never, perhaps, otherwise could hav been prevailed on to listen to. Professor Meyers read the first chapter of Genesis, said the nebular hypothesis was only a hypothesis, but he firmly believed it, and spent the rest of his time telling how unmercifully I should ridicule him, and entreating I would not refer to him. I simply ignored him, proved nearly every statement in the Mosaic account of creation was directly in conflict with every fact of science, then gave the principles of Liberalism, and urged the honest-hearted, in view of the utter and lamentable failure of Christianity to meet the wants of the human race, to investigate for themselvs, to dare to think, and to hav the courage to avow and liv up to their convictions.

September 14th I was at Monticello, Ill. Dr. Wm. Noecker, president of the Bank of Monticello, and his efficient young cashier, O. W. Moore, are the leading spirits in the good work. They made an unfortunate error of judgment—took it for granted all prized the truth as they did, and advertised admission thirty-five cents. This proved to be a prohibitory tariff. Attendance was three times as many the second night as the first, but numerically could not be regarded as a success.

Sept. 18th to 21st at Mattoon, Ill. There is said to be a large Spiritual-Liberal element in this place, but if so they failed to materialize. Mr. Jacob Cassell and Mr. Frank Frazier are earnest workers, devoted to the cause, willing to bear burdens, and the Liberals of Mattoon were perfectly willing they should, and let them bear it all.

STRASBURG, ILL., Sept. 19th. How exhilarating and delightsome to find this glorious oasis in such a wilderness of dying mollusks! Dr. A. York gave me an earnest invitation to visit Strasburg, and lecture at the school-house. I found a thriving village, and hosts of whole-souled, warm-hearted, intelligent men and women. The school-house held about one hundred and fifty. The vestibule was crowded, the windows opened, and half as many more had to take the droppings from the sanctuary. The night being warm and pleasant, standing for an hour and a half was their worst discomfort. To show the mettle they are made of, a collection after the lecture resulted in Dr. York, after paying every expense, having over $10 left for a reserve fund toward payment of the next lecture.

At Centralia, Ill., Sept. 22d, I found a glad welcome and palatial home at the Centralia House, with stanch and true F. D. Rexford. Attendance at Turner's Hall last night, Thursday Sept. 22d, was excellent. To day some hav come fourteen miles to hear the lecture this evening. C. B. REYNOLDS.

P. S—I am to be at Belleville, Sept., 25th, 26th, and 27th; at Minier, Oct. 1st, 2d, and 3d; at Westfield, Oct. 5th, 6th, and 7th; at Tuscola, Oct. 9th, 10th, and 11th; at Olney, Oct. 12th, 13th, and 14th; at Chicago the 15th and 16th. C. B. R.

International Freethought Congress.

Reported by J. M. Wheeler in the London Freethinker.

Judged by the enthusiasm and cordiality displayed at its meetings the International Conference must be pronounced a great success. It is now half a dozen years since London was the scene of the annual gatherings which were inaugurated by the "Anticoncilio" of Naples, called by Count Giuseppe Ricciardi, in 1860, in opposition to the Œcumenical Council of Rome. English Freethinkers may congratulate themselvs that at a time when the council general placed on the agenda paper for discussion some of the most debatable points among Freethinkers, they hav had their full share in settling such questions.

The proceedings were opened by Mr. Bradlaugh welcoming the foreign delegates to England in a few well-chosen words. M. Odin replied, expressing the foreign delegates' sense of English hospitality, and the hope that the concert of various nations would aid the movements of emancipation.

Mr. Bradlaugh, having been elected to the chair on the proposition of foreign delegates, then gave the presidential address. He alluded to the improved position of Freethinkers during the last three-quarters of a century. In France, Belgium, and Italy most of the prominent public men were buried without religious ceremonies. The Burial bill of 1880 had rendered that possible in England also, and it was now their own fault if Freethinkers were buried with religious rites. Since 1870 it was in the power of the English people to elect school boards providing secular education. He regretted that full advantage had not been taken of the law. Nor had English Freethinkers sufficiently insisted upon the withdrawal of their children from board schools whilst religious instruction was given. In France a purely secular education was becoming more the matter of habit and custom than the exception. The battle of Freethought was to be fought, not in lectures, pamphlets, and books, but by the education of children in science. They were not met to discuss political or social grievances, but to discuss the common burdens on freedom of thought in every country. In this conference were no international boundaries. They had a church in which there was no pope, in which the only altar was the printing-press and the only prayer the uttered thoughts of man.

Mr. Bradlaugh then had to leave, and the chair was taken by Mr. G. W. Foote. A very lengthy list of societies and distinguished individuals, who gave in their adhesion to the Congress, was then read by M. Navez, secretary to the General Council, and as the list was frequently accompanied by documents and works sent for inspection, it occupied most of the morning sitting. From Italy, the Italian League of Freethinkers, a number of Freethought societies at Naples, nine masonic lodges there, a society at Senegallia, and the Foro d'Ischia, gave adhesions. From Spain and Portugal eleven societies sent adhesion, their locations being Madrid, Lisbon, Cadiz, Valladollid, Saragossa, Barcelona, Tabugo, Reus, Mahon, and Bilbao. Out of France there came adhesions from a number of societies in Paris (six delegates). Reims, Bordeaux, Saumur, Malvilliers, Puteaux, Pantin, Versailles, Rainey, Sevres, Lisioux, Lyons (three societies), Montataire, Forges-les-Eaux, Bicêtre, Angoulême, Angers, Boulogne, Saint-Arvant-de-Boixe, and Orleans. German adhesions came from societies in Hamburg, Darmstadt, Stuttgart, Weisbaden, Eick, Cologne, Hagen, and Gotha Switzerland sent representations from Geneva and Zurich; Belgium was strongly represented, some fourteen delegates hailing from Brussels and Antwerp; among them M. Fournément, avocat, deputé, of the Belgian Parliament; and from Holland, De Dageraad sent its adhesion and delegate. Among other letters read were those from Dr. Buchner, who sent papers giving his views on the questions before the Conference, from A. S. Morin, and from Dr. Bovio, who sent a copy of his Filosofia del Diritto.

In the afternoon the Conference discussed the question whether teaching should be indifferent or directly hostil to religious dogmas. Mrs. Besant occupied the chair.

Upon a vote being taken the Congress decided in favor of neutrality by a very large majority.

Signor Contieras then opened the question, "What is Freethought? Examination of philosophic doctrins—Spiritualism, Materialism, Positivism." The delegate quoted Professor Bovio as defining Freethought as the autonomy of reason; Spiritualism was based on false hypotheses; Positivism was a step toward Naturalism, the term preferred by Italian Freethinkers.

M. Paul Foucart briefly reviewed the questions and then gave an able and lengthy exposition and defense of the method of Positivism, which gave up the search into the origin of phenomena, but inquired into their succession and relation.

This closed the Saturday evening sitting.

On Sunday morning at 10:30. Mr. Bradlaugh again presided.

Dr. C. de Paepe read a valuable paper prepared by Dr. Ludwig Buchner who was unavoidably absent, in which Dr. Buchner defined the relations of Free thought, and expressed himself at one with the present method of Positivism. Dr. de Paepe explained that he called himself a positivist in science, separating the positiv method entirely from the sociology and religious cult founded by Comte.

The discussion on the question, "Can Freethought be Separated from the Social Question?" was opened by M. Navez. He held that the Freethinker could no more admit the dogmas of the despotic than of the religious regime. Political, social, and religious reform must march side by side. At the same time, Freethinkers were not pledged to any opinions known as Socialist.

Dr. De Paepe then read a lengthy paper by Dr. Buchner, which will doubtless be published, and in which he givs a survey of the social question similar to that found in his work on "Man in the Past, Present, and Future."

Sunday evening was devoted to a public meeting, Mr. Bradlaugh being in the chair. The hall was crowded in every part by a most enthusiastic audience.

Mr. Holyoake spoke first, and alluded to the progress of Freethought. Mr. Navez followed. On behalf of the General Council, he considered the Congress a grand success.

M. Jules Grimaldi, of Spain, followed. He said many people thought Spain still in the same condition it was in at the time of Philip II. He had even been asked if the Inquisition was still in existence. Since 1868, when Isabella was sent out of Spain, there had been much greater freedom. Affirmation is permitted in Parliament as well as in courts of law. No one can be prosecuted for trading on Sunday. Among the society of Friends of Progress which he represented, they had several members of the Cortes, and there were about one hundred Freethinking societies, with twelve Freethought papers. It was true the provinces sent out many pilgrims to Lourdes, but that was their Salvation Army.

Monday morning was devoted to the business of the Federation. The report and balance-sheet of the General Council were read and adopted, and some alterations were made in the rules, providing that in future a Congress should be held at least every two years. It was decided that the revolution of 1789 should be celebrated at Paris, in 1889, and a hope was expressed that one would be held previously at Rome to celebrate the inauguration of the statue to Giordano Bruno. The proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to Mr. Bradlaugh, proposed by M. Leon Fournément, who said that for many years past the eyes of European Freethinkers had been on Mr. Bradlaugh, whom they regarded with admiration and esteem. He coupled the name of Mrs. Besant, to whom he paid a well-deserved tribute, for having, throughout the Congress, translated the French speeches into English, and the English into French. In seconding the resolution, Dr. de Paepe thought it necessary to express regret that Mr. Bradlaugh was not in favor of Socialism, a point upon which Mr Bradlaugh very properly did not deign to reply, although he referred, in indignant terms, to the calumnies to which he had been subject in Socialist journals.

In the afternoon the debate, "Can Freethought be Separated from the Social Question?" was continued. M. Odin read a vigorous paper on the connection of Freethought and the social question. In France they were compelled to pay for a religion in which they do not believe. The priest was paid for teaching obedience. Freethought was inseparable from the social question, though not bound up with any particular school of Socialism.

Mrs. Besant remarked that the social question might be confounded with Socialism. If asked whether Freethought could be separated from Socialism, Socialist as she was, she would answer in the affirmativ. But if it meant that Freethinkers must not interest themselvs in the social welfare, she would vote otherwise. She dwelt on the historic connection of Freethought with all social and political progress, and suggested a revision of the terms of the discussion.

Dr. de Paepe, in a lengthy speech, declared that the social question was the all-important one. He bore testimony both as man and physician that poverty was the great obstacle to mental improvement. He did not wish to see Freethinkers bound to any economical dogmas, though for himself he adopted the teaching of Marx. He had [since the morning] discovered that Mr. Bradlaugh was a Socialist himself. He put the resolution in an amended form that Freethought cannot be indifferent to the question of social amelioration, but it is not distinctly Socialist or anti-Socialist.

M. Paul Foucart declared that philosophically Freethought and the social question were entirely independent. By a historical resume he showed that the social question had been solved in various ages by caste, slavery, feudalism, etc., quite apart from Freethought. He wished this fact put as a preamble to Dr. de Paepe's resolution.

Dr. Terwagne and Madam Rocher considered it was now impossible to separate the questions.

Mr. Swaagman considered the Socialist view was as if the party of progress in Russia was to pronounce that all Freethinkers should be Nihilists. He thought that English Freethinkers, at any rate, would hold, not only that the questions were distinct, but that they ought to be kept so.

Mr. G. W. Foote thought it unfortunate a vote should be taken upon a theoretical question. In a Catholic council the matter is simple, but no Freethinker was bound by the decision of this Congress. The "social question" is a very wide phrase, and offered a multitude of contradictory solutions. It was, in fact, so comprehensiv that one might as well argue that Freethought can be separated from life itself. If Freethought is to do good work it must be restricted. Ranging in all directions you may fancy yourself a universalist without being even a good specialist. Freethought assumes the presence of superstition. It has, so to speak, to deal with a pathological condition of mind and has no right to dictate what use healthy minds shall be put to. Our power of foreseeing the future is very limited. Let us remove obstacles to thinking freely, and social problems will work themselvs out in proportion as we are enlightened. It is not for us to anticipate the future, but to clear away the clouds of error, and leave to another generation the task that will devolve upon it.

Upon the vote being taken there was a considerable majority in favor of the amended resolution that Freethought cannot be indifferent to the question of social amelioration, but that it should not be identified with any Socialist or anti-Socialist solution. The proposed preamble, declaring that the questions were philosophically distinct, was rejected by a very close division.

In the evening about one hundred delegates sat down to a banquet at the Holborn Restaurant. In the name of the foreign visitors Signor Contieras, in a few graceful words, presented Mrs. Besant with a handsome basket of choice flowers. After the repast, Mr. Bradlaugh, who presided, proposed the toast "To the oppressed of all nations," coupling with it the names of Messrs. Holyoake and Foote, who suitably responded. The toast of "The Foreign Visitors," proposed by Mrs. Besant, was responded to by MM. Contieras, Odin, and Fournément; and that of "The International Federation," proposed by Mr. G. Standring, was responded to by M. Navez.

The remainder of the evening was devoted to harmony, songs being given by Mr. Bonner, Miss Tiffin, Mr. Porter, Mr. Trevelyan, and Mr. Fowler. M. Fournément sang "La Marseillaise," the whole of the audience joining in the chorus. When Mr. Foote, who succeeded to the chair towards the close of the evening, brought the meeting to a conclusion, all the delegates expressed themselv highly pleased with the whole proceedings of the Congress, and desirous of witnessing anothor fraternal reunion of Freethinkers of all nations.

Another Testimonial for Mrs. Slenker.

ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN, Sir: In response to your call for testimonials from those who hav corresponded with Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker on sexology, I wish to say, and emphatically, that I hav profited by holding conversation on paper with her on matters relativ to sex. Furthermore, I hav known Mrs. Slenker for years, and hav found her honest in all things.

Henry George.

Henry George, more than any other man in his day and generation, has simplified and brought to the notice and comprehension of the masses political economy. He demolishes the old theory of a "wage fund," that is, that "wages are fixed by the ratio between the number of laborers and the amount of capital devoted to the employment of labor," and demonstrates his proposition that "wages, instead of being drawn from capital, are in reality drawn from the product of the labor for which they are paid." Again, he demolishes the Malthusian theory, showing that, however it may be applied to the lower animal and vegetable life, man's intelligence is an insurmountable obstacle to its application. When advancing intelligence began to doubt the goodness of God in creating poverty, it was a godsend to the exploiteur to shift it all onto nature. Malthus deserved a medal for writing: "A man who is born into a world already occupied, his family unable to support him and society not requiring his labor, such a man, I say, has not the least right to claim any nourishment whatever; he is really one too many on the earth. At the great banquet of nature there is no plate laid for him. Nature commands him to take himself away, and she will not be slow to put her order into execution." "What can't be cured must be endured," and, as George says, "the rich Christian bends on Sunday in a nicely upholstered pew to implore the good gifts of the all father without feeling any responsibility for the squalid misery that is festering but a square away. For poverty, want, and starvation are by this theory not chargeable either to individual greed or to social maladjustments; they are the inevitable results of universal laws." Mr. George has employed his splendid talent in denouncing the wrongs of society. Brave, honest, and sincere, he has stood the champion of the poor. If he has allowed his zeal to blind his judgment, or lead him into paths of error, it may well be forgiven him. Social science is by no means an exact science. It is one thing for our social doctors to discover and describe the ills; it is quite another thing to effect a cure. But if they successfully diagnose and honestly recommend a remedy, let us giv them due credit. Mr. George himself has said: "I ask no one . . . to accept my views. I ask him to think for himself. Whoever, laying aside prejudice and self-interest, will honestly and carefully make up his own mind as to the causes and the cure of the social evils that are so apparent, does, in that, the most important thing in his power toward their removal. This primary obligation devolves upon us individually, as citizens and as men. Whatever else we may be able to do, this must come first. For 'if the blind lead the blind, they shall both fall into the ditch.'"

Our doctrinaires, owing to abstract ideas and technicalities, make political economy exceedingly dry reading to the average reader. As a recent writer in Social Science says, "the whole subject is so involved in the inaccuracies of speech, so mixed up through idiomatic expressions, metaphorical, parabolical, or symbolical terms and phrases, that of all scientific subjects it is the most difficult to find language to explain it with clearness and without ambiguity; . . . literally full of sophisms, perplexing suppositions, contradictions, and errors of every kind clothed in high flown language, arranged in a sort of order, and imagined to be very scientific and strongly fortified, but in truth, political economy is built of the flimsiest of material, and is destined to be ere long scattered to the winds."

I believe that a majority of the followers of Henry George trust more to the honesty and capacity of their hero than to their own ability to understand his theories. Mr. George's panacea is a tax on land values. He would abolish our present system of revenue and taxation, and place a single, direct tax upon the land, taking therefrom its full rental value. A startling theory, and would appear at first very unjust, but when contrasted with our present iniquitous robber system, it becomes the very acme of judicious statesmanship. In justice to his tax, he shows that land values are largely due to advancing civilization, and not to the labor of the owner; that is, as society creates the value, its rent should be returned by way of taxes. Of course, the tax would virtually destroy private ownership in land. Hence, Mr. George shows the injustice of such ownership. He says: "This right of ownership that springs from labor excludes the possibility of any other right of ownership. If a man be rightfully entitled to the produce of his labor, then no one can be rightfully entitled to the ownership of anything which is not the produce of his labor, or the labor of some one else from whom the right has passed to him. If production giv to the producer the right to exclusiv possession and enjoyment, there can rightfully be no exclusiv possession and enjoyment of anything not the production of labor, and the recognition of private property in land is wrong. For the right to the produce of labor cannot be enjoyed without the right to the free use of the opportunities offered by Nature, and to admit the right of property in these is to deny the right of property in the produce of labor. When non-producers can claim as rent a portion of the wealth created by producers, the right of the producers to the fruits of their labor is to that extent denied." A careful reading of the above would seem to exclude the usurer from the interest on his bond. It is surely not the produce of his labor. But Mr. George sanctions interest. He says: "It is true that if I put away money, it will not increase. But suppose instead I put away wine. At the end of a year I will hav an increased value. for the wine will hav improved in quality. Or supposing that, in a country adapted to them, I set out bees; at the end of a year I hav more swarms of bees, and the honey which they hav made. Or supposing, where there is a range, I turn out sheep, or hogs, or cattle; at the end of the year I will, upon the average, also hav an increase. Now, what givs the increase in these cases is something which, though it generally requires labor to utilize it, is yet distinct and separate from labor—the activ power of nature—the principle of growth, of reproduction, which everywhere characterizes all the forms of that mysterious thing or condition which we call life. And it seems to me that it is this which is the cause of interest, or the increase of capital over and above that due to labor." The italics are mine.

Antonio. Is your gold and silver ewes and lambs?
Shylock. I cannot tell. I make them breed as fast.

Now, it seems to me that Mr. George, in introducing this "element of time," this "increase in nature," has strangely overlooked the fact of a corresponding decrease in nature, and "time at last sets all things even." The "grain may grow while the farmer sleeps," but it is absorbing the richness of the soil, and the weevil may develop while the farmer sleeps; the frosts may come, the waters drown, the fires burn, the calf becomes a cow, grows old, and dies The trouble with this "element of time" is that "it generally requires labor to utilize it," and in this way establishes a "right of ownership." Not so with interest: it requires no labor; it not only "grows while the farmer sleeps," but it requires no fertilizer. It defies the weevil, the frosts, and fires. Its vigor is never abated, it never dies. Its likeness to this "increase in nature" reminds me of the closeness in color of the Dutchman's oxen; one was all black, with a white face, and the other was all white, with a black face.

It seems to me that Mr. George is a little too arbitrary in the use of terms; like the mathematician, he sometimes mistakes his figures for the things themselvs. He says: "Land, labor, and capital are the factors of production. The term land includes all natural opportunities or forces; the term labor all human exertion, and the term capital all wealth used to produce more wealth. In returns to these three factors is the whole produce distributed. That part which goes to land owners as payment for the use of natural opportunities is called rent; that part which constitutes the reward of human exertion is called wages, and that part which constitutes the return for the use of capital is called interest. These terms mutually exclude each other. The income of any individual may be made up from any one, two, or all three of these sources; but in the effort to discover the laws of distribution we must keep them separate." It is in keeping them separate that enables him to work out his problem so nicely. The fact is, land and capital are simply the tools of labor; labor creates all wealth. That fictitious wealth Mr. George would tax is simply the result of monopoly—a creature of man-made law. Mr. George makes "three parties divide the produce—the laborer, the capitalist, and the land owner;" a better distinction would be the laborers, the loafers, and the robbers. Mr. George carefully distinguishes between rent, interest, and wages; but, according to his postulate, the "right of ownership," it is a distinction without a difference. Wages may properly stand for the earnings of labor; interest, rent, and profit, unearned increase allowed by law or custom. They are interchangeable terms, as J. K. Ingalls shows in "Social Wealth." "Interest is the profit which the money-lender or capitalist derives from the employment of his capital." Again,

"Profit is the interest which the operator or merchant realizes from his money invested in his business."

"Rent is the interest which the landholder receives for the sum of money invested in land, or for that sum of money for which said land would sell." Still again,

"Profit is the rent of the land which had been sold to obtain the capital employed, or for which such capital would exchange; and,

"Interest is the rent of so much land as was sold to raise the principal, or for which the principal would exchange."

In Mr. George's search for the causes of the unjust distribution of wealth, he ignores a most potent factor—legislation; he seeks in nature for laws that are in man only. He says the increase in nature is the cause of interest. It may hav suggested interest in the mind of man, as Shylock's reference to Jacob's thrift would seem to indicate, but this is no cause.

I fear Mr. George, in his onslaught upon land monopoly, has overlooked another formidable enemy of labor, a second whelp of the same dam—money monopoly. If there is any difference between the two, it is one of degree, not of kind; and to chain one and to let the other run, would be, to say the least, unwise.

Now Mr. George makes an ethical point: "That alone is wise which is just; that alone is enduring which is right. In the narrow scale of individual actions and individual life this truth may be often obscured, but in the wider field of national life it everywhere stands out." I, too, would "bow to this arbitrament, and accept this test." Is this "unearned increase," that robs labor and rewards loafers, is it just? is it right? If it is not, then let us smother this idea of "necessary evil," and drown the pups.

And if their Alma Mater, the state, stands in the way, why, it must be bad for the state; for, as George says, "If the conclusions that we reach run counter to our prejudices, let us not flinch; if they challenge institutions that hav long been deemed wise and natural, let us not turn back." ## The Voice of Science.

A SPEECH I MADE (IN MY MIND) AT THE SOCIALISTS' INDIGNATION MEETING.

Fellow Citizens of the World: A great labor crisis is upon us. The whole world is involved. From a terrible revolution but one thing can save us—Truth, and Science is its prophet. Now, if science is, and is worthy to be, the prophet of that which stands above all other things (as, I am sure you will agree with me, truth does), should it not also be your prophet? And with such a prophet would you need at all that other "prophet?" With such a leader, counsellor, and teacher—in a word, with such a god—need you hanker after any false god? Idolaters I know you are not. Aye, if science is worthy to be the prophet and servant of so worthy a master as truth, let us together rejoice in humiliation, and at the same time with pride and exaltation, in accepting her as our true prophet and real Moses to lead us out of this wilderness of woe, of carnage, and of strife. For, be assured, my brethren—indeed, you know—that, as science advances, diversity of opinion dies away, and unity of knowledge takes its place. Mark these two differences, opinion and knowledge, and diversity and unity, for in these differences lie both the difficulty and the remedy. To produce this unity of knowledge for the whole race of men is the magnificent destiny of science; and the humblest cultivator of such knowledge and promoter of such unity is, like the coral insect, helping to rear an edifice, which, emerging from out this vexed ocean of conflicting opinion, shall be first stable and secure, and at last shall cover itself with verdure, flowers, and fruit, and bloom beautiful in the face of heaven.

Yes, truth will giv us unity of thought and purpose, which we must hav, as there is but one truth. Then we will be able to accomplish the great work which is demanded, and which must be achieved first, viz., the organization of labor—the scientific organization of labor. This must be the basis of a larger and true social organization. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth will make you free," saith Christ. Let us first seek to know the truth, and then act it. And then we will all be preachers of righteousness and true priests—priests of truth, and not of barren dogmas or superstition. Let us help science and labor to join hands—hearts and hands—as in a marriage, which shall know no divorce forever. And science will help labor to bring forth a thousandfold; to "find favor in our sight and honor in the land," and to "hasten the time when every valley shall be exalted and every mountain and hill shall be made low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain." And when she will "beat our swords into plowshares and our spears into pruning-hooks," and make the "nations to know war no more forever;" and make the "wilderness and solitary place glad, and the desert rejoice and blossom as the rose."

But now, to closer quarters. You and your treacherous friends are both wrong. Your state Socialism is one extreme, and their egoistic individualism is the other extreme from the golden mean where the truth lies. Yet individualism and Socialism are both true, not to the exclusion but inclusion of each other, that is, when combined in due and proper balance. They are both necessary factors in the equation of life, and are so because human nature is both individual and social, egoistic and altruistic.

They (your friends) say that it is childish on your part to expect to carry your theory of the state ownership of all the means of production into practice. And I agree with them, and add that it is not at all necessary to do so in order to gain your object (with which I agree) of substituting for the present competitiv, cut-throat, and wage system a coöperativ and more fraternal and helpful one, and thereby to eliminate the profit-making fiend which is the veritable Mephistopheles of the industrial world. "State Socialism" would violate or bar the liberty of individual initiation and voluntary coöperation in industrial enterprise. It would, in too great a degree, take away the incentiv to individual effort and ambition, and conflict unduly with individual freedom generally. It would be tyranny to the minority—should there be a minority. And would not a minority, at times at least, be inevitable? The excuse for this state ownership is to get rid of the profit fiend. It can be got rid of without it. How, I cannot stop to tell you now.

But if your expectations are "childish," theirs are babyish. If yours are "too fresh," theirs are more than proportionately "too stale." More than a century ago, and before the French Revolution, the landlords in Europe, never here, were the oppressors of the people. To day the manufacturing and merchant prince, the railroad king, the money-monger, and the stock jobber and speculator, hav taken their places. And Mammon, all along this line, is infinitly more the oppressor than before—than ever before. And yet these pin feather economists (your friends), these unsophisticated youths, these innocents, say they expect a land tax would remedy all the gigantic evils, abolish poverty, and bring in a reign of justice, "peace, and good will to men." It is, indeed, too "childish," or "babyish," for serious comment. And I drop it with saying that a somewhat detailed and statistical demonstration of the utter weakness of this land tax doctrin may be found in the Forum for June. And yet I am tempted to add this other thought, that any mere tyro in economics knows that any tax on any means of production is paid ultimately by the consumer.

Hundreds and thousands of the most capable young men in this country are annually leaving farming, declining to accept farms as gifts and become landlords, but choosing nothing and other chances rather than to liv the life of a farmer and landlord. My father offered me a hundred acre farm and a setting out on it if I would remain a farmer. But I chose rather nothing and my chances in more inviting fields. And, my friends, don't think that I may know nothing about labor and the differences in occupations. I hav been an employer and employee in all three branches of industry—the agricultural, manufacturing, and mercantil. Before of age I took the place and did the work of two men (ordinary hands) in the harvest field. At seventeen I took the place of a man in working a team and plow, and was, by my father, pronounced a good plowman. But while my horses were taking in their hay and oats for two hours at noon, I was taking in, besides my dinner, Greek philosophy, and the life of Socrates. And ever since then Socrates has been my literary love, so to speak, and, to me, the consistent and moral hero, par excellence, of all the ages. Ethics was his forte, and ethics is what I love most, but economics I hav made my forte because it is the more immediately concerned with this great and pressing labor question, and it is what the world is now ready to understand and to apply. Ethics will follow it. This is their natural and therefore inevitable order. I mean as sciences. The one teaches wisdom, the other justice. And we must know how to be or to do good before we can be or do good. Though it may not be out of place, even now, to say to those whom it may concern: "Ye who profess to be more than just, even charitable, prepare to be just!"

Now, as to money and the importance of its reform, you are both equally delinquent and oblivious. I don't refer to your respectiv platforms, for these, as platforms usually are, are set or spread to catch votes (as the sails of a ship to catch the wind), especially that of your friends. But I refer to what is known to be the original and real doctrin of each of you. Your friends' platform shows more tact, if not more appreciation, on this point than yours does. This money question and its reform, I am bold to affirm, is the most important, the most pressing, and at the same time the most practicable and easily effected, of all the questions involved in this great industrial reform. Besides, being absolutely, in its essence, of social origin, and therefore entirely socialistic, how or why you Socialists hav overlooked the question, and hav failed to take advantage of this characteristic of it, is to me unaccountable and astounding.

As for the success, in any large way, of either of you, that is impossible without the aid of the farmers; and they are opposed, and will remain so, to both the land tax of your friends and the state ownership of the means of production of yourselvs. I know whereof I speak. I am a Granger, and hav been with the farmers in their national associations and conventions, and know them well. Indeed, both the Grangers and the Knights of Labor are in advance of both you and your friends in real, practical measures of reform.

But why so concerned about what these people did at Syracuse? They are not the labor party of the United States. They are only the New York clique, or the "swell head" party of New York, if you will pardon this much slang. The real labor party, it seems to me, is the Union Labor party, which held a national conference at Cincinnati last February, and issued a good platform, and authorized and invited state organizations under it, which hav been going on ever since. Why don't you join in with this party?

A word, and I am done. You seem too arrogant, too arbitrary, and too little docil for your own interests. There seems an air of clannishness about you. You make speeches in German when there seems no occasion for it, and bore those who do not understand you. You do not seem to regard, or to comply, or to desire to do so, with the circumstances of the country, or to appreciate the national character of the American people. For your honesty and courage you deserve great praise and a rich reward. Let us all unite under this motto, "In truth we trust." Indeed, would it not make a good platform?

Thus endeth the first lesson. If you should want anything more at any time, and "don't see it, ask for it."

VOX SCIENTIÆ.

Superstition, Ancient and Modern.

BELIEF IN DREAMS.

This childish form of superstition is not confined to primitiv people alone, nor is it found only in the Old Testament, and not in the New. It is a very common superstition. Its general acceptance does not go to prove the belief correct, but to show the general fact of human ignorance and credulity. With the Hebrews dreams were often the means of divine revelation. Joseph had a dream which he told to his brethren, and they, becoming offended at his presumption, threw him into a pit, and afterward seeing that they could convert him into cash capital, sold him to certain pedlers happening along at that time on their way down to Egypt.

Hear now my words: If there be a prophet among you, I, the Lord, will make myself known to him in a vision, and I shall speak unto him in a dream (Num. xii, 6).

God came to Abimelech in a dream (Gen. xx, 3).

God came to Laban the Syrian in a dream (Gen. xxxi, 24).

The Lord appeared to Solomon in a dream (1 Kings iii, 5).

And (the wise men) being warned of God in a dream that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way. And when they were departed, behold the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph in a dream. But when he (Joseph) heard that Archelaus did reign in Judea in the room of his father Herod, he was afraid to go thither; notwithstanding, being warned of God in a dream, he turned aside into the parts of Galilee (Matt. ii, 12, 13, 22).

O Belteshazzar, master of the magicians, that I know that the spirit of the holy gods is in thee, and no secret troubleth thee, tell me the vision of my dream that I hav seen, and the interpretation thereof (Dan. iv, 9).

The Bible abounds in dreams and their interpretations, and, as a consequence, millions of people will shake their heads wisely, and say, "Well, now, I tell you what, there is something in dreams."

Dreams are intimately associated with the lower forms of religion. To the savage they hav a reality and importance which we can scarcely appreciate (Lubbock's Origin of Civilization, p. 128).

The Christian religion hangs upon the slender thread of dream. If Jesus was the son of God, there is no evidence offered, except that some one dreamed that he was.

Now, the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When, as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost.

How could such a fact be found out?

Then Joseph, her husband, being a just man, and not willing to make her a public example, was minded to put her away.

Then he had not found it out.

But while he thought on these things, behold the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife; for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost (Matt. i, 18, 19, 20).

This wonderful transaction is revealed to the world through a dream. But Joseph does not relate to us his dream, if he had one. Mary does not tell any one about the visit of the Holy Ghost. Somebody else relates this supposed dream. There is no evidence that Joseph had such a dream. There is no proof that Joseph knew Matthew, and there is no testimony to show that Matthew wrote the book of Matthew, and still further there is no evidence that this book was written much earlier than a hundred years after Matthew was dead.

Almost the greater part of mankind derive their knowledge concerning God from visions.

Philo (vol. 1, p. 292) covers one hundred pages in showing how dreams are sent by God.

John Lightfoot is quoted in "The Supernatural" as saying that

There is not a people upon earth that studied or attributed more to dreams than they (Jews).

There was hardly any people in the whole world that more used or were more fond of amulets, charms, mutterings, exorcisms, and all kinds of enchantments. The interpretation of dreams became a public profession.

In the early history of Christianity the Jewish people were mad with superstition in matters of religion (v. Supernatural Rel., chap. iv).

Soldan shows from church history how, in the first centuries, the fathers of the church, rabbis, and heathen philosophers lost themselvs and rivaled each other in demonological speculation and beliefs representing miracles and sorcery so that everybody looked on what was agreeable as a miracle, and the reverse as sorcery.

Sorcery was an illegal miracle and miracle was legitimate sorcery (History of Magic, by Joseph Eunemoser, p. 12).

Besides the superstitions associated with dreams, the Bible overflows with others as gross if not grosser. We find stories about witches, sorcerers, demons, devils, angels, spirits, visions, trances, omens, signs, magic, miracles, resurrections from the dead, and ascensions to heaven, and many other marvelous things.

MAGIC, LUCK, LOTS.

The Hebrews did not like the soothsayers or magicians, but they were greatly in love with the prophets. The difference between the soothsavers and the prophets is that one was an orthodox Jew, and the other was a heterodox pagan. The prophet could tell your fortune through his dreams or yours. He could read your future through visions, revelations, and the spirit of the Lord. He could do the magic business, and all the legerdemain that others did, but when he performed the same tricks, they were no longer tricks, but "wonderful works at the hands of the Lord." They were miracles.

All superstitious people believe in luck. They often say, "Now I'll try this once, just for luck."

Many times the Bible people were inspired by this sort of inspiration, and hence they would take chances in games of luck.

So they cast lots, and the lot fell upon Jonah (Jonah i, 7).

That was an unlucky throw for him; especially the second throw, when he was thrown into the sea.

And Saul said, Cast lots between me and Jonathan my son, and Jonathan was taken (1 Sam. xiv, 41).

And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Mattheas (Act i, 26).

Shaking dice to find out whom the Lord wanted for a preacher is an easy way to settle a vexatious question. And the church still holds on to this good old Bible institution of gambling. It clings to the raffling business, to taking chances in a crazy-quilt, or a cake supposed to hav a ring in it; to the grab-bag, and a hundred other devices for extorting money from the poor laborer to send the gospel to the heathen.

And when they had crucified him, they parted his garments casting lots upon them (Mark xv, 24).

They probably drew cuts or shook dice to see who would get his clothing. The reader will remember that in the story of his resurrection he is seen with clothes on, by his own friends, and no remark is made about any new suit, or different dress. Where did he get his resurrection clothes? Did he resurrect an old suit.

The uncivilized man thinks that lots or dice are adjusted in their fall with reference to the meaning he may choose to attach to it, and especially he is apt to suppose spiritual beings standing over the diviner or the gambler, shuffling the lots or turning up the dice to make them giv their answers (Tylor's Primitiv Culture, p. 79).

The priest in all countries (that is, the big medicin man) possessed the knowledge of unraveling mysteries. He could consult the unknown, and bring from the oracle or temple the wishes of the terrible power that was working mischief. It is in the nature of religion or fear to hav little anxiety over duties to the deities until they are harmed or alarmed by some sort of evil.

The soothsayer is the father of the prophet, and the prophet is father of the priest. These men of God can commune with him on more intimate and favorable terms than the vulgar and profane multitudes can. He can negotiate at the courts of heaven for insurance upon an eternal life policy. And if worst comes to worst, they can pray for rain in dry weather; for the removal of the yellow-fever plague; for the recovery of Garfield, and the annihilation of Infidels throughout the world. And suppose their prayers are not answered, who art thou, O man, that repliest against the man of God? Learn, O wretch, that God moves in a mysterious way!

If this superstitious fear of spirits were taken away, and with it prognostics from dreams, false prophecies, and many other things depending thereon, by which crafty and ambitious persons abuse the simplest people, men would be much more fitted than they are for civil obedience. And this ought to be the work of the schools; but they rather cherish such doctrin (Hobbes's Human Nature, c. 3).

We hav seen that worship of the gods springs out of man's ignorance, helplessness, and fear. These elements form the groundwork of religious belief and worship to-day. People who would repel the charge of cowardice will, nevertheless, confess themselvs by saying to the Freethinker: "Well, you may think your doctrin all right, but when you come to die you will change your mind." Here it is assumed by the Christian that fear will make the Infidel quail when he comes to die. But the calm and sustained hearts of thousands of Infidels who hav died tranquilly giv the lie to this last falsehood, born of ignorance and fear, nourished by cruelty and crime, and uttered for the glory of God.

TWO THINGS WANTED.

First. We want some money from every friend who owes on his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The balance in the bank from which to draw to satisfy the paper manufacturers and the printer is very small, and we must increase it, or run in debt. There are many hundreds of dollars owing us by subscribers, and we desire to kindly but firmly call their attention to the matter. We need the money, and it is not right for them to keep it from us. We would also respectfully suggest to those whose subscriptions expire during the present month that now is the time to renew. We would call attention, too, to our club rates. Get a new subscriber, and so get your own paper cheaper.

Second. We once more ask our friends to send us the names of all the Infidels of their acquaintance who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. The intention is to send them sample copies of the paper with the hope that they may subscribe.

Pastoral Calls.

In one of the strongest passages of one of his strongest lectures, we heard George Chainey say: "Protestants rage at the Catholic confessional. I wish Romanists would rage at pastoral visiting, until, like Kilkenny cats, they would annihilate each other." Mr. Chainey knew whereof he spoke, and he said this when in a repentant mood for having been a minister.

These words came to us again, in reading in a daily paper a dispatch from Boston that the Rev. Mr. Titus, pastor of the Franklin street Methodist church, of Somerville, has decided not to face the charges of immorality brought against him and has resigned, after the investigation ordered by the church had begun. This is a celebrated and much-talked about case. Mr. Titus had been accused by a respectable lady of his parish of having, during one of his pastoral visits, placed his hand upon her knee, and, by word and action, making insulting proposals. When the accusation was made to Mr. Titus's face, he blustered and swore that it was false, that the object was to blackmail him, and avowed that in the presence of ladies he had always conducted himself as became a gentleman of pure mind and purpose.

Unfortunately, however, for Mr. Titus, he had been located in other parishes, and several other Christian sisters had received pastoral visits from him. Among these were residents of Springfield, Westfield, and Gloucester, and they came forward with similar charges against their former beloved shepherd. In the face of all this, Mr. Titus had not the hardihood to brazen the matter through, and fled the pulpit.

To borrow the language of the exhorter, this should be a warning to the women of the church, as well as to their husbands. Pastoral visits are one of the most dangerous foes to female virtue that exist. Especially is this the case with women and ministers of the Methodist sect. Their religion is warmer than others; the emotions are oftener in play; passion is more frequently wrought upon, and the danger of intimacy is therefore greater. Allowing—which is not always the case, by any means—that most ministers begin making pastoral calls from a sense of duty, and that they are received by the women from the same sense of religious obligation, there are many reasons why the custom should be discontinued. Chainey, who, we cannot help thinking, knew a good deal about the subject, said that no good can come of any man intermeddling with husband and wife whose unhappy marriage may be the result of the bondage to superstition of the wife. The unhappy wife, he says, "pours her sorrow into the ear of her pastor. He is to her a man of God; but that does not take from him the feelings and passions of a man. He is sorry for her. Their sympathies mingle. They kneel to pray together. None but good intentions actuate them. So the lightning tends to purify the atmosphere, but it often destroys human life. So pure as their desires may be, the lightning of passion may strike them with social and moral ruin." That is one road to ruin, a common one, no doubt. But there are others, and the ministers easily find them. The life of a clergyman is well calculated to lead a morally weak man astray, but there is too much evidence to doubt that most of them go astray voluntarily, deliberately, and, with passionate malice, lead the women of their flocks with them. No profession contains so many debauchers of women as the clerical. The cause is the clergy themselvs, the women of their parishes, and the religion both hold in common. Ministers are men, and only men. They hav the failings of men. Their lives are well calcu lated to fill them with passion. Their energy is not expended in healthful, outdoor work, nor in exhausting business cares. There are few things in this world requiring so little expenditure of force as the preparation of the average Christian sermon. They are, therefore, usually possessed of superabundant vitality. Again, the custom here is for women to do all the church work. The men will not, for they look upon religion and the church as the women's and children's playthings. The minister is consequently thrown into the society of the women. Whether he seeks it or not, the result is apparent—scandal, ruined reputations, resignations from pulpits. The pastoral call for the consideration of church work becomes a visit of clerical infamy.

But the fault is not always with the man. Women are emotional and passionate, and there are many Potiphar's wives in the churches, and no Josephs. Among the Liberals there are many ex-ministers, and one of them once told us that one of the most difficult tasks he had as a clergyman was to keep moral. He completely succeeded, he said, only when he left the church. Pastoral visits he denounced with extravagance of language, and the visits of female parishioners to the pastor's study, though always on some errand of churchly duty, were equally pernicious. The cure for Christian immorality he considered to lie only in a complete abandonment of the present relations of pastor and people. In other words, in the demolition of the Christian priesthood. For as long as men were men and women were women they would, when moved by religious emotion, forget all restraint and smash the laws of morality.

The chief sinner in this matter, however, is not the victims of religion, but religion itself—not only the Christian religion, but any and all religion. For religion is essentially of the emotions, and not at all of the intellect. Religion in itself cares not a straw for facts. It is composed of heat, and passion, and imagination. The religious fanatic is not always a fool, but he is always a gentleman who gets mad in a debate. He hates the enemies of his faith, and would fight them with pleasure. He uses his intellect only to defend his imagination. The source of religious emotions is the fountain of passion. "It is fatuous sophistry," says Stewart Ross, "to urge that the love for Jesus and the love for Jones are generically dissimilar. There is but a step, and a short one, between 'divine love' and human sensuality, and, in all ages of the church, this step has been taken. Human nature is only human nature, and it is more generous to expect too little from human nature than to expect too much. Psychic though love may be, by incontrovertible law its manifestations are organic, and cannot possibly be divorced from sex." This is plainly seen in the Salvation Army and in all religious camp-meetings, revivals, and prayer-meetings where warm exhortations to Jesus take the place of stereotyped formulas. This has always been so. We would not care to question the religious earnestness of the ascetics of the Middle Ages, but it is an indisputable fact that they were immoral to a ferocious extent. "Luther," says the author of "Isis Unveiled," "speaks of a fish-pond at Rome, situated near a convent of nuns, which, having been cleared out by order of Pope Gregory, disclosed at the bottom over six thousand infant skulls; and of a nunnery at Neimburg, in Austria, whose foundations, when searched, disclosed the same relics of celibacy and chastity." Religion, along with poetry and art, is distinguished by amorousness. This is due to the fact that they emanate from the sentiments which produce also the passion of sensuality. Geniuses in poetry and art are usually erotic, and usually religious. But geniuses are not sufficiently plentiful to cause alarm, while the country is full of religion. If there were as many poets and artists as there are ministers, it would behoove some one to publish a "Crimes of Poets," as well as of "Preachers." But the clergy, even now, are never weary of inveighing against them, and Byron and Swinburne are referred to as awful examples, while the world is full of religious enthusiasts whose eroticism has been given free rein. In Turin, but a few years ago, one clergyman was accused by thirty-three girls of having ruined them through the confessional. During the past year we hav noted in this country, from an exchange list comparativly small, about one hundred cases of religious immorality. The task of collocating and printing them, which we contemplated, is too onerous and disgusting. In most cases they were of Protestants, and the direct result of pastoral visits.

In many places, even now, these pastoral afternoon calls are the occasion of sneers from the worldly, and innuendoes that would earn them a cowhiding did the confident husband overhear them. For this the clergy and the female church-members hav themselvs to blame, for they hav, by pastoral visits, furnished a very good foundation for scandal—and one which will not be removed until the Protestant church forbids the clergy to continue the custom, or every self-respecting woman commands the minister to call only when her husband or father is at home. If Mrs. Warner and the other ladies of Mr. Titus's acquaintance had done this, their names would not now be ornamenting the scandal columns of the daily newspapers. They should remember that there are some people who will shut one eye incredulously when asserting that they believe Mr. Titus's accusers innocent of all wrong-doing.

Enforcing Sunday Laws in Texas.

Week before last Judge Gustave Cook addressed a letter to the sheriffs of Galveston and Harris counties, Texas, calling their attention to the many violations of the Sunday law, and demanding of these officers that they should punish them. Thereupon the sheriff of Galveston county issued a card notifying the Sunday-law breakers that they must not do so any more, as he should arrest all Sabbath-breakers.

The sheriff was as good as his word, and began within one point of where all officers enforcing the Sunday laws ought to begin. The most flagrant violators of the Sunday laws are, of course, the clergy, for upon Sunday they perform the heaviest tasks of the week, and upon about forty Sundays of the year earn their living for the whole year. No other profession than the ministerial so openly and persistently labor upon God's holy day, and, of course, they should be the first to suffer for contumeliously breaking the divine command to remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. Next to the pulpiteers come the newspapers, the great dailies which issue upon Sunday the most interesting edition of the week. Sunday papers are made large, and filled with lively and entertaining matter, because, the day being a holiday, the people hav more time to read. This conduces to induce folks to regard the day irreverently, and in many instances prevents men and women from attending church, when they rise late and become immersed in the columns of a mammoth edition of a Sunday paper. The daily papers are, therefore, responsible for the loss of many souls. It will not do to say the work upon a Sunday paper is all done before twelve o'clock on Saturday night. The injury to religion is in having the papers spread over the county on Sunday morning, providing so much good reading that the sermons of the preachers suffer alarmingly by comparison. Besides, the editors, reporters, compositors, and pressmen all work on Sunday to get out the Monday paper, and the punishment for Sabbath-breaking can easily be transferred to that account. Punishing one man for another's sin is not a new doctrin for Christians, and hanging a man for something he has not done on the principle that he may do, or wanted to do, something deserving hanging, is strictly in accord with Christian legal ethics. It will be seen, therefore, that the case of the church against the newspapers is a good one, legally and morally.

So, at least, thought the sheriff of Galveston county, and in his quest for Sabbath-breakers he went to headquarters. We are informed by the Dallas News of Sunday, September 18th, that on that morning, about one o'clock, it received a dispatch from the telegraphers of Galveston, reading, "We are all pulled." These telegraphers were employed transmitting items of intelligence to the Galveston News. A second dispatch stated that a constable had raided the editorial rooms of the Galveston News with the splendid intention of arresting all the employees found working in violation of the Sunday law. When the constable arrived, the quill-drivers were enjoying a brief respit (so runs the dispatch), and the minion of the law was foiled. The composing and press rooms were locked against intruders, and the over-anxious constable, as the News styles him, could make no arrests. He declared, however, that he would obtain a warrant the next day. The Dallas News concludes from this occurrence "that in the enforcement of the Sunday law the Galveston officials seem to hav taken a view which has escaped officials of other cities. And," it adds, "it is a view which will probably lead to a quick and effectiv judicial construction of the legality of their action."

We congratulate the sheriff and that brave constable of Galveston. They hav taken the right course, and it is to be hoped they will not falter. When the Galveston News printed Judge Cook's letter, it tacitly approved it by saying nothing. It felt secure on its proud eminence. No officer would dare touch it, and why should the News object to the enforcement of the Sunday law? If everything else was shut up, more people would buy the News, for people must hav some recreation. The law would work to the glory of those that love the Lord, and has not the News protested many times in its controversy with Parson Briggs, of the Texas Christian Advocate, that the News not only loves the Lord, but is a Christian journal clear down to the advertisments, and fights Briggs alone and not his Christianity? So not a word had the News to say against the infamous tyranny of Sunday laws; not a sentence in defense of personal liberty; not a line against the principle of a law placing the rights and liberties of the community in the hands of a few fanatics. The News has a Christian constituency, and it might by opposing the law hav lost a six-line advertisment, or a possible purchaser of a copy. It felt secure against prosecution, for its columns make and unmake politicians. It felt no call to speak for liberty, for right, for justice, and now it is reaping its reward, and we are glad that its first reward is a picture of a jail.

If the press unites on this question, and fights the fanatics, Sunday laws are doomed. But for every squirmer who asks the Christians to just please let up on him—he is not doing much harm—and gets down on his knees and admits that a Sunday law is right in itself; for every trimmer who throws a sop to the church, and begs for just the liberty he desires; and for every theoretical supporter but practical violator of Sunday laws we hope there is a constable just like the Galveston fellow, and a judge like Cook whose letter the News took such pains to spread before its readers without a word of protest against its infamously tyrannical tendency.

Stearns County, Minnesota.

The trouble between the supporters of the public schools and the Catholics in Melrose, Minn., an account of which we published last week, has led to the exposure of more Catholic rascality in the same state. A correspondent of the Minneapolis Pioneer Press has looked into the relations of public schools and Catholicism in Stearns county, and finds affairs worse by far than in Melrose. Stearns is the strongest Catholic county in Minnesota, the population being German, and it is also the governmental seat of the Benedictine order for the Western United States. At St. Joseph is the large convent, seminary, and Indian school, under the control of the St. Benedictine sisters. In Collegeville is St. John's university, with the Benedictine monastery and abbey, a great square of massiv buildings and princely possessions in lands. At St. Cloud are the cathedral and church, with a seating capacity of about three thousand, the priest's residence, bishop's residence, a smaller convent, two large parochial schools, public hospital, and priest's farm, representing a value, free from taxation, of fully $200,000. A million of dollars, says the Pioneer Press correspondent, would not cover the present cash value of the property held by the Catholic church in Stearns county, and more is being steadily acquired.

Ever since the church has been established in Stearns county, the one question has been with her officials how to destroy the public schools, and so evade the double taxation of Catholics for school purposes. The constitution of the state forbids public appropriations for sectarian purposes, and the church has, therefore, no hope of dividing the school funds among religious denominations. Catholics are bound to provide parochial schools, and they must also pay the regular state, county, and town taxes, which include the item of public schools.

They are, therefore, through their obedience to the church's orders to establish parochial schools, paying double for school purposes, as the church always makes its slaves pay for keeping them in slavery. The fight in Stearns county has thus been on their part to destroy the public schools, and in this they hav succeeded well. In many of the public schools the lessons are taught entirely in German, and in many more the German language is used in what the Press correspondent terms hap-hazard confusion with the English. Some of the teachers do not understand the English language at all, and many more not sufficiently well to teach it. In nearly three-fourths of the public schools the Catholic catechism is taught daily, and that during the lawful school hours. Sometimes the non-Catholic pupils are dismissed at 3 o'clock, rain or shine, while the resident priest takes up the matter of instruction in church doctrin. In other schools the first hour, from 9 to 10 o'clock, is taken for this religious training. This is done in a large majority of the country public schools of the county. Moreover, some of the schools are taught entirely by Benedictine sisters. In Lake Henry town there is now trouble over this phase of the question. In St. Martin it was voted at the regular school meeting this fall by a large majority to hav nine months' school, and the necessary funds were appropriated. It was then voted that during three months of this term the school should be conducted as a public school, and for the remaining six months by the sisters. At Richmond last August was held a German teachers' institute. This was conducted by the county superintendent, was attended only by German teachers, and the exercises were conducted largely in German. In St. Cloud the question was solved in 1875 by the Catholics quietly securing through the efforts of Ex-Lieutenant-Governor Gilman, then the representativ from that district, the passage of a bill establishing an independent school district in the northern and western part of the city, populated almost wholly by Catholics. In St. Cloud the church arranges the school holidays to suit the convenience of the priests, and during the summer they hav built two new parochial schools. The bishop of the diocese now proposes to reunite his independent district to the main district, and thus put upon the inhabitants of the main district the funded debt he has incurred in running the public schools as parochial schools. Such, says the Press report, is the state of the parochial-public school question in what is regarded as the strongest Catholic county in Minnesota. The church has for years had almost entirely its own way, and conducted matters to suit itself. By simply absorbing the public schools and running them at the public expense as church schools, it has avoided the unpleasant feature of double taxation, and achieved its own objects quite as effectivly.

Roman Catholicism has the wisdom born of the serpent's purpose, reinforced by centuries of experience. It will lie, steal, cheat, murder, or inaugurate a war, if necessary to its own well being. The people of Minnesota hav a difficult task on hand, and it does not now appear as though they realized it. Though the press report these outrages, no paper that we hav seen has a word of condemnation for the church or warning to the people. Perhaps they, too, are afraid of losing an advertisment.

New Zealand Secular State Schools.

It seems that the state schools of New Zealand, under the premiership of Hon. Robert Stout, Infidel, are secular and "godless," with no religious exercises and no Bible reading. This state of affairs is irritating, of course, to the Anglican bishops and rectors, and they hav begun a crusade, the object of which is to hav religion taught in the schools at the expense of the state. The only result so far achieved, however, is to show that the state schools are productiv of better morals among school children than denominational schools. In a public speech, attacking the schools, Bishop Nevill, of Otago, made these charges against the schoolboys:

"There was, alas! an amount of cruelty, an amount of hardness and selfishness, a want of tone, a want of delicacy, a want of gentleness, and want of refinement, which he could well wish were not to be found, as it undoubtedly was to be found, in a considerable preportion of the youth of our country."

And of the girls he said:

"He wished that was the worst that he could say, but, alas! he was told on authority he could not deny to be authoritativ and complete, that in the minds of the young girls of this country there was a want not only of such modesty as we desired, but a knowledge of evil aud an allowance of evil thoughts that exhibited itself in ways the most disgusting. He was not speaking of his own knowledge, but on testimony which he could not but admit; there was evidence of these things in words written, if not spoken, by the girls of this rising generation. When he heard such things and was bound to believe them, he could not but be appalled at the condition into which we were drifting."

The bishop's attack was considered of sufficient importance to notice, and a meeting of the school authorities was called to consider it. The teachers of the different schools were requested to come forward and tell what they knew of the conduct of their scholars. With no exception, they testified that among the twenty thousand scholars of the district implicated by the bishop there were exceptionally few bad boys, and no bad girls to speak of. Many of the teachers had been connected with religious schools, and they had had among their scholars a greater number of rogues, proportionately, of both sexes, than the secular schools of New Zealand. The evidence was conclusiv that the bishop spoke hastily and falsely. Parents, teachers, school committees hav with one consent, says the Otago Witness, taken up arms in defense of their daughters, and never before has such a tide of chivalrous indignation flowed through the columns of the daily press. The Witness adds: "It is highly satisfactory to learn on the testimony of half a score of head teachers and inspectors that the morality of children in the state schools is all but uniformly good. One criticism only occurs: If the teachers are right, larrikinism ought to be extinct. Is it extinct? One would like to hear what the police hav to say on that subject. One would also like to hear some explanation of the interesting fact mentioned by Mr. Mahoney, and confirmed by other teachers, that 'there was not half the difficulty in maintaining disciplin here that there was in the Victorian schools.' Does it lie in the difference of climate? Or is it because in Otago we hav longer escaped from the loose and muddling methods of denominationalism? Perhaps the latter would be Inspector Goyen's opinion, for he related that in Victoria he 'was connected with a school in which the Bible was read every day, and to which the clergyman came every week to giv religious instruction, and the boys there were the most troublesome young rascals he ever had to control.' The true quarrel of religionists with the state system, if they only knew it, is not that it neglects morality, but that it excludes religion. Non-religious morality is by no means a bad morality so far as it goes—it will keep you out of prison and help you to grow rich. It is thoroughly well taught in the state schools of New Zealand. When the Bible-in-schools party deny that fact they simply giv themselvs bound into the hands of their enemies. Why don't they take courage to say as the Catholics say, that morality of the very best state Socialist brand, however well taught, won't do for them—that they must hav religion? They are trying to sit upon two stools, which in this matter is not very different from trying to serve God and Mammon."

Friends of secular schools should giv Bishop Nevill a vote of thanks for bringing out these facts, and then pass a resolution of contempt for a churchman who can wickedly malign thousands of innocent school girls to satisfy a petty religious spite.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4.99, which please apply on my subscription; and will you be so kind as to tell me where in the scriptures I can find heaven described by metes and bounds, viz., the size of heaven according to the Bible?

MR. EDITOR: In the interest of peace and fraternal feeling I want to interfere in the controversy between G. N. Hill and Fred. Koezly. Evidently, if Hill owed Koezly $1,888, Koezly would not accept one package of money containing $1,600 and one containing $287 (or $1.887) for his debt.

The trouble with Koezly is that he wants to count the year completing the 1600 with the 287, which, added to 287, does giv 288, forgetting that he has left only 1,599 years of his first portion of time. "If all minds are clear, we will crave the divine blessing and be dismissed."

MADISONVILLE, KY., Sept. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send $5, for which please continue my paper till Aug. 16, 1888, and send the accompanying list of books. I hav been waiting to see a cartoon of God threatening to kill all the Israelites except Moses and Aaron and raising up a new people from them, and Moses scaring him out of it by telling what the Egyptians would say about it. I think this piece of holy writ is one of the finest specimens of God's (I mean Moses's God's) imbecility in all the Bible. Moses was decidedly the more astute of the two, and the narrativ makes God recognize the fact. I hope Heston will giv us the picture.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., Sept. 12, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for Sister Elmina's Defense Fund. I think that every lover of free thought, speech, press, and mails should help poor Elmina out of the clutches of that veritable blood-sucker, Comstock. If Elmina has been too radical in the opinion of some, let us be charitable, and remember that perfection was never yet attained by man, and very few women; let it not be a repetition of Messrs. Comstock, Britton, Benedict, Colgate & Co. I think her case is like poor D M. Bennett's; her persecution is not or obscenity, but because she is an Infidel, and I hope that we, as Infidels, will be able to rescue her from the teeth of those land-sharks. Hoping the day is near that ignorance, superstition, and the worship of a three-headed Jew God will be buried in oblivion, I remain as ever,

Yours for humanity, science, and progress, WM. THORPE.

CARIBOU, ME., Sept, 11, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Thanking you very sincerely, indeed, for past favors and indulgences upon me bestowed, in that you hav already published three letters from me, the first one being even before I was a subscriber to what I consider the leading Freethought paper of the world, I now come before you with the fourth one, sincerely hoping it may be given a snug little corner somewhere among the letters from friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER family, of whom I profess to be one.

I hav noticed and read a great many complimentary remarks from the various members of "our family," so I am not going to be very bashful nor stingy in bestowing where they are deserved some of my compliments. THE TRUTH SEEKER comes every week heavily loaded with what I accept as first-rate reading matter. I am as fond of it as I am of my cup of coffee and other things to go with it. Such a corps of able correspondents, too, makes it decidedly interesting.

Its editorials, too—well, I frequently laugh till the tears come while reading them. Which compliment, Mr. Editor, you will please accept in friendship, as coming from a radical friend who means what he says.

With regard to Aunt Elmina, I would like to ask in the name of an imaginary God how much longer the Infidels of this country hav got to stand such accursed nonsense as that, and be subjected to such diabolical treatment?

It makes my blood boil with indignation to think of Anthony Comstock and his band of miserable cohorts and their devilish actions. His name will go down to posterity blackened, if possible, more than that of the arch-traitor Benedict Arnold. I am surprised to see so many letters using such abusiv language. But, then, I suppose the editor cares about as much for them as I should for the bite of a black fly as compared with the sting of a hornet. I am a fond admirer of both Eugene and George—par nobile fratrum.

As I hav received various documents from various, after a letter of mine had appeared in your paper, I wish you would please do me the favor to print my post-office address as well as my name. Please excuse the profuse use I hav made of the personal pronoun I. H. H. GIBMAN,

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Last Sunday evening, at the request of one of my friends, who is a firm believer in the faith, I attended a Spiritualistic meeting at the corner of Seventh avenue and 52d street, your city. It being a rainy night, the hall was not overcrowded. There seems to be a little orthodoxy lingering in the Spiritualistic camp; at least, this is the candid opinion of one who belongs to neither of these "diverse and unlike schools of thought."

The speaker of the evening was Nellie J. Brigham, one of the ablest advocates of Spiritualism. The meeting opened with music and singing, followed by a lengthy and decidedly orthodox prayer. After this an elderly gentleman made a few remarks, saying that one of the subjects for next Sunday's lectures would be, "What and Where Is God?" I fancy this would be an interesting lecture for those who are out in the "chilling mists of unbelief." The gentleman then said that no one knew what the subject of the evening was, not even the speaker herself, but she would speak on whatever subject the controling spirits might suggest. The lady speaker then commenced her lecture in a fluent, graceful manner. In the course of her remarks she dwelt for a moment on the religion of Calvin, with its frightful doctrins of predestination and eternal pain and its lurid, sulphurous sermons that filled the quivering hearts of men with darkness and despair. During this vivid description of Calvinism I thought of the words of Ingersoll: "Of all the religions that hav ever been founded by the egotism, the malice, the ignorance and ambition of man, Presbyterianism is the most hideous."

Superstition, selfishness, ignorance, and pride are prisons where man's spiritual nature is dwarfed, perverted, or destroyed. These prisons cannot be entirely obliterated, but under the brilliant light of Spiritualism, it was claimed, the walls can be extended or enlarged.

In conclusion, several poems were recited upon subjects given then and there by some one in the audience. Some of the poetry was very beautiful and expressiv. The audience then arose and solemnly sang, "There s a Christians' home in glory," after which a benediction was pronounced and the meeting ended.

HOLDEN, Mo., Sept. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Recently the Christian church held its annual lectureship at Warrensburg, in this county. One of their ablest preacher, Elder Coke, of Nevada, Mo., lectured to that large concourse of preachers and laymen cn the "Divinity of Christ." In the course of his lecture he said: "The old delusion that Christ was born of a virgin is too absurd for any preacher to preach, or anybody to believe." Score one for the Christians, or Campbellites, for they are coming into the penumbra of reason ahead of all the churches, while the Presbyterian is bringing up the rear with its load of stereotyped Puritan dogmas, with the Baptists only a neck in their lead. Lately the latter church, or the women or sisters of it, held a meeting in this town to raise money for foreign missions; it appears that one devout sister slipped into the cloak room and stole the money that had been left in those garments by nearly all the sisters present. They spotted the sister, and had a row in the church. Moral: Pagans, who are not so prone to steal, would better teach the Christians.

I think the Shaker affair is noticed and approbated too much by a few Liberals. I am in favor of letting the old woman down easy, but she is not in the list of martyrs.

Keep THE TRUTH SEEKER before the public. I hav no Anarchist nor Socialistic leanings, but most of your articles, as well as those of a majority of your contributors, are so good that I can't do without the paper. I subscribe for several Liberal periodicals. I read and distribute to friends. We hav no means of getting rid of superstition equal to education, and the best means of educating the people on the subject of religion is to put choice reading matter into their hands. We must not be afraid nor ashamed to show the advantages of reason over ignorance—of Secular thought over revealed falsehoods—of right over wrong. The Liberals of Holden are on top.

C. L. CARTER, M.D.

CHILLICOTHE, Mo., Sept. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: While I delight to style myself a Freethinker, I must dissent from some of the views expressed by Mr. J. H. Wood, in his communication printed it THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 3d. In substance, he denies that the Constitution, framed by the fathers, preserved the precious fruits of freedom and self-government, and affirms that the American people hav, in fact, notwitstanding the fine theories of the Declaration of Independence, always been slaves; first the people of the colonies were the slaves of Great Britain; that during the war of the Revolution they were slaves of the colonial government; and that since their independence from England was achieved, they hav been slaves of the government of the United States.

In support of these startling assertions the writer only adduces these facts: that negro slavery existed in the colonies, as it did in some of the states, till abolished by the civil war; and that the American people are taxed to support their local, state, and national government.

Now, sir, I hav always believed with Charles Botta, the Italian historian, that the colonies enjoyed more freedom than any other people on earth, despite the restrictions England imposed to prevent them from building up manufactures. I hav grown up to believe that the Declaration, in which Jefferson formulated the principles laid down in the pamphlets of Thomas Paine, and the Constitution, framed by the fathers, taken together, are about the best framework on which to construct a really free government, "of the people, by the people, and for the people," that this earth has ever seen.

It is true slavery was permitted to exist for a time, though Jefferson abhorred it and predicted its extinction. He sowed the seed of liberty when he declared all men to be created free and equal in their inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. These great ideas germinated and grew until they brought about the death of negro slavery.

With all its imperfections, the government, framed by the fathers, has, in my humble opinion, conferred more true happiness upon the masses than any other which has ever existed. Nowhere else has the poor man enjoyed so fair a chance to better his condition as in the land of Washington and Franklin, where the humblest-born workers and toilers hav risen to be senators and presidents of the people.

That the people hav been misgoverned at times is doubtless true. In the great cities, where great ignorance and vice are found, there has been great corruption. But, after all, the people, armed with the ballot, are the source of power, and the remedy for all evils lies in their hands, when, through proper education, they know how to rightly use it.

I cannot conceive how organized society can exist without a government of liberty regulated by law, nor how any government can be supported except by taxation of the people.

JAMES GRAHAM.

CONCORD, N. C., Sept. 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I think it a duty we owe to our fellow-man and to society to report and expose every act of the preachers of the several sects or creeds when they go astray or fall from grace. This would be fighting the devil with his own fire, and would make an interesting book, amusing and instructiv. Let some poor mortal, man or woman, be so unfortunate as to make a wrong step, who bounces them more quickly than the man of God—unless he or she has plenty of money—who thinks he holds the check-reins of heaven, and can forgiv sins, and bring down curses on those whom he does not like? A few years since (1880), Saint James's Evangelical Lutheran church, of this town, called to the pastorage of said church Rev. S. T. Hallman. Mr. Hallman had a wife, and one son of the dude make-up. Rev. Mr. Hallman preached, and visited among his hearers, among whom were a widow and two daughters; in his devotion to the widow and the orphan he visited them every day. The tongues of his members and members of other churches became loose and caused a lively breeze in town, such a breeze as common sense, reason, and decency demanded to cause a reaction for the public good and the good of society. Rev. Mr. Hallman became angry, but continued to preach and continued his daily visits to the widow's house and her daughters. On the 9th day of June, 1882, it pleased God to remove by death from time to eternity Mrs. Hallman. In less than three days Rev. S T. Hallman took to his home the widow and her two daughters. This was caring for the widow and the orphans and at the same time helping to soothe sorrow and heal a broken heart. This act of kindness, of love, caused many of the Christian ladies of the town to shake their heads ominously when the subject was mentioned, as if there were something in this act of love not warranted by church doctrin, and public sentiment raised her still voice very loud against such an action, as being in indecent haste. Rev. S. T. Hallman and the widow's daughter married, and in a few weeks after moved to South Carolina, and he continues to warn sinners that they are on the broad road to hell.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In an editorial or associate editorial of the 10th inst., under the caption of "They are all Good Sectarians," you say: "Mr. Major is a Canadian, and formerly adhered to the sect known as Roman Catholic" I write to forestall the haughty but inconsequent claim Father Lambert et id omne genus will most likely fling at you, that "the Catholic church is the church; all the other churches are but sects from the living body of the same, and therefore, in the order of things, must die, as limbs lopped from a living tree." A figure "sadly lacking in logic," as Lambert says Lacy's answer to him is, for, in the order of things, trees may die too. N.B.—The Catholic church is not as old as some of the Eucalyptus globulus trees now standing in Australia, or some of the Sequoia gigantea trees still standing in Nevada, etc. The sophistry of their claim is in the use of "sect" by synecdoche for ex-sect, as proven by their claim that the Phocian churches, Greek and Russian, are not "sects" because they hav still "the apostolic succession," which the Protestant churches hav not, but they dub the Phocian "schisms." Now all may not know that sect and schism are both derived from the same Latin verb, meaning "to cut." To illustrate by a parallel from "the shop," we (surgeons) exsect a limb or an excrescence when we separate it from the living or dead body; but when we cut off the bones or parts of bones constituting an elbow, say, we call it a rescision or resection. The "apostolic succession" of the nerves and blood vessels which are not cut sustains the life of the forearm. To return to "the sects," viz., the parts cut off—query, if one part of a body be cut off from another part of the same, which is the sect or sectum? Necessarily the smaller part. If so, then your townsman, my revered teacher and friend, Dr. T. Gaillard Thomas (who talks like an angel and writes like Old Noll, to transpose Garrick's antemortum obituary of Dr. Oliver Goldsmith at a time when it was "the fad" of those choice spirits of "the Augustine age of Literature" under Queen Elizabeth's reign to epitaph each other. The one above paraphrased was, in effect:

> Alas! here lie the remains of poor Noll,
> Who wrote like an angel, and talked like "poor Poll!")

—I was saying, a year or so ago Dr. Gaillard Thomas, of your city, exsected a lady of seventy-five pounds weight from an ovarian tumor weighing one hundred pounds. Corollary: The woman, being the sect, ought, in Catholic logic, to hav had the good grace to shuffle off the mortal coil post haste after shuffling off the immortal tumor.

In re Frederick Koezly vs. "Boston's great mathematical genius, G. N. Hill," I would modestly observe that 1,600 years subtracted from 1,887 years leave 287 years. Does Professor Hill call the present century the eighteenth century or the nineteenth century? If the former, then "argal," the year 150 was in the first century, and by corollary the year 50 was in the century below zero. If s-o-x don't spell socks, what do it spell?

In re "mottoes for Freethinkers," if you havn't struck off in card-form, "Damn others as you'd wish to be damned yourself"—one that struck me square on the pineal gland, as old Homer would hav phrased it, as per your issue of the last week ultimo or first week instant—pray supply the missing link without procrastination. I was caught without it at the point of death from acute rheumatism of the heart some months ago to hurl at the head of a female rich relativ who was demonstrating to me that "God, who had been a God of love to" me "in life would," I would find, "be in death a God of justice." Pardon my brevity and prey for me—upon the marrow of missionaries.

Yours in mild-mannered sympathy,

GEO. S. KING, M.D.

THOMPSONTOWN, PA., Sept. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: P'ease find inclosed $2, and send me one of Mr. C. Eckhard's Nine Demands for $1, and as many of Mr. L. R. Smith's "Personal Existence After Death Improbable" as you giv for the other $1. There are about seventy-five thousand men employed, at high salaries, for the purpose of hammering into the minds of humanity the fact of a personal state of existence after this life, etc., having for their principal foundation a book called the Bible, which, however, absolutely disproves this fact. For the trifling sum of ten cents anyone can obtain Mr. L. R. Smith's book, which so ably shows up the other side of this question—namely, "Personal Existence After Death Improbable," and proves this fact, not only by sound reasoning, but by the very Bible itself. There are many clever Liberals seemingly free from the old dogma, yet who are loth to relinquish the claim of "personal existence after death." Even after the acceptance of the "ordinary law of evidence and good sense," a continued life (though quite uncertain of that being a pleasant one) is universally desired and expected. Life! yes, life, though every moment of it be miserable, is tenaciously clung to. Everything proving itself a burden is not worth possessing. How sweet is rest after toil! and the less consciousness the sweeter the rest! JAY F. HALDEMAN.

NEW YORK, Sept. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Of what value, in your opinion, are statistics as to the relativ prosperity of a nation under free trade and under protection? If Professor Denslow could show that this country is a gainer, financially, by the protectiv tariff, that would not prove that any officer of the law or anybody else has a right to open your trunk and to overhaul and tax its contents when there is no reason for supposing that it contains anything for which you hav not paid to the previous owner a satisfactory sum of your own money. If the prosperity of a nation rests on that kind of brigandage, then let the nation go to the devil.

A community of thieves is more prosperous, of course, when certain of their number are allowed to put their hands in your pocket and take a percentage of its contents, but that does not, to my mind, make it altogether clear that the tax is just. A highwayman sees his best times when he is permitted to levy toll on passengers rather than when he is not protected in that industry; nevertheless there is a popular objection against highwaymen. This objection arises, however, from the fact that the highwayman is a private individual instead of a government official. Otherwise the objection would vanish at once before the arguments and statistics of Professor Denslow. Nothing, it seems to me, could so contribute to the prosperity of a nation as to grab everything; for if a government has a right to tax an import one per cent it has a right to tax it one hundred per cent, or to confiscate it, or to exclude it altogether, and to hang the importer as a pirate. It is a difference in degree merely, and if the financial prosperity of the nation, to any extent, depends on hanging a few persons every day, string them up! Such is the logic of protection. The state of New Jersey is about one hundred dollars more prosperous since it fined a man for "blasphemy;" therefore the prosperity of New Jersey depends upon the fining of blasphemers, as the growth of a plant depends upon sunlight. This is a powerful argument, truly.

Of course the exclusion of foreign goods from our ports has a depressing effect upon foreign industry. But breathes there a man with soul so dead he ever to himself hath said, "The world is my country?" If such there be, he is not a protectionist.

It is my belief that it does not contribute to the wealth of a country to exclude from it anything that is valuable. We grow rich by what we acquire from others instead of by what others acquire from us. A country gains in material substance from what is put into it, namely, imports, rather than from what is taken out of it, namely, exports. The importer carries away with him nothing but money, and we should not begrudge him that when we hav his goods, to purchase which is the only office that money is capable of discharging. It is less strengthening to a man to exhaust his own resources by rejecting food than to husband them by eating. To exclude goods is to reject food. To eat is to import. I hold, then, that the importer is a nation's benefactor, since he adds to its material substance, while the exporter is the opposit, since he lessens that substance. Hence the importer should be encouraged. Why not giv him a premium on his imports? And why not discourage the exporter by all means possible? It looks to me as though the present system is an inversion of the right one. I cannot help adding that the tariff, so far as it professes to protect American industry, is, in certain instances, a palpable humbug. For example, an American living in London has his portrait painted by a distinguished artist. Shortly thereafter he dies. His friends at home desire the picture, but must smuggle it ashore or pay a duty on it. Who is thereby protected? A while ago a showman imported a young hippopotamus, and paid a thousand dollars duty on him. Was this designed to protect the American hippopotamus industry, and has that industry thrived or languished more or less since that time? The tariff hacks should be shrewd enough to abolish these more obvious humbug excrescences on their system, and even then, though people might not see it so clearly, the system would be none the less a humbug. NEW YORK, Sept. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Hill writes: "As betting or any other form of gambling is against my principles, I will consequently accept the offer," etc. Where the consequence comes in I cannot see, but as long as he accepts my offer I will not stickle or be too particular about his meaning, and hereby deposit with you, Mr. Editor, $25, in the hope that Mr. Hill will do the same, as he accepts the offer, and leave the decision to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The question in dispute to decide is: "If a calendar is started from and with the first day of January, 1600, what is the number of the year to count now?" Now, as soon as Mr. Hill has deposited his $25, then, Mr. Editor, please giv to your readers and to the public in general your answer or decision to the above question. Mr. Hill's article of Sept. 1, "287," shows that he is so confused that he does not know what he writes, much less what he reads, and, of course, does not know and could not tell and giv the reason why "at the beginning of every century leap year is omitted, except every fourth century, 1600, 2000, etc., being leap years, and the intervening three centuries exempt from the common rule."

That Mr. Hill should want to prop up and prove by this quotation that his figuring is correct shows his unfitness for calendar making. Mr. Hill is the only person I ever heard from that claims the year 1600 for the seventeenth century; also that begins a century's first year to count with 0, the second year 1, third year 2, and so on till he has a hundred years with the figures 99. What a great mathematical genius this "sensible young man" of Boston is!

I do not and will not tempt anyone to gamble. I am also not a gambler. But betting as a punishment for years of long, wilful, stubborn indocility is about the last means to end a long controversy. This is not a gambling bet if the winner does not pocket the profit, but givs it for a good cause.

In hope of speedy decision, without fear or favor, I remain, Yours, FREDK. KOEZLY.

[It will be seen by the foregoing that the controversy over the E. S. Calendar between Messrs. Koezly, of this city, and Hill, of Boston, has waxed very warm. The proposition now is, made by Mr. Koezly in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 10th, that both gentlemen shall place $25 in the hands of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who shall decide the question. If Mr. Hill wins, he can hav the $25 to pocket or giv to the Investigator if he chooses, as he formerly proposed. If Mr. Koezly wins, Mr. Hill's money is to go to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Hill, in our issue of September 17th, accepts the proposition to leave it to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but says nothing about putting up cash, as he is opposed to betting. As the proposition now stands, it might look like a bribe to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but, of course, Mr. Hill knows that individual to be above sordid considerations! Besides, this matter is not a bet or wager, but a short and easy method of dispensing charity. We are waiting to hear from Mr. Hill, to the end that the Investigator may place another share of Paine Hall stock in its safe, or THE TRUTH SEEKER hav a few dollars to help pay rent in this long but narrow and wicked city.—T. S.]

LEXINGTON, KY., Sept. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The churches here are beginning vigorously to prop up their waning cause. They feel that not a moment is to be lost. What would they effect at this juncture without evangelists, music, and other sensational methods of bringing the people together, like any other theater? But the holiest clergymen bring about no reforms, unless their heads are heaped up high in benevolent form, like that of Bennett or Wilberforce, and then they leave their pulpits, and bring all their influence for good to a focus in some common-sense way. "Fret not because of evil-doers," the salary business will finish them. The richest churches in this region refuse to pay the preacher's wages.

I noticed in the life of Luther, from the German, that to be popular with the rich he was obliged to denounce the peasantry, classing them with brutes, and his treatment of them was heartless and cruel. George O. Barnes, the noted revivalist, is lecturing to us nightly. He has made only one sensible remark that I know of, and that is that God does not send afflictions as a means of grace, being thus in some sense the author of evil. From this I infer that he is one of Job's comforters. But, lo! the devil comes to the rescue, with hoof and horns. "He is willing to bear the blame of the world's ruin, so he can be master," and as he is generally considered chief cook and bottle-washer in human affairs, God had better take a back seat. Job was to blame himself. Barnes's sermon last night was a wild jumble of false theology and budding Infidelity. He affirmed that Cain took a wife from a race already existing upon the earth—a match without sympathy, I should say. He forgot the chasms between races and creations, for Nature must prepare her physiological atoms for a fresh and more vigorous effort. A friend just told me that "by my neglect of religion I incurred a great risk." See how fear pays the clergyman's board. "The fear of hell's the hangman's whip, but when you feel your honor grip," that is an important matter, and worthy of attention.

Clergymen often remark that Epictetus, Cleanthes, and Seneca could never guide us to heaven. They ought rather to be ashamed that nothing but fanaticism can arouse the human mind from its stupid condition of indifference to something which partakes of the elements of higher thought and feeling.

With regard to the Constitution, it seems that Alexander Hamilton was the first who suggested the idea, and from the life of Patrick Henry and other prominent men of that period we learn how wise men pondered hours and days, as did the people also, over that mighty subject. I do not think clerical minds helped to frame that instrument. If they did, will some wiseacre come out and produce the necessary information?

Speaking of fanaticism, great minds are alwavs calm. Witness the massiv courage of Socrates, Henry Clav, and Lincoln. This is anything but a nation of Stoics. It is a nation halting between two opinions, whether to deteriorate or become strong and excel. The ethereal god Hermes was represented in sculpture massiv and strong as Hercules. Materialism, in France and other nations, is a first stage in a constitution destined to be highly refined. In France, the constant use of wine as a beverage, instead of water, hinders the severity of morals.

Nations will continue to sink until their virtues become heroic and they are able to govern themselvs. Women rise higher in the scale of morality every century; shall not men make a determined effort, also, to arrest the decline of the present race of human beings? Are self-indulgence and power twin stars? What redeemed India from moral oblivion but the purity of the priests of Brahma? There are priests among the despised Catholics who are holy and pure. "He trusts me," "She has full confidence in me," is sufficient to hinder a person from doing wrong. The man hankering after luxuries and excesses is in no sense reliable. If any passion has full dominion over him, though noble in his nature, beware of him. His weakness is a sea which threatens to overwhelm all his virtues. Said Emerson, "Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of your own mind." The man who betrays himself will forsake his country in her hour of need. The hand of industry saves us from want; but the honest defender of Freethought holds the universe between his palms, and the gods own him for their superior.

TALENT, OR., Sept. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It is with great pleasure that I read THE TRUTH SEEKER and see its pictorial illustrations. I realize that it is hastening "the good time coming." S. P. Putnam gave ten lectures in this neighborhood, but each of them was like a shining meteor, dazzling for a moment, only to disappear. There is no effort for the formation of a Secular League, although there liv in Ashland alone one hundred persons who hav announced themselvs as Freethinkers, and I believe that there are double that number in Jackson county. But there needs some object more than the Nine (abstract) Demands to excite interest in the public at large. The great mass know but little, and care less, about untaxed churches, but they know enough of underpaid labor and of starvation for lack of remunerativ work.

Now, as the Secular League Congress which is advertised to meet at Chicago next month will be composed of some of the most advanced minds of the age, permit me to suggest an enlargement of their sphere of action so as to include the inalienable rights of all the people, irrespectiv of race or sex. It does mean this, but it does not directly express the strongest points for immediate action.

The Secular League has not one word for the equal rights of women, who form the biggest and best portion of the people. It has not one word in behalf of the equal rights of the race from which we hav derived our country, our Indian corn, and two (Jefferson and Randolf) of the signers of the Declaration of American Independence; the race which has suffered martyrdom for generations because it repels the superstitions and perversions of a (so-called) Christian civilization of which the following is only one among scores of similar proofs. Lindslay Applegate pioneered the emigrants upon a new route two thousand miles to Oregon in 1826. He was the first agent and interpreter for the Klamath and Modoc Indians, and after years of uniform success, during which eight hundred acres of land was improved, and when he was discharged on account of being a Freethinker there was upon the reserve, officially reported, twenty-five hundred bushels of grain, with an abundance of roots and vegetables, all of which was raised by the Indians, who were not only able but ambitious for self-sustainment. Methodist missionaries succeeded Lindslay Applegate with annual contracts like the following, which I cut from a recent paper:

Says the Klamath county Star: The contract to furnish beef, flour, wheat, oats, and barley for the Klamath Indian reservation in this county has been awarded to the following named parties: John F. Miller, 68,000 pounds of beef at $6 98 per 100 pounds; G. W. Smith, flour, 68,000 pounds at $2 60 per 100 pounds; Geo. T. Baldwin, 10,000 pounds of oats at $1 95 per 100 pounds; O. A. Stearns, 1,200 pounds of wheat at $2.23 per 100 pounds; Felix Kahn, 2,500 pounds of barley at $2 25 per 100 pounds.

Is not this a proof of imposition alike upon the Indians and upon the taxpayers? And is it not of more importance to stop it than to get any of the Nine Demands? Yes, because every citizen who does not vote against it givs his sanction to the wrong.

All the rights which are dear to humanity are denied to these Indians. Three of them hav lately been shot merely because they protested against frauds. Quite a number of them came to Ashland to invoke the aid of their old friend Applegate. But he had no official authority. So the same spirit which prompted the exclamation, "Giv us liberty or giv us death," prompted them to assume an attitude of self-defense, which so frightened the agent that he also came to Lindslay Applegate, whose advice being taken, peace for the present is preserved. It was the substitution of a religious teacher, together with official neglect of the subscriber's report, that caused the Modoc war and its cost of $3,000,000 and the slaughter of General Canby and two hundred others.

I therefore respectfully ask that the Secular League Congress will demand the abolishment of the present system of Indian management; also of the laws by which D. M. Bennett, Dr. Foote, Mrs. Slenker, and others hav been prosecuted. Respectfully, JOHN BEESON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Petition.

O Mother Earth! Dear Mother Earth!
Giv me your blossoms, white and red,
To w ave a garland for my head;
Giv me your yellow daffodils,
The blooms which whiten all your hills,
The small sweet Mayflowers 'neath your trees,
The pale anemones.

O Mother Earth! Dear Mother Earth!
Giv me the many tangled vines
Which creep among your fragrant pines,
Those dark, mysterious leaves in vain
Shrinking to hide their bloody stain:
The pale blue violets and the white—
Your heart's delight.

O Mother Earth! Dear Mother Earth!
Giv me the key to those sweet tunes
Your breezes play; the ancient runes
Your tall pines sing in monotone,
The meaning of the ocean's moan—
That the sweet spirit of harmony
May dwell with me. PANSY.

Children.

Come to me, O ye children;
For I hear you at your play,
And the questions that perplex me
Hav vanished quite away.

Ye open the eastern windows,
That look toward the sun,
Where thoughts are singing swallows,
And the brooks of morning run.

In your hearts are birds and sunshine,
In your thoughts the brooklets flow,
But in mine is the wind of autumn,
And the first fall of the snow.

Ah! what would the world be to us,
If the children were no more?
We should dread the desert behind us
Worse than the dark before.

What the leaves are to the forest,
With light and air for food,
Ere their sweet and tender juices
Hav been hardened into wood,

That to the world are children;
Through them it feels the glow
Of a brighter and sunnier clime,
That reaches the trunks below.

Come to me, O ye children,
And whisper in my ear,
What the birds and the winds are singing
In your sunny atmosphere.

For what are all our contrivings,
And the wisdom of our books,
When compared with your caresses
And the gladness of your looks?

Ye are better than all the ballads
That ever were sung or said;
For ye are living poems,
And all the rest are dead.

—Longfellow.

Prize Essays.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I would be pleased if you will assist me in formulating a plan that will encourage and stimulate the young people of your "Corner" to a better understanding of the principles of Freethought.

I believe it to be a duty we each owe a common good, that we endeavor to instill in their young minds the glorious truths of universal mental liberty, that the seeds now sown may bud and blossom in the sweet sunlight of a new and freer life. To encourage them to this end I will, with your approval, offer a few small prizes, of say, first prize, $3; second, $2; third, $1, in cash or books as winner may desire, open to all boys and girls under 16 years of age, for the best paper on "Why I am a Liberal."

I will trust to the honesty of our young Liberal friends to receive no material assistance from their older brothers and sisters or parents, but wish it to be the result of their own efforts, observations, and ideas.

If successful, I will offer small prizes frequently on different subjects. I trust you will make all the necessary arrangements governing contest, appointing of judges, etc., and hope to hear from you if you hav any suggestions to offer.

Yours very truly, B. H. MARLETT.

[The above offer from a friend of the Children's Corner is an excellent one. Now, dear children, please show your apprecia ion of Mr. Marlett's kindness by sending in the very best essay on the subject named—"Why I am a Liberal." Time, two months from present date of TRUTH SEEKER. Send all essays to the editor of the Corner, at Fall River, Mass., where they will be forwarded to Mr. Marlett for his inspection and decision if he desires. All essays will be printed whether receiving prizes or not.—ED. C. C.]

Correspondence.

BUFFALO, Sept. 16, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I missed the Children's Corner very much, and was very scrry to learn the cause. We liv between two tracks. A great many are killed on the railroad track. I go across the track every night with milk, my ma watching me till I get home. My pa cuts up THE TRUTH SEEKER, takes the best pieces, and givs me the Children's Corner. I hav two books pasted through. Your little friend,

IDA A. BALLOU.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Sept. 19, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As it has been a long time since I bothered you with a letter, I will bother you once more, if you hav no objection. I still read the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and gladly pronounce it one of the ablest and best journals published anywhere I find by reading the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER that your dearly beloved mother has lately died. The Children's Corner, always so bright and lively, was a few days ago dimmed by the sad headline, "Bereaved by Death." I glanced over the note and soon found out the sad tale. You hav my heartfelt sympathy.

Yours truly, G. J. REMSBURG.

NORTH SYDNEY, CAPE BRETON, Sept. 18, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER so many letters from boys and girls, I thought I would write one too.

My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years, and I like it very much. I hav four sisters and one brother. I go to school every day. I am eight years old. I study geography, grammar, history, reading, spelling, and arithmetic.

We keep a general store, and carry on millinery and dressmaking.

Cape Breton is noted for its coal and fish. We are two miles from North Sydney mine, which is noted for its good coal. About five hundred large ocean steamers through the summer sail into this port for coal, coming from Norway, Germany, and all parts of Europe. Your Freethinker friend,

MAUD L. MAFFATT.

OTTUMWA, IA., Sept. 17, 287.

DEAR GIRLS AND BOYS: With Miss Wixon's permission I will address you through the Children's Corner. Owing to the many duties I must perform I cannot address you as frequently as I should like, but now, since I learned of our beloved teacher's bereavement, I feel that I must lay aside all other duties, and extend words of sympathy to all.

Little ones, this letter may seem sad to you, but so it must be. My heart bleeds for our noble friend whose life has so often been darkened by the clouds of misfortune.

As the gigantic steamer, freighted with human lives, is borne across the briny ocean, now gently rocked by murmuring winds that guide her aright on the almost boundless waters, or again hurled hither and thither with terrific force, as if nature were determined to bring destruction to her offspring, and blast the aspirations of thousands of beings—just so is it with our lives.

As we bound over the great ocean of life, how varied the winds which guide us on and on! Often there are breathed into our existence the balmy breezes of hope and joy, when the sky about us is bright and cheerful, when all nature seems to conspire to bring happiness to the wanderer, and guide him safely throughout life's voyage; it may seem so for awhile, but softly—silently at first—springs a gale from some unlooked for region, and all at once our aspirations are vanished as if in a dream; all that seemed bright a short time before is obscured by wind and cloud, and discouragements press thick and fast upon us.

Often hav I myself encountered these adverse winds, and doubtless it is, therefore, I so truly sympathize with the oppressed and unfortunate.

Sympathy is the brightest blossom which grows in the heart of mankind; therefore, boys and girls, endeavor to carefully cultivate it, that you may always be ready to brighten the pathway of those who hav been less fortunate in the pursuits of life, or who hav clasped the icy hand of loved ones whom Death has borne away.

Now, little friends, let us unite in extending to this afflicted family—one of whom is especially dear to us—our heartfelt sympathy.

To our beloved teacher we say, May the sun of hope ever shed upon you its brightest rays, and may the seeds of justice and love, which you hav helped to implant in our minds, blossom into noble manhood and womanhood. KATIE KEHM.

[We thank our friend Katie for the above kind and sympathetic letter. The tender sympathy that comes from many hearts helps us to liv through this darkest, saddest hour of life's cloudy day. Dear friends, we thank you, one and all.—ED. C. C.]

The World's Largest Cities.

In order to furnish, for reference, information on a subject often inquired about, the New York Journal of Commerce has compiled the annexed table of the largest cities of the world, with their populations, as stated by the latest publications. The table has a foot-note, which says: "Many of the Chinese cities were enormously over-estimated a few years ago. We hav given the latest estimates by the best authorities, but in the absence of the official census the figures may be accepted only as an approximate calculation. It will be seen that there are thirty-five cities in the world credited with a population at or above half a million."

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

The New Hail Columbia.

Written for the Centennial Celebration in Philadelphia.

1798.

Hail Columbia! Happy land!
Home of heroes, heaven born band,
Who fought and bled in Freedom's cause,
Who fought and bled in Freedom's cause,
And, when the storm of war was gone,
Enjoyed the peace their valor won.
Let independence be our boast,
Ever mindful what it cost;
Ever grateful for the prize,
Let its altar reach the skies.

Firm, united, let us be,
Rallying round our Liberty.
As a band of brothers joined,
Peace and safety we shall find.

1887.

Look our ransomed shores around,
Peace and safety we hav found!
Welcome, friends, who once were foes,
Welcome, friends, who once were foes,
To all the conquering years hav gained
A nation's rights, a race unchained!
Children of the dav new born,
Mindful of its glorious morn,
Let the pledge our fathers signed
Heart to heart forever bind!

While the stars of heaven shall burn,
While the ocean tides return,
Ever may the circling sun
Find the Many still are One!

Graven deep with edge of steel,
Crowned with Victory's crimson seal,
All the world their names shall read!
All the world their names shall read!
Enrolled with his hosts that led,
Whose blood for us, for all, was shed.
Pay our sires their children's debt,
Love and honor; nor forget
Only Union's golden key
Guards the Ark of Liberty!

While the stars of heaven shall burn,
While the ocean tides return,
Ever may the circling sun
Find the Many still are One!

Hail, Columbia, strong and free,
Firm enthroned from sea to sea!
Thy march triumphant still pursue!
Thy march triumphant still pursue!
With peaceful stride from zone to zone,
And make the Western land thine own!
Blest in the Union's holy ties,
Let our grateful song arise,
Every voice its tribute lend,
In the loving chorus blend!

While the stars in heaven shall burn,
While the ocean tides return,
Ever shall the circling sun
Find the Many still are One!

Lucy and Me.

LOUISVILLE, KY., Sept. 19. 1887.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER. Sir: The inclosed exquisit little gem was memorized away back in the forties. I hav always given Tom Moore as the author. As it does not appear in any edition of his works, perhaps some reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER may be able to giv its parentage. WM. E. RENWICK

They may rail at this life from the hour I began it,
I've found it a life full of kindness and bliss,
And until you can show me some happier planet,
More social and bright, I'll content me with this;
For as long as this earth has such eloquent eyes,
As before me this moment enraptured I see,
They may say what they will of their orbs in the skies,
But this earth is the planet for Lucy and me.

In that star of the west by whose shadowy splendor
At evening so often we've roamed o'er the dew,
There are maidens, perhaps, who hav hearts that's as tender,
And look in their twilight as lovely as you;
But though they were even more bright than the queen
Of that isle they inhabit in heaven's blue sea,
As I never those fair young celestials hav seen,
Why, this earth is the planet for Lucy and me.

In Mercury's star, where each minute can bring them
New sunshine and wit from the fountain on high,
Their nymphs may hav livelier poets to sing them,
But none, even there, more enamored than I.
For as long as this heart can be wakened with love,
And I its divine inspiration can be,
They may say what they will of their Edens above,
But this earth is the planet for Lucy and me.

As for those chilly orbs on the verge of creation,
Where sunshine and wit must be equally rare,
If they want a supply of cold hearts for that station
I am sure there are plenty on earth we can spare;
Just think what a world we should hav of it here
If the haters of peace and affection and glee
Should all fly off to Saturn's comfortless sphere,
And leave earth to such spirits as Lucy and me.

Book Notes.

Volume I. of "Crimes of Christianity" has been issued by the Progressiv Publishing Company, of London. The authors are G. W. Foote and J. M. Wheeler, the former the editor of the Freethinker, the latter an indefatigable delver into the history of the past as recorded in books. With Mr. Wheeler's facts, ornamented by the rhetoric of both himself and Mr. Foote, it is not hard to believe that the present volume is a work at once valuable and interesting. As Americans are not permitted to acquire information from foreigners without paying a premium for it, this book cannot be sold in New York for less than $1. In London it is about 60 cents.

"The Struggle for Religious and Political Liberty." By Theodore C. Spencer. All sorts of religions and all sorts of religionists pass in review in the pages of this book. Pagans and Jews, Mormons and Mohammedans, Puritans and Pilgrims, Catholics and Huguenots, and several Protestant churches receive attention, while Martin Luther and John Calvin, the wrongs of Ireland and American slavery, are freely discussed. The historical review ends with the prophecy that the day is not far distant when the human mind will throw off the trammels of religious dogmatism and the shackles of political despotism, and truth will triumph gloriously, and the freedom of man in all things secular and spiritual will be universal. New York: The Truth Seeker Company.—Home Journal.

The records of the southern district of New York contain the following entry:

BE IT REMEMBERED, That on the 3d day of November, A D. 1829. in the 54th year of the Independence of the United States of America, ABNER KNEELAND, of the said District, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author, in the words following, to wit:

"A Review of the Evidences of Christianity, in a Series of Lectures, delivered in Broadway Hall, New York, August, 1829. To which is prefixed an Extract from Wittenbach's Opuscula on the ancient notices of the Jewish Nation, previous to the time of Alexander the Great. By Abner Kneeland. 'Prove all things, hold fast that which is good.'—Paul."

In this book Mr. Kneeland went over the so-called evidences of Christianity from the days of Christ down through the times of the Christian fathers, demolishing them with a vigor that has not been exceeded since. The work is now in its tenth edition, Mr. Kneeland's successors, Messrs. Seaver and Mendum, having recently published a new one. Others hav elaborated the points touched upon by the author, but he was sufficiently thorough to effect the purpose of the work; and "Evidences of Christianity" does for the Christian fathers what the "Age of Reason" did for the prophets and apostles; namely, throws their testimony out as worthless, and demolishes the structure built upon it.

The second Appendix of the work, being twelve pages which originally appeared in Vol. I. of the Boston Investigator, is not by any means the least interesting part of the book. It is made up of some letters addressed to the editor of the Trumpet, and givs Mr. Kneeland's views on the subject of Marriage, which are sufficiently radical to be sensible. The appendix also reveals that Mr. Kneeland was a spelling reformer. He givs a good article in the kind of type that he would like to see adopted, and points out that 10 per cent is thus saved in space, which would be of itself, he says, an object worth gaining, but is "nothing in comparison with the time it would save in learning children to spell." Modern grammarians would say that Mr. Kneeland here misuses the word learning for teaching, but as he shows evidence of being something of a grammarian himself, it is probable that the verb learn was so used in his day. The present edition contains a likeness of the author, and sells for $1.

In 1831 Mr. Kneeland writes that the "work has now been before the public two years, during which time two editions hav been sold, of five hundred copies each, and no attempt has been made either to answer its objections or to prove its reasoning false." Fifty-six years later, after ten editions hav been issued, and after the author has slept in his grave for nearly half a century, the same remark holds true. And the reason is the same now as then—there is no answer to be made save what answer falsehood can make to truth.

Soon after Mr. John D. Shaw, of Waco, withdrew from the ministry of the Methodist church, on account of his change of views regarding the divine origin of the Christian religion, he published a pamphlet, entitled "The Bible—What Is It?" In this work he went over the whole field suggested by the query, giving first the answers of the orthodox divines under six heads, which he afterward took up succinctly and tested their truthfulness by an examination of the Bible itself in the light of reason and history. Finding these definitions unsatisfactory, the last chapter was devoted to a rational solution. Two thousand copies (the entire edition) of this little book hav been disposed of since 1884, and, as there hav been repeated calls for it, he has just issued a revised edition, which is now on sale. This pamphlet, embodying Mr. Shaw's ideas regarding the Bible, its origin, authority, and of the doctrins founded upon its teachings, is the result of long years of thought and patient research. Those who are not satisfied to take religion on trust, to believe simply because other believed before them, should read this book, as it was written by an honest man. It will, at least, giv them food for thought, and stimulate to further inquiry.

Mr. Shaw has also furnished the Gazetteer with a copy of another pamphlet he has just published, entitled, "The Divinity of Christ." Its production came about in this way: In July last Rev. W. S. Black, a Christian minister, delivered a sermon at Waco, in which he set forth his reasons for believing in the divinity of Jesus. He subsequently repeated the sermon on the Female College lawn on a Sunday evening by request. Soon after, a large number of citizens of Waco signed a written request, addressed to Mr. Shaw, that he would reply. As the announcement of Mr. Black's sermon on the lawn had been previously published in nearly all the churches in the city, and services postponed with a view to giv their congregations an opportunity to hear it, thus showing their indorsement, Mr. Shaw acceded to the request, and replied at the district court room, August 8th, to a packed house. This pamphlet is that lecture. It is proper to state in this connection that Mr. Shaw invited the Rev. Mr. Black to be present, and make such criticisms of the lecture or propound such questions to the speaker as he thought proper, but he did not put in an appearance. The Gazetteer will not attempt to review this masterly effort of Mr. Shaw, which it believes to be the most powerful argument against a dogma of orthodox Christianity which is the very foundation of the whole system that has ever appeared in print in so compact a compass. The argument of prophecy, on which Mr. Black dwelt with the most confidence, is torn to shreds. It is not surprising that he has never attempted to answer Mr. Shaw. The Gazetteer would, however, like to see some clergyman attack this pamphlet. If the position taken is not tenable, if Mr. Shaw is deceived, we want to know it, and to get all the light we can we will agree to to present a copy of this pamphlet to any pastor of any church in Grayson county who will review it in the columns of the Gazetteer, and show wherein the author is at fault, in his facts, his arguments, or his conclusions.—Denison, Texas, Gazetteer.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America,

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

RESEARCH fails to discover the enormous and brilliant meteor reported to hav flown athwart the sky of New England, and to hav grounded at McAdam Junction, N. B., close to the Maine state line. The contention now is that the meteor fell in the sea.

SNOW fell in Maine on the 25th.

SMALL-POX has appeared, and is spreading, on Staten Island, a few miles from New York city.

THE New York Central Labor Union is divided on the question whether it shall protest against hanging the Anarchists.

ABOUT 50,000 German citizens will be represented at a convention to be held in Albany, October 6th, to ask the legislature for a less stringent Sunday law.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN and Herr Most made speeches at Webster Hall, this city, Sunday evening, in behalf of the Chicago Anarchists, and raised nearly two hundred dollars for their defense.

A STEAMER from Naples brought eight cases of cholera to New York last week. Two of the patients hav died, and others are likely to. No danger of the disease spreading is apprehended.

LAST Saturday 1,281 immigrants landed at this port.

FIVE Chicago courts granted one hundred divorces on the 24th inst.

JENNY LIND (Mme. Otto Goldschmidt), the celebrated singer, is very sick in London.

THE Saturday half-holiday has been generally discontinued by the mercantil branch of trade in New York.

THE Rev. William F. Davis has spent several weeks in jail for preaching on Boston Common without a permit.

JACOB SHARP'S appeal for a new trial has been denied, and unless a stay is granted he will go to the state prison at once.

THE wife of Anarchist Parsons was arrested last week for distributing circulars asking aid for the condemned men. She was released upon her own recognizance until the judge could read the circular and pass upon its legal status.

HENRY GEORGE addressed the Anti-Poverty Society Sunday night. He said that the movement was now taking the form of a religious revival, though not so much with the intention of fitting men for heaven as to bring heaven upon earth.

MR. JACOB KILRAIN, of Baltimore, has sailed for Europe with the avowed intention of whipping Mr. James Smith, champion pugilist of England. His reward will be fame, fortune, and a diamond belt. The meeting will take place in Spain.

ON September 22d the negroes of Jackson, Miss., celebrated the anniversary of their emancipation from slavery. More than 5,000 colored people participated in the festivities. On the same day some 2,000 people of his own race gave Fred Douglas a reception at Washington, D. C.

FINANCIERS hav of late complained of a severe stringency in the money market, and to relieve it the treasury department offers to purchase $14,000,000 worth of United States bonds between September 22d and October 8th. The order is generally deemed a good one so far as it goes.

MNASON, the revivalist, who was mobbed and driven out of Park Ridge, N. J., is back in that town. The leader of the mob, Sunday-School Superintendent Leach, is away on a vacation, and when he returns it is expected that hostilities will be resumed. Several indictments are out against persons concerned in the lynching affair.

Odds and Ends.

TAKING a baby to church does the baby no good, and is a cause of immorality in others.

BOSTON is still evoluting. They now put men in jail there for preaching without a license.

THE proper study of mankind is man. There is more fun, though, in studying woman. But it doesn't do any good. You can't make her out.

No matter how good a character a deacon may hav, he cannot put a five dollar bill in the plate which he has just passed, and make change for himself without arousing the suspicions of the congregation.

ISAAC SIMON and David Abrams having failed recently in St. Louis, the Presbyterians of that city will hav to rely on outside assistance to complete the new Bible house.

WAYBACK man: "All this talk about the benefits of high license is nonsense. What I want to see in Omaha is Prohibition." Omaha man: "It can't be enforced." "No matter, I'll never rest until we get Probibition." "Are you a temperance orator?" "Well, no. I keep the only drug store at Rum Crossing."

A LITTLE Albany girl who was watching her father putting "slug shot" on some potato plants the other day to kill the bugs asked him if God made potato bugs. He replied that he did, when she puzzled him by the question: "Well, why didn't he make them eat those nasty thistles and leave the potatoes alone?"

"I DON'T dare club him," said a little girl yesterday when told to punish her pug dog with a club because he had just snapped at her. "I don't dare club him. He might bite me, and then I would hav hydrotoxicon." This little girl had been reading the papers lately, and in some way got Pasteur mixed up with swill milk.

"GOOD-NIGHT, mamma," said little Frank, as he put his little brown head on the pillow. Mamma stood at the door ready to go downstairs. "Good-night, mamma. Will the little small voice I hear in the night hurt me?" "No, my darling." "It's God's voice, isn't it, mamma?" "Yes, my darling." "The minister said it was, didn't he mamma?" "Yes, love." "Was it God's voice that said 's'cat, s'cat,' under the window last night?"

HOW MR. HERRESCHOFF WAS REBUKED BY A GOOD PRIEST IN NAPLES.

James Herreschoff, one of the remarkable family of blind boat-builders of that name of Bristol, R. I., is in this city. He has recently made an extended European trip, visiting out-of-the-way places, and avoiding the beaten lines of travel and tourists' hotels. He tells a clever story about a priest at Naples.

Mr. Herreschoff went to dine at a little cafe in the suburbs overlooking the bay of Naples. With his dinner he drank the common red wine of the country, the same as the peasants drink. Opposit him sat an old, fat, jolly, clean-shaven priest, who was drinking white wine. He gazed upon Mr. Herreschoff in sorrow, and at last said: "My son, my son, look not upon wine when it is red, when it giveth its color to the cup," and, pausing to giv his words effect, he feelingly added, "Drink white wine, as I do!"

HOLDING BACK A TRAIN FOR A DARNED PREACHER.

Once when the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage was on a lecturing tour he missed his train at Toledo. He found that by taking another train he could catch the train he wanted at a certain junction if the first train could be got to wait half an hour. The reverend gentleman is not over-bashful, and he considers that the great name of Talmage ought to stop any train on the American continent; so he telegraphed to the general manager of the other road:

Please hold train at Muggerville Junction till express arrives. TALMAGE.

The reverend gentleman reached the junction and he found the train waiting for him. When the general manager of that particular road met Manager Talmage, of the Wabash Railroad, he said: "You found that train all right at Muggerville Junction?"

"What train?"

"Why, the train you telegraphed me to hold."

"I never sent any such message."

The manager showed him the dispatch. "Oh," said the Wabash man, as light broke in on him, "that must hav been the Rev. DeWitt Talmage, of New York."

"Great Scott!" cried the other in disgust, "and to think that I held a train for half an hour for a darned New York preacher!"

PAT'S EXPERIENCE AT A METHODIST CLASS MEETING.

The old style of Methodist class meetings has not exactly gone into "innocuous desuetude" in Texas, but it is not as prevalent as it was in "olden times." Then you would find one going on every Sunday morning, and every school-house or church in each small town, city, hamlet, or neighborhood had its class meeting or "experience meetin'" as they were more frequently called. And the habit of getting together and telling each other of their shortcomings and of their trials and temptations and general moral life had a good effect and seemed to make every one better, and encouraged them, and showed them that there were others who sympathized with them in every trial and rejoiced with them in triumph. One morning, not far from where now stands the flourishing town of Kyle, a strolling Irishman found himself seated in a little shed roof house listening to the experience of a lot of the faithful. Of course, Mike was astonished, and listened along in silent wonder, till a young brother got up who was rather bashful, and began:

"I hav married me a wife, brethren, and—"

"The divil he hav!" said Mike, which caused a momentary titter; but the young brother recovered and continued:

"I've married me a wife, and I am glad to say she is a daughter of the Lord."

Mike could stand no more. He shouted:

"Arrah! sit down, ye galoot! Sure, ye'll niver see your father-in-law."

Amid a roar Mike was put out. He took it for a political speaking.

Gems of Thought.

RELIGIONS seem to act to make enemies of the human race. Every individual is certain that he has the truth—that his religion is directly from God. Of course all devotees of other systems are believing a falsehood, and consequently are enemies of God, deserving castigation and death.—D. M. Bennett.

AJAX ought to be the hero and model of all philosophers, for, as the poet sings, "The prayer of Ajax was for light."—Hare's Guesses at Truth Goethe's last words, as he looked on the setting sun, were, "Light! light! more light!" Garibaldi's last words, as he noticed a little bird alight on the window-sill of of his bed-room, were, "Oh, how beautiful it is!" And he was an Infidel, and cared no more for pope of Rome than an old horse cares for his mother.—Hylax.

GREEK words and Latin words are fine things; but they cannot hide the emptiness and lowness of many who employ them.—Carlyle.

Two infants reasoning in the womb about the nature of this life might be no unhandsome type of two men reasoning here about the life that is to come.—Sir Thomas Browne.

A WISE man proportions his belief to the evidence.—Hume.

THE simple believeth every word: but the prudent man looketh well to his going.—Proverbs xiv. 15.

NEVER tell me that shame is the companion of guilt—the sinful knave is never so ashamed of himself as is the innocent fool who suffers by him.—Bulwer.

How is a man ever to be a man who cannot think out his best thoughts and satisfy all true desires of his nature? But the whole subjectiv philosophy of the popular religion is in the interests of something separate from a complete manhood. Even men who would like to be considered scholarly talk about the importance of "saving one's soul" in distinction from the complete development of manhood. They obtain their conception of "soul-saving" from the old philosophy of a narrow distinction between mind and body, a philosophy in which matter was considered sinful in itself, and the soul alone of importance.—S. J. Stewart. [NOTE.—The idea of the utter sinfulness of matter is of Indian origin, but it was strongly embraced by Plato, whose influence planted it in Alexandria, and fixed it in the minds of some of the Christian fathers. Among our forefathers, and, to some extent, among ourselves, the idea of "soul-saving" has been perpetuated by a misconception of the words of Jesus, "What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall a man giv for his soul?" (Matt. xvi, 26). Even our timid revisers hav seen that the words do not necessarily bear any such import, for they hav translated the passage thus: "What shall a man be profited if he shall gain the whole world and forfeit his life? or what shall a man giv in exchange for his life?" But the old text will be kept sounding in the ears of the people for many a day. It is too valuable to be surrendered to any mere demand of scholarship.—Hylax.]

LET our unceasing, earnest prayer
Be, too, for light—for strength to bear
Our portion of the weight of care
That crushes into dumb despair
One-half the human race.

O suffering, sad humanity!
O ye afflicted ones who lie
Steeped to the lips in misery,
Longing and yet afraid to die,
Patient, though sorely tried,

I pledge you in this cup of grief,
Where floats the fennel's bitter leaf,
The battle of our life is brief,
The alarm, the struggle, the relief,
Then sleep we side by side.

—Longfellow's Goblet of Life.

THERE is another element of our happiness which springs from the fact that we do not know the future. How large a part of the pleasure of life is shattered and blighted by our unreasonable anticipation of coming evil! How much happiness would be lost if you knew that you were to be sick to-morrow; that a friend was to be stricken down; that a mercantil venture was to go awry: that this or that evil was to come? You would hav no heart for the smile and laughter and sunshine of to-day, glad and bright though it might be, if you were overshadowed with the cloud of a certain misfortune that was to come on the morrow.—M. J. Savage.

GOD knows I'm no' the thing I should be,
Nor am I even the thing I could be,
But twenty times, I rather would be
An Atheist clean,
Than under gospel colors hid be Just for a screen. —Burns.

THE NIGHTMARE OF SUPERSTITION.

Christianity, like a hideous dream, has tortured mankind for over eighteen centuries.

Notes and Clippings.

Miss Phoebe W. Couzins has been installed in office as United States marshal at St. Louis, Mo. She is the first female marshal known to history.

Dr. Parker, the English clergyman, preached in Plymouth pulpit last Sunday. His sermon, as reported, was much like one of Mr. Beecher's with the best things left out.

In the superstition of sailor men, says the New York Sun, there is a connection between white horses and preachers. Both are believed to bring bad luck to the vessel carrying them.

The Minneapolis Tribune says: "Mr. J. F. Wright, who advertised in the Tribune for a wife about a year ago, is now the proud father of a bouncing boy. Our advertising rates can be ascertained by inquiry at the counting-room."

The Union, of Manchester, N. H., charges that the worst places of prostitution in that city are owned by church-members who "are not ignorant of the purposes to which they are put," and says that there is no clergyman in Manchester who dares to deal with the evil boldly.

The Rev. Adirondack Murray, whose specialty is fish stories, crossed the line into Canada the other day and came back crestfallen. Of the lying capacity of the French Canadian he says: "There is a childish enthusiasm about it that captivates you. He smiles as he lies. He lays his hand on his heart; he lifts his eyes upward; he embellishes his little lie with saintly allusions; he lies as if he believed his own lie."

The Progressiv Labor party, comprising the excommunicated portion of the George party, nominated John Swinton for secretary of state, but Mr. Swinton declared that he was too tired to accept the nomination, and Mr. J. Edward Hall was substituted. T. B. Wakeman, Esq., is the party's nominee for attorney general.

The vestry of St. John's church in Elizabeth, N. J., has examined the charges against the Rev. Mr. Glazebrook, accused of improper conduct with Miss Foote, of Durham, Conn., and has "vindicated" him, and he will be retained in the pulpit of that church. The vestrymen evidently realize the prestige a church gains from having a pastor with a reputation.

Louise Michel, the famous French Communist, is said at last to hav crossed the boundary into insanity, or, at least, into aberration. Her publishers are refusing to print her books, her health is broken, and she is, it is said, likely to be left to starve if her pen and tongue fail her. As a rule, except in revolutionary districts, she is now hooted at and ill-treated, it is said, when she speaks.

The Anti-Poverty party is holding a fair in this city, and the women of the party are going about soliciting subscriptions. One of them called on Archbishop Corrigan with her subscription book, and he took the book from her by force, and rebuked her severely, saying she was liable to excommunication for attending Dr. McGlynn's meetings; which may very likely be true, but it hardly justified the archbishop in stealing her book.

Mr. John Bright, the English statesmen, in a letter published September 29th, condemns the Compulsory Vaccination act, and predicts the failure of the compulsory system. He advises that leniency be shown toward those opposed to vaccination.

The annual convention of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of New York was held last week. The most important business, to the beneficiary at least, was the raising of Bishop Potter's salary to $12,500, in return for which the bishop gave the brethren a convivial entertainment at the new headquarters at 29 Lafayette Place, opposit The Truth Seeker office. The affair was evidently exclusiv, as no one from this office was invited over.

Successful experiments hav recently been made in New York harbor with Lieutenant Zalinski's dynamite gun. The weapon is sixty feet long, eight-inch bore, charged with compressed air instead of powder, and throws twenty-pound dynamite shells a distance of a mile and a half. In the recent experiment in the presence of government officers an old schooner standing head on and low in the water a mile away was totally wrecked at the second shot, the first one having gone wide of its mark.

The new College of Physicians and Surgeons, which W. H. Vanderbilt gave a half million dollars to build, at the corner of Fifty-ninth street and Tenth avenue, this city, was opened on the 29th ult. In writing a letter upon the subject Mayor Hewitt says: "I am glad to say that the world more and more comes to the opinion that superfluous wealth is a public trust, and when this view is acted upon by those who hav control of such wealth, we shall hear less of the sufferings of the poor, and of the antagonism which is believed to exist, but never can, between labor and capital." Mr. Hewitt givs evidence of having read Auguste Comte on the "moralization of wealth."

The Dublin Union asserts that since January 1, 1887, the Irish National League has received subscriptions amounting to £31,000, of which sum it has doled out only £4,700 to the entire tenantry of Ireland. The balance, the Union says, has not been accounted for.

Collector Magone, boss of the New York custom house, has taken a novel and ingenious way to oust Republican employees under the form of a civil service examination. All the present clerks are to be examined for promotion, and those who fail to pass satisfactorily will be discharged. To this end the Republican clerks are kept in the dark, while the Democrats, it is said, are being furnished with such light as will make their calling and election sure.

At a recent seance in Rochester by a medium from Brooklyn, several written communications, purporting to come from the spirit-world, were handed out from the cabinet. Six of the notes in which the chirography seemed to be the most dissimilar were submitted to experts in the matter of handwriting. Both of the experts agreed that not more than two persons wrote the notes, and one of them was inclined to think that all were written by the same hand. A pencil drawing purporting to be a portrait of Jean Ingelow represented her as a man.

The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Secret of the East," etc.

I.—Moral Maxims.

CHAPTER XI.—JUSTICE.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

Moral philosophers have long conjectured the distinction between natural and conventional duties; and only the full recognition of that distinction can reconcile the conflicting views on the natural basis of ethics. On the other hand, the defenders of the theory of "Intuitive Morality" claim the existence of an innate moral conscience, common to all nations and all stages of social development, while, on the other hand, we hear it as confidently asserted that the standards of virtue are mere standards of expedience, and vary with circumstances as fashions vary with seasons and climates. There is no doubt, for instance, that religious bigotry has begot a sort of factitious conscience, shrinking from the mere idea of devoting the seventh day of the week to physical recreations, while the devotees of the joy-loving gods of paganism thought it a solemn duty to celebrate their holidays with festive revels. Marriage between persons of adventitious relationship (such as widows and their surviving brothers-in law) is prohibited by the statutes of one creed, and not only sanctioned, but distinctly enjoined, by those of another. Speculative dogmas that would deeply shock the followers of Abd el Wahab are tolerated in Constantinople and venerated in Rome.

But such contrasts diminish, and at last disappear, as we turn our attention from conventional to essential duties. A Mussulman bigot, who would slay his son for drinking wine in honor of a supplementary god, would agree with the worshipers of that god that theft is a crime and benevolence a virtue. The innkeepers of Palermo obey their church and spite heretics by selling meat in June, but not in March. The innkeepers of El Medina spite unbelievers and honor the Koran by selling meat in March, but not in June. The Buddhist innkeepers of Lassa sell only salt meat, imported from China, and spite Infidels by refusing to kill a cow under any circumstances. But Sicilians, Thibetans, and Arabs would agree that no innkeeper should be permitted to spite a personal enemy by salting his meat with arsenic. Nations that totally disagree in their notions of propriety, in matters of taste, and in their bias of religious prejudice, will nevertheless be found to agree on the essential standards of humanity and justice. The "instinct of equity," as Leibnitz calls the sense of natural justice, has been still better defined as the "instinct of keeping contracts." A state of Nature is not always a state of equal rights. Skill, strength, and knowledge enjoy the advantage of superior power in the form of manifold privileges, but the expediency of "keeping contracts" naturally recommends itself as the only safe basis of social intercourse. Those contracts need not always be specified by written laws. They need not even be formulated in articulate speech. Their obligations are tacitly recognized as a preliminary of any sort of social cooperation, of any sort of social concomitance. "Give every man his due;" "Pay your debts;" "Give if you would receive," are international maxims, founded on the earliest impressions of social instinct, rather than on the lessons of social science or of preternatural revelation. The first discoverers of the South Sea Islands were amazed by a license of sexual intercourse that seemed to exceed the grossest burlesques of French fiction; but they were almost equally surprised by the scrupulous exactness of commercial fair-dealing observed by those incontinent children of Nature. An islander, who had agreed to pay three bagsful of yam roots for a common pocket-knife, delivered two bagsful (all his canoe would hold) before the evening of the next day, and received his knife, as the sailors had about all the provisions they could use. But the next morning. in trying to leave the coast by tacking against a fitful breeze, they were overtaken by a canoe, containing a desperately-rowing savage and that third bag of yam-roots. The traveler Chamisso mentions a tribe of Siberian fishermen who boarded his ship to deliver a harpoon which former visitors had forgotten in their winter-camp. Theft, according to the testimony even of their Roman adversaries, was almost unknown among the hunting tribes of the primitive German wood lands. The natives of San Salvador received their Spanish invaders with respectful hospitality, and scrupulously abstained from purloining, or even touching, any article of their ship-stores; and a similar reception welcomed their arrival in Cuba and San Domingo, the natives being apparently unable to conceive the idea that their guests could repay good with evil. "Fair play" is the motto of boyish sports in the kraals of Kaffir-land, not less than on the recess-ground of Eton College. A rudimentary sense of justice manifests itself even among social animals. A baboon who wantonly attacks an inoffensive fellow-ape is liable to get mobbed by the whole troop. A nest-robbing hawk has to beat an immediate retreat under penalty of being attacked by all the winged neighbors and relatives of his victims. Dogs that will endure the most inhuman methods of training are not apt to forgive an act of gratuitous cruelty. They may resign themselves to a system of consistent severity, but refuse to submit to evident injustice.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

Justice is the royal attribute of noble souls; the most inalienable crown of their prestige. Men who would defy the power of superior strength, or envy and depreciate the superior gifts of genius, will do unbidden homage to the majesty of superior justice. "Mars is a tyrant," says Plutarch, in the epilogue of "Demetrius," "but justice is the rightful sovereign of the world." "The things which kings receive from heaven are not machines for taking towns, or ships with brazen beaks, but law and justice; these they are to guard and cultivate. And it is not the most warlike, the most violent and sanguinary, but the justest of princes, whom Homer calls the disciple of Jupiter." History has more than once confirmed that test of supremacy. The reputation of incorruptible integrity alone has made poor princes, and even private citizens, the arbiters of nations.

King Hieron of Syracuse thus arbitrated the disputes of his warlike neighbors. Plato, Phocion. Philopoemen, Cato, and Abencerrage (Ibn Zerrag) settled international quarrels which the sword had failed to decide. The prestige of uprightness has made honor almost a synonyme of an "honorable," i. e. honest, reputation. The commercial integrity of Hebrew merchants has overcome race-jealousies and religious prejudices, and in America the worship of wealth does not prevent an upright judge from ranking high above a wealthier, but less scrupulous, attorney.

The consciousness of a just cause is an advantage which, more than once, has outweighed a grievous disadvantage in wealth and power. It biased the fortune of war in the battles of Leuctra and Lodi; it enabled the Scythian herdsmen to annihilate the veterans of King Cyrus, and the Swiss peasants to rout the chivalry of Austria and Burgundy. A just cause enlists sympathy, and, as a bond of union, surpasses the value of common interests, which a slight change of circumstances is apt to turn into conflicting interests and di agreement. Strict adherence to the principles of political equity has preserved small states in the midst of powerful neighbors, whose greed of conquest is restrained by their hesitation to incur the odium of wanton aggression. Belgium, Holland, and Denmark have thus preserved their national independence in Europe, as Japan and Acheen in the East. In Central Africa the honesty and simplicity of the agricultural Ethiopians has proved a match for the cunning of the predatory Moors, who constantly pillage their neighbors, but as constantly quarrel about the division of their spoils, and, in the vicissitudes of their civil wars, have again and again been obliged to purchase the alliance of the despised "heathen."

The practical advantages of integrity has been recognized in the proverbial wisdom of all nations, but are not confined to the affairs of commercial intercourse. In the long run, honesty is the "best policy," even in avocations where the perversion of justice may seem to promise a temporary advantage. A lawyer who refuses to defend a wealthy knave against a poor plaintiff, will gain in self-respect, and ultimately also in professional reputation, more than he has lost in direct emoluments. A politician who refuses to resort to chicanes may miss the chance of a short-lived triumph, but will sow a seed of prestige sure to ripen its eventual harvest.

C.—PERVERSION.

Justice, in the pristine pagan sense of the word, was too natural and too manly a virtue to find much favor with the whining moralists of Antinaturalism. The truth which a modern philosopher has condensed in the sarcasm that "an honest god is the noblest work of man," was recognized already by the ancient historian who observed that "every nation makes its gods the embodiments of its own ideals," though, happily, it is not always true that "no worshiper is better than the object of his worship." To some degree, however, the moral standards of the Mediterranean pagans were undoubtedly prejudiced by the lewd propensities of their Olympians, and it is equally certain that the extravagant injustice of Christian fanatics can be partly explained, as well as condoned, by the moral characteristics of their dogma-God. According to the accepted doctrine of the Middle Ages, the administrative principles of that God seemed to imply a degree of moral perversity which even the poetic license of a saner age would have hesitated to ascribe to a fiend. The same deity whom the creed of the Galilean church makes the omniscient creator of all the physical and moral instincts of human nature, nevertheless was supposed to punish with endless torture nearly every free gratification of those instincts, and demand a voluntary renunciation of a world which his own bounty had filled with every blessing, and adorned with every charm of loveliness. The God who endowed us with faculties of reason, of which a moderate share is sufficient to perceive the absurdities of the Christian dogma, nevertheless avenges the repudiation of that dogma as an "unpardonable sin against the authority of his sacred word." The most natural action, the eating of an apple, is made the pretext of the supposed fall of man, and of penalties affecting not only his progeny, but all his fellow-creatures, and even the lower products of organic Nature; while the greatest of all imaginable crimes, a Deicide, the cruel murder of a god, is accepted as a basis of redemption. The doctrine of salvation by grace made the distribution of punishments and rewards a matter of mere caprice. The dogmatists of predestination distinctly taught that the "elect" were not saved by their own merits, but by an inscrutable, incalculable, and gratuitous act of divine favor, while others were as inevitably foredoomed to an eternity of woe. By faith alone, or by faith and the ceremony of immersion, the guilt of a sinful life could, withal, be cancelled in the eleventh hour, while the omission of that ceremony doomed even children, nay, newborn babes, to the abyss of hellfire. "There is no doubt," the Solomon of the Patristic Age assures us, "that infants, only a few spans in length, are crawling on the bottom of hell," a doctrine which the historian of Rationalism justly stigmatizes as "so atrocious, and at the same time so extravagantly absurd, that it would be simply impossible for the imagination to surpass its insanity." Yet for more than twelve hundred years Christians were in danger of being burnt at the stake for refusing to attribute such infamies to their creator.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

Need we wonder that the converts of that creed believed in the merit of passive submission to the caprices of earthly despots, and scorned the appeals of justice in their dealings with pagans and Freethinkers? Why should men try to be better than their God? The worshiper of a God who doomed the souls of unbaptized children and honest dissenters, naturally had no hesitation in assailing the bodies of their unbelieving fellow-men, and princes who loaded fawning sycophants with favors which they denied to honest patriots could appeal to the sanction of a divine precedent. Every petty "sovereign of six faithful square miles" accordingly became a law to himself. A man's might was the only measure of his right; the Faust-Recht, the "first law" of iron-clad bullies, reigned supreme from the Baltic to the Mediterranean, and the judges of (the only independent) ecclesiastic courts confined their attention to ferocious punishments of neglect in the payment of tithes, and the performance of socage duties and ceremonies. The belief in the divine right of potentates, and passive submission to even the most outrageous abuse of that power, were assiduously inculcated as primary duties of a Christian citizen. Natural justice, civil rights, and the laws of humanity had no place in that code of revealed ethics.

Such teachings bore their fruit in the horrors of insurrection. In the Peasants' War thousands of convents and castles were rent as by the outburst of a hurricane, and their dwellers had to learn the inconvenience of having to submit to the powers that happened to be, by being torn limb from limb, or flayed and roasted alive.

"Si no se obedecen los leyes, es ley que todo se pierde," is the Spanish translation of an old Arabian proverb: "If justice is disregarded, it is just that everything perish"—a doom which the intolerable outrages against human rights and humanity at last experienced in the cataclysm of the French Revolution. There, too, the despisers of natural justice had to eat their own doctrine, the strongholds of absolutism that had withstood the tears of so many generations were swept away by a torrent of blood, and the priests and princes whose inhumanity had turned their serfs into wild beasts learned the significance of their mistake when their own throats were mangled by the fangs of those beasts.

The doctrine of salvation by grace had substituted favor and caprice for the rights of natural justice, and for a series of centuries the consequences of its teachings were seen in the treatment of nearly every benefactor of mankind. The prince who devoted the fruits of his conquests to the feeding of countless convent drones, let scholars starve and loaded the discoverer of a New World with chains. His successors who lavished the treasures of their vast empire on pimps and clerical mountebanks, let Cervantes perish in penury. The sovereign protector of a thousand stall-fed prelates refused to relieve the last distress of John Kepler. The moralists who thought it a grievance that the church should be denied the right of tithing the lands of southern Spain, had no pity for the sufferings of the men whose labor had made those lands blossom like the gardens of paradise, and who were exiled by thousands for the crime of preferring the unitary God of the Koran to the trinitary gods of the New Testament.

E.—REFORM.

The perversion of our moral standards by the dogmas of an antinatural creed is still glaringly evident in the prevailing notions of natural justice and the precedence of social duties. The modern Crœsus who deems it incumbent on his duties as a citizen and a Christian to contribute an ample subvention to the support of an orthodox seminary, has no hesitation in swelling his already bloated income by reducing the wages of a hundred starving factory children and taking every sordid advantage in coining gain from the loss of helpless tenants and dependants. The pious Sabbatarians who doom their poor neighbors to an earthly Gehenna and premature death by depriving them of every chance for healthful recreation, lavish their luxuries and their endearments on the caged cutthroat who edifies his jailer by renouncing the vanities of this worldly sphere and ranting about the bliss of the New Jerusalem. The bank cashier who would never be pardoned for kicking the hind-parts of a mendicant missionary is readily absolved from the sin of such secular indiscretions as embezzling the savings of a few hundred widows and orphans.

Before resuming the rant about our solicitude for the interests of departed souls, we should learn to practice a little more common honesty in our dealings with the interests of our living fellow-men. Natural justice would be less frequently outraged if our moral reformers would distinctly repudiate the doctrines of vicarious atonement and salvation by faith, and hold every man responsible for his own actions, irrespective of his belief or disbelief in the claims of an Asiatic miracle-monger. And moreover, the exponents of Secularism should insist on a truth not unknown to the moralists of antiquity, that habitual submission to injustice is a vice instead of a virtue, and that he who thinks it a merit to signalize his unworldliness by failing to assert his own rights encourages oppression and fraud and endangers the rights of his honest fellow-men.

The Paine Farm and Monument.

Sherwin. the biographer of Thomas Paine, relates that in 1785 the assembly of New York gave to Thomas Paine, in recognition of his public services, the confiscated estate of Mr. Frederick Devoe, a royalist. "This estate," says Sherwin, "situated at New Rochelle, consisting of more than three hundred acres of land in a high state of cultivation, with a spacious and elegant stone house, besides extensiv out-buildings, was a valuable acquisition." Where that house is to day is an interesting subject of inquiry.

There stands at present, on the White Plains road, some two miles from the railroad depot at New Rochelle, N. Y., and perhaps a quarter of a mile from the highway, a small two-story, half clapboarded and half-shingled structure called the Paine House. A desire to pay his respects to the old home of the author-hero recently led Mr. T. Kewley, who fills the position of store-keeper on board the White Star steamer Germanic, to call at THE TRUTH SEEKER office and invite an attaché of this paper to visit the spot with him. The journey was made one pleasant afternoon in the month of September just closed. New Rochelle is but a half hour's ride by rail from New York, though it took the pilgrims rather more than half an hour to go from the depot to the Paine farm on account of the speed of the horse which they engaged to convey them thither. Everybody in New Rochelle knows where the Paine farm is, the driver of the chariot in which the visitors rode assuring his passengers that even the horse knew the way, which, together with his apparent great age, led Mr. Kewley to inquire if the animal had previously belonged to Mr. Paine.

The monument stands beside the main road, at the southeast corner, where the lane leads up a slight rise to the house, which is in plain sight. When the visitors walked into the dooryard surrounding this ancient structure known as the Thomas Paine House, they were greeted by a dog with a long yellow nose, who at first concluded to bark, then changed his mind and frisked a little, and shortly lay down and went to sleep. A pleasant faced man holding a pot of paint, and a brush with which he was putting the paint upon the clapboards of the ell part of the house, greeted the strangers cordially. "Yes," he said, "this is the old Paine farm and the old Paine house." This gentleman is Mr. Kissan, if the writer caught the proper pronunciation of his name, and he carries on a milk business, as a large number of cans standing conveniently near the well indicated.

The outside of the building was first inspected. This cannot be the "spacious and elegant stone house" described by Sherwin. It is of two stories, with clapboards upon the ends, so wide that not more than two dozen of them are required to cover it from the ground to the roof. The sides are shingled and whitewashed. It has no ridge boards, and the last course of shingles on one side of the roof hav not been cut off. The gable ends are destitute of molding, and the boards that take its place are rotting away at the eaves. A new portico covers the front door on the west side. At the south end is a story-and-a-half ell. The only stone portion of the structure is what looks like an addition on the east side, about eight feet by fifteen, as high as a man's shoulder at the eaves, and covered by a continuation of the main roof. It is apparently built of rough stones, pointed and whitewashed. The indications are that this is the sole remaining portion of the stone building, if one ever stood there. It may, however, be a modern structure built for the purpose it now answers—namely, a milk room.

Inside the main portion of the house the visitors were shown two rooms, and were given to understand that these were occupied by Paine, one of them being his study. This apartment is not larger than eight by twelve feet. The writer could hav touched the ceiling, and the unevenness of the floor in both rooms indicates that the timbers under it are in a bad condition. A picture of some extinct gentleman of the name of Wesley adorned the wall of the larger room.

All the out-buildings are new. All the old trees of Paine's day hav perished, and been cut down. Visitors are allowed to believe that the well in the yard was dug by Paine, though where the family of Mr. Frederick Devoe, royalist, obtained their water is not stated. The writer could not divest himself of the impression that possibly Paine never lived in the house at all. Sherwin states that the building given to Paine was of stone, and Vale quotes Sherwin without correcting him. Vale was acquainted with the premises, as he visited them in 1837. At precisely what time Vale wrote his biography cannot be determined, as his preface is not dated, and the publishers hav dated the book 1884, but it could not hav been more than thirty years or so after Paine's death. The question, then, arises, Where is the stone house confiscated from Mr. Frederick Devoe, royalist, and presented to Mr. Paine by the New York assembly?

On the way back the pilgrims stopped to view the monument. They found it to be a plain, square shaft, with rounded corners, surmounted by a capital of the Greek order. On the west side, facing the road, is a profile chiseling of Paine, encircled by a wreath. The likeness would not be called good, judged by the generally accepted pictures of the subject, and it has not been improved by having pieces chipped out of it by relic hunters. The whole structure is twelve feet high, of Westchester marble, and, besides the story it tells of the birth and death of Paine, it bears profuse extracts from his works. The monument was the result, in 1839, of the enterprise of Gilbert Vale, who raised the money to erect it at a cost of $1.300, John Frazee being the architect. In letters more newly cut than the others, are these words:

Repaired and rededicated May 30, 1881.

The repairing and rededicating seem to hav been brought about by D. M. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER. In the fore part of 1881 the files of this paper show that a subscription, headed by M. Reiman, closely followed by D. M. Bennett and E. M. Macdonald, was raised to the amount of $158 79, to renovate the lettering and to "round the corners of the monument in such a way that they cannot be broken off without great effort with a hammer." This was done, as the rounded corners of the structure attest. Wilson Macdonald had the work in charge, and in May, 1881, Mr. Bennett was enabled to announce that "the repairs to the monument, the relaying in cement of the wall surrounding the lot, the repairing of the iron fence, and the filling and sodding of the lot are completed and paid for." Mr. Bennett adds that "the monument is said to look better than when new."

May 30th (Decoration Day) of that year was appropriately chosen for the rededicatory services. In describing the event Mr. Bennett says: "Quite a party of us were in waiting at the depot in New Rochelle with numerous omnibuses and other carriages. These were soon filled, and a procession was formed which turned its face toward the monument, nearly two miles north of the station. Capt. Geo. W. Loyd, mounted on a white horse named Button (the same as one once owned by Thomas Paine), acted as marshal and escorted us to the monument." Those who know Captain Loyd will readily conceive that this was the greatest day of his life.

Arrived at their destination, says the record, the meeting came to order, P. L. McClellan, Esq, being appointed president, and "for that purpose occupied the veritable arm-chair once used by Paine himself." D. M. Bennett was vice-president, and T. C. Leland and E. B. Foote, Jr., M.D., secretaries. The banner of the Fourth New York Liberal League, under whose auspices the repairs of the monument had partially been effected, was secured to a tree. The orators occupied, while speaking, an elevated position under this banner.

The chairman opened with an effectiv speech, and then introduced T. B. Wakeman as the orator of the day, who "held the audience spell-bound for more than an hour, every person present fondly drinking in his eloquent remarks." The venerable J. P. Mendum also spoke, and was followed by Dr. Brown, of Binghamton, and Courtlandt Palmer; and then Mr. S. P. Putnam, as always, was eloquent, earnest, and appropriate. Miss Ella Hart, from Delaware, gave a beautiful poem, Mrs. H. Allen read a tribute, and there were loud calls for D. M. Bennett. Mr. Bennett spoke simply for a moment, and then called for a vote of thanks to those who had contributed toward restoring the monument to more than original beauty. This was responded to and three "sonorous Ayes arose from the throat of every person present." Mr. Wright, of Elmira, made the closing speech, and the audience was dismissed, some to partake of a collation and others to "visit the farmhouse on the hill where Paine is said to hav once lived." Mr. Bennett was among the latter number. Finally they all came home "feeling that they had enjoyed a very pleasant day, and that they would like to see returns of the same on every succeeding year." It will be seen from the words quoted concerning the farm house that Mr. Bennett, who wrote the account, was not altogether certain that it was the Paine house he visited.

The association of the spot with memories of the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER made it none the less attractiv to the writer, and he lingered there as long as time would permit. The lot about the monument is twenty feet square, surrounded by a wall that looks as if it would endure as long as the shaft itself, and contains four handsome trees—two willows, a hickory, and a maple. Just outside the wall to the south are two stakes, about six feet apart. They mark the spot, it is said, where lay the body of Paine before the ghoulish Cobbett carried his bones away to England. In his will Paine says: "The place where I am to be buried to be a square of twelve feet, to be inclosed with rows of trees, and a stone or post-and-railed fence, with a headstone with my name and age engraved upon it, author of 'Common Sense.'" Walter Morton, Thomas Addis Emmett, and Margaret B. Bonneville, named by Paine to carry out his bequest, seem to hav but indifferently fulfilled their trust, for only twenty-eight years after the hero's death Gilbert Vale thus describes the place of burial:

> The tomb is close by the roadside, but over a stone fence, and now consists of a low, broken, rough, dry-stone wall of oblong shape of about eight by four feet, with loose stones, grass, and earth in the center; the upright slab, simply marked with
> THOMAS PAINE, AUTHOR OF COMMON SENSE,
> no longer exists. After Cobbett violated the grave and moved the bones from the remains of Mr. Paine, the headstone was broken, and pieces successivly removed by different visitors.

So small had finally become the headstone which was to tell of the author-hero to future generations, that, says Vale, the last remnant was plastered up in the wall of a house opposit the monument, in which Paine had at one time boarded. But for his biographer Vale probably no stone would be left now to tell where Thomas Paine was buried; and but for his disciples who rededicated the stone in 1881 no one would be able to read the inscriptions upon the present monument.

Before they came away, the writer gathered a half-dozen hickory nuts from the ground under the tree, and Mr. Kewley cut slips from the willow, destined to be transplanted in the soil of England. They may sprout and grow and their descendants petrify and be some day unearthed by geologists as the fossil remains of a forest primeval. And even in that day men ought sometimes to remember with gratitude the patriot whose services to his country, the world, were as great as his genius, and whose virtues are as obscure as his last resting-place.

The Toronto (Canada) Freethinkers' Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I notice that the Freethinkers of Canada are to hold their second annual convention at Toronto, on Saturday and Sunday, the 29th and 30th of October. As there has been no New York State Convention held this season, I doubt not many Freethinkers this side of the lakes will be pleased to take this opportunity to visit the dominion, and meet their brethren over the line in convention assembled. If there be any such, and they will immediately notify me, I will try to procure cheap excursion rates from Buffalo to Toronto and return. As our Canadian friends hav often attended our conventions, let us now return their visits.

A Baptist Victory Over Presbyterianism.

From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

News has been received here of a very bloody tragedy that took place at Cypress Ridge, in Monroe county, Ark. The details, as near as could be learned, are these: Last Friday night, a man named Forbes, an ardent Presbyterian, and another man named Shelton, a devoted Baptist, became involved in a quarrel, growing out of the question as to whether it was right to hav a Baptist minister occupy a Presbyterian pulpit. Shelton wanted a Baptist minister to fill the Presbyterian pulpit, and Forbes protested in a very forcible manner. The protest led to blows, when suddenly Shelton whipped out a knife and cut Forbes's throat from ear to ear, completely severing the jugular vein, from the effects of which he bled to death. Shelton also is considerably cut up, and is now under arrest. Both parties are prominent white citizens of Monroe county.

Call for the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held at Chicago, October 15th and 16th.

The Congress will be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs—the President and Secretary and three delegates. All charter members and life members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of state Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats, but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada who can will be present.

Per order Board of Directors:

News and Notes.

The convention of the Liberals of Utah was a grand success. Friends were present from all parts of the territory, and were generous and enthusiastic in their efforts. Four meetings were held—Saturday afternoon and evening, and Sunday afternoon and evening. Nearly a thousand were present at the closing session. The Utah Secular Union has been organized with a list of officers that will command the respect and interest of the community. The work will be advanced, and there is every indication of a prosperous future. I guess my friend, Wm. Reynolds, when he used to write letters in his little store at Wanship, did not think that these bright and progressiv elements of freedom would so soon appear. Without his strenuous and pioneer work in days gone by we should not hav this happy promis. The campaign in Utah could never hav gone on without his silent and persevering labors. He has kept the forlorn hope until our forces hav rallied for a splendid attack. He is secretary of the new organization, and with greater opportunities there will be more fruitful results.

W. S. Godbe, president of the Union, is one of the most well-known and influential men in the territory. He was leader, a few years since, in the great revolt from the Mormon church. He is a man of brilliant abilities, and originator of some of the biggest business enterprises in the territory, which will go far toward bringing Utah to the front rank in wealth and progress.

Dr. Chapman, chairman of the executiv committee, and Alex. Rogers, treasurer, are excellent representativ men, with the power and pluck to command success.

Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Mason, whose generous hospitality every pilgrim of Freethought knows, hav contributed no small share to the inspiration and achievement of the convention. They are most thorough believers in intellectual advancement, as that which constitutes the highest happiness and glory of life. It is a pleasure to meet with such friends who hav the vitality of true reform, and who make our labors so cheerful. Among others of our co-workers are Mr. and Mrs. James Williams, W. I. Snyder, Philip Swartz, of Park City; Watson and Lindsay, of Wasatch; Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Williams, and L. P. Edholm, of Morgan; John A. Jost, of Ogden; Munn, of Hooker; Mr. and Mrs. Hector Haight, and L. P. Anderson, of Farmington; Henry Stevens, of Kamas; Luke Gallup, of Springville; H. S. Brooks, of Payson; Mr. and Mrs. Gourley, Mrs. Godbe, Mrs. Chapman, Mrs. Sampson and daughter, Mrs. Stevens, Mr. and Mrs. Williams, of Salt Lake; our good "Bishop" Cahoon, of Murray; A. Festinmacher, of Grantville, and a hundred others, officers and soldiers in this bright batallion, whose banners gleam on the very banks of Jordan.

Another element in the success of the convention was the previous campaign work of Dr. York, whose eloquence has aroused the enthusiasm of our friends in Salt Lake. A resolution was unanimously passed by the Union to invite Dr. York to a year's labor in Utah. He will be greeted by ardent supporters, and will find this a noble field. He cannot refuse the summons. He will become a power in this territory by his vigor and eloquence, and exert a commanding influence for Liberal ideas. He cannot find a more loyal company than here. He must obey the voice of the people, and come to Utah at the earliest possible moment, and carry forward this victorious movement.

This country has brilliant prospects. Salt Lake will be one of the largest cities on the continent. It will be a great railroad center and manufacturing point. It will hav its boom sometime. Its climate is equal to that of southern California. The agricultural resources of the territory are extensiv. It can produce all kinds of fruit. Its mineral wealth is inexhaustible. There is every kind of ore in the bosom of its hills. Utah will certainly be one of the richest states in the Union, and, as a place of resort, it will be one of the most luxurous and fascinating in the world. The saints, however, will never develop this country. The poor are taxed to death, and the rich ones are satisfied with present good. They don't want anything more. They don't want railroads or mines, for these are the most potent foes to priestcraft. A railroad is to be built from Salt Lake to Los Angeles. This will be a most productiv undertaking. It will form the main line from Chicago to southern California, being seven hundred miles nearer than by way of San Francisco. This will giv a wonderful impetus to Salt Lake. Real estate has already advanced from fifty to one hundred per cent.

It will thus be seen that a good work has been done by the organization of our friends in this territory. Here is a vast opportunity in a growing country, unsurpassed for natural riches, for the building of a secular government. With such a leader as Dr. York, sustained by a corps of officers of reputation, influence, and ability, this magnificent opportunity will not be lost. I look forward to brilliant results.

The American Secular Union has never had a more prosperous year, and more hopeful work has never been done. Societies hav been established, Freethought halls built, and literature distributed beyond any record of the past. I hope the Liberals of the United States will recognize the value of the advantages achieved, and unite for still larger results. The American Secular Union cannot do everything, but what it does do is of the first importance. It is the friendly instrumentality for the cultivation of the social spirit, so that Liberals can hav a better understanding of each other's aims and methods, and by unity of effort become a national power for reform.

For this reason, I hope to see a large gathering of friends at the coming Congress. Chicago is a central and attractiv place, railroad fares are cheap, and there are many inducements besides simply the work to be accomplished. Let it be a kind of festival for thought and impulse, for friendship and hope, and noble preparation for the great battlefields of the future.

On Friday evening, September 23d, I gave a parlor lecture at Mrs. Mason's house on "American Poetry." This gave a sort of pleasant prelude to the sterner duties of the convention, and those who could not agree with us on politics and religion could find contentment in our poetic ideals, and realize that in the deepest things of life there is essential harmony.

I am now at Canyon City, where I lecture three evenings. I am in the hospitable home of Geo. Towers, who has been a frontiersman for over forty years. He and his wife are stanch Freethinkers. I hav also met Mr. and Mrs. John Locke, Mr. and Mrs. Baker, and others, and it looks as if I should hav a happy sojourn in this lofty mountain town, where the hills lift up their shining fronts, and the sun is glowing with warm and healthful splendor.

I am at Denver next Sunday; at Osceola, Neb., October 4th, 5th, 6th; at Shenandoah, Iowa, October 9th, and from there I go to Chicago for October 15th, and 16th. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Work in Salt Lake City.

From the Salt Lake Daily Tribune of Sept. 27th.

On Sunday night the parquet in the Opera House was crowded with an orderly audience to hear Mr. S. P. Putnam's lecture, "The Bible," which was received with frequent and enthusiastic applause. The sum of $144.75 was contributed by friends to defray expenses.

After the lecture the meeting completed the organization of the Utah Secular Union by electing W. S. Godbe as president, Mr. H. P. Mason, Mr. E. L. T. Harrison, and a long list of other vice presidents and executiv officers in different parts of the territory. S. H. Laney and Wm. Reynolds were elected secretaries, and Alexander Rogers, treasurer. The meeting also adopted the following resolutions:

1. The Utah Secular Union cordially invites the coöperation of every citizen who is in favor of equal rights and impartial liberty. It wars upon no religious belief, but in the interest of universal peace and prosperity demands the absolute discontinuance of all church interference in the laws and legislation of the land.

2. Knowledge is power; the true method of reform is education; the Union urges, therefore, wherever possible, the establishment of secular Sunday-schools, Freethought libraries, meetings for social and intellectual cultivation, support of scientific literature and its distribution, lectures and mental and physical progression, and the observance of holidays for the enlargement of the spirit of fraternity and the joy and beauty of industry.

3. The Union recognizes the dignity of work; that the glory of all is to labor; and it is expected of every man and woman to do something for the benefit of the world; to add to its wealth or achievement and promis.

4. The Union recognizes the full equality of woman, and that in choice of action her personal independence and rights be maintained.

5. In order to carry forward the practical work of the coming year, the secretary of the Union and chairman of the executiv committee are instructed to communicate immediately with Dr. J. L. York, and secure his able services as a permanent lecturer for the territory of Utah, and it is urged upon every officer and member of the Union in every place to do his best to arouse enthusiasm. increase the membership, and raise funds for the support of the cause. By unity of effort the thousands of Liberals in Utah can be a moral, social, intellectual, and political power, whose influence shall be for the elevation of all, and the establishment of peace, justice, and liberty in the land.

Mr. Putnam to Mrs. Slenker.

DEAR MRS. SLENKER: I hav been so busy that I hav not had time to write to you what I hav desired. Of course, every friend of liberty is indignant at your arrest. I hav always considered that you hav been animated by noble motivs, and your writings, so far as I am acquainted with them, are pure and beneficial. I do not know how you hav discussed the sexual question, but, whatever your method, I am sure it has been adopted through a deep sense of right, and with an earnest desire to giv information which, in your judgment, is necessary to human welfare; and to giv it in that way which shall make better the knowledge and impulse for virtuous action. Whether I assent to your method or not, I do most unqualifiedly assert your individual right to choose that method, especially in private correspondence. Therefore, with all my heart, I protest against the indignity which has been placed upon you. I consider it an outrageous exercise of tyrannical power, a disgrace to the government of the United States, and a deadly assault upon liberty; and the method and motiv of the arbitrary act are simply contemptible. I sympathize, indeed, with the suffering you hav experienced. I know, however, you will be sustained by your own conscience, and by the kindly regard of every true Liberal.

I inclose my gift for your defense, and I only wish that it were a hundred times more. But accept it as evidence of my belief in your integrity, in the purity of your motiv, and your self-sacrificing devotion to the truth and progress.

Yours truly, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Rev. Dr. Lucas, of Leon, Kan., has again agreed to meet J. E. Remsburg in debate. The debate has been set for November 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th, and will take place at Neodesha, Kan.

IN November Charles Watts begins a lecture trip through the states of Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Kansas. Liberals desirous of hearing him should address him at once at 282 Sumach street, Toronto, Ont.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club will resume its sessions on Friday evening, at 8 o'clock, beginning the 7th inst. The speaker of the evening, after President Van Buren Denslow has spoken the words appropriate on such an occasion, will be Dr. J. L. York, of California. We are assured by a great many people that Dr. York is an exceptionally good orator.

With Our Friends.

MR. CHARLES BRADLAUGH writes in the National Reformer: "I hav to thank the New York TRUTH SEEKER for its thoughtful reproduction of my 'Jotting' as to the Truck bill, and its generous words in correction of the repeated and persistent misrepresentations as to my Parliamentary work, so industriously circulated here and repeated in the United States. Friends on the other side of the ocean are earnestly requested not to accept as true the strange misstatements invented by Reynolds's and Justice."

JAMES ASHMAN, the gentile of gentiles that the Mormons of Salt Lake City hate, arrived in this city last week on his way home from England, where he left his wife to complete her visit with their relativs and friends. Mr. Ashman came to this country thirty years ago, and has made Utah his home, amassing a comfortable fortune. He is the Freethought missionary of Salt Lake City, and takes weekly a dozen copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, selling what he can and giving the balance away. He is a strong and wholesome man; knows the iniquity and tyranny of the Mormon hierarchy, and talks sensibly as to the means of reforming the Mormons.

COLONEL INGERSOLL, says the Sun, "has become one of the interesting characters of Wall street, and is the only man in town credited with the habit of holding cigars in both corners of his mouth at the same time. Of course it is an illusion resulting from the rapidity with which the colonel shifts his cigar." Mr. Ingersoll's law practice is of enormous proportions, and it comes of his ability and honesty. Not many lawyers are there in this city who would be chosen by legal opponents to look after their interests when temporarily out of town. Yet Colonel Ingersoll has been so selected many times. A man whom Mr. Ingersoll believes to hav a dishonest claim cannot get his services. He goes strong on equity and justice, and has mighty little respect for "law." He knows lawmakers from hatcrown to bootheel.

WHEN unacquainted with Clark Braden, Mr. Charles Watts was induced to debate with him, meetings which he now regrets. In Secular Thought of the 1st instant he says: "We thoroughly indorse THE TRUTH SEEKER'S opinion of this man. From personal experience we know him to be destitute of truth, honor, and every quality of a gentleman. It would be a degradation of the deepest dye to meet him on a public platform. Besides, he is intellectually weak; he has a few cut-and-dried propositions that may mean anything or nothing, and from these he never departs, and while in their company he cannot show that they hav any peculiar relation to Christianity. Mr. Harry Hoover, of Pittsburgh, has collected the facts of Braden's life, and sent them to us. After reading them one could no longer doubt the reality of human depravity."

WE had not heard that Dr. J. L. York had abandoned his former faith in "another world" or had any reason to doubt that its existence is proven by so-called modern Spiritualism. By the subjoined letter, however, it seems the eloquent doctor is open to conviction:

SHEPARD, O., Sept. 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav seen it stated several times in THE TRUTH SEEKER during the past few years that Dr. J. L. York was a Spiritualist, and I was somewhat surprised to hear him declare, as he did at both lectures he delivered in Columbus last month, that "he did not know whether there was another life after this or not—that he was an Agnostic on this point," etc. I notice in last week's paper, under the head of "Heretical Personalities," that you speak of him again as a Spiritualist. He may hav been once, but he surely is not one now. Respectfully yours,

F. S. MONTGOMERY.

Dr. York lectures before the Manhattan Liberal Club, 220 East 15th street, on Friday, the 7th instant, and some of the disputants may bring him out on this subject.

THE following handsome compliment to a deserving youth is from the Ironclad Age of September 24th: "The communications of George E. Macdonald, from New England, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, September 10th and 17th, are most admirable in their way, and lead us to suggest and wish that George be permanently maintained as an 'Idler.' There is that vein of racy humor and genuin wit and irony pervading his composition which makes descriptiv writing so enjoyable to every man who has a proper head set properly upon his shoulders. George must be a rare young boy. We confess to the weakness of having critically read his communications over the second time, merely for the pleasure his style of writing imparts. In earlier years Charles Lever was wont to charm us 'never so wisely,' and we still love to spend an hour with this splendid author, notwithstanding that his stories are old and little appreciated by this generation of vipers—for we hav most of us become too viperish in our styles of utterance."

ONE of the finest fellows in the Liberal ranks is L. K. Washburn, the black-eyed orator of Paine Hall. He is yet a young man, but has experienced more vicissitudes of fortune than most men of twice his age. His strongest glory is independence, and whatever comes to him through exercising it he takes with good humor. He has severed his lectureship connection with the Investigator, but will speak in Paine Hall several Sundays this month, and is ready to respond to all calls that may reach him. We never met a man who knew Mr. Washburn and didn't like him, and the ladies are suspiciously in earnest in their praises of him. His platform voice is musical, the matter of his lectures is aggressivly radical, and he takes a fifty-dollar fee or a fifteen-cent collection with the same expression of resignation on his handsome face. He givs the fruits of his genius to the world, and is happiest when he has scored a point against the church and religion he once partially supported. Mr. Washburn is of medium hight, well-built and nervous, full of the liveliest kind of life, and can sail a yacht, stake out an oyster-bed, or catch fish with the saltest old skipper on the Massachusetts coast. His study at his home in Revere overlooks the ocean, and he catches some of its breezy bigness to put into his lectures.

LEST our artist become self-conceited by the many words of praise bestowed on his pictorial efforts, we print the following letter:

"The friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER in this vicinity are generally disgusted with your 'pictures,' and since you hav become the patron of such bastard art I hide your paper for fear some one should see a copy of it. Previous to the event of the TRUTH SEEKER illustrations, no one was more enthusiastic in its distribution than I, but now I tear off the outsides because I am ashamed of the pollution. Those glorious Oswald articles are lost to thousands who would read them with intense interest, but now we are ashamed to hand them to a decent Christian on account of the filth surrounding them. All those fond of such trash indorse them, of course, but the thousands of better taste and sense who despise them say nothing or drop your paper. This is not for publication, but strictly in your interest from a friend."

As the communication was not intended for publication, we suppress the name of the writer. As he is a gentleman whom we esteem, we hav procured a quantity of ashes, and as soon as we can raise funds shall purchase some sackcloth, and sit therein to the end that the scriptures might be fulfilled. But as the pictures hav proved very efficacious in converting Christians in other communities, we shall be forced to continue them awhile longer.

THE editor of the New Hampton, Iowa, Tribune is an Infidel, and not afraid to say so. On the 16th ult. Mr. Haislet induced John E. Remsburg to lecture in his town, and appealed "to the people of New Hampton, and especially the ladies," in these words: "During our residence here of about eleven years ourself and family, though not church-members, hav been called upon several hundreds of times to assist in church matters. We hav published notices and posters free, or contributed money outright for the benefit of every church in this city. We hav been solicited by ministers and delegations of ladies and gentlemen, and we cannot recall three instances, during those years, when we hav refused them aid. Though we hav condemned religion, we hav not been intolerant toward the churches, nor do we intend to be in the future. But this we do ask, in the name of courtesy and fairness: We want the ladies and gentlemen who hav solicited our aid and attendance so many times, to go and listen to Remsburg on Thursday evening. We hav a right to ask and expect this from those who would 'do unto others as they would that others should do unto them.' We are not speaking for ourselvs alone now, but for all the unbelievers in this town and county, and they are more numerous, among all nationalities, than you hav any idea of." After that, if the New Hamptonites, and especially the ladies, did not turn out, there is no use of Mr. Haislet's contributing any further sums of money to the churches.

IN the first Freethinkers' Magazine issued after the convention of the Henry George party appeared an editorial from the pen of T. B. Wakeman, urging all Liberals to support that party "to the extent of their means." Since then Mr. Wakeman has been made a candidate for the state attorney generalship of the Progressiv Labor party, which is the Socialist party under another name. The main object in life of the Progressiv Labor party is to defeat Henry George this fall, and show him that without the support of the Socialists he is not so big a man as he thinks he is. In this way they propose to be revenged upon him for excommunicating them at the Syracuse Convention. Mr. Wakeman now refers to Mr. George as a hallucinated individual. We shall record Mr. Wakeman's further flops with painstaking accuracy, and we are prepared for cataclysmic surprises. Mr. Wakeman goes for the latest truth as it appears to him as a lawyer, not as the farmer who can get heavier crops off an acre than any other man in Stamford, Conn., where he puts in his spare time. In person Mr. Wakeman is large, sleek, and rotund, and looks more like a theologian than a politician, and has, perhaps, more of the former's characteristics. He is a prohibitionist as well as a scholar, plants three kinds of crops on the same ground, and makes each kind a good one, and in other ways astonishes the Connecticut folks with his scientific attainments. Here in New York he is a member of the law firm of Wakeman and Campbell, but his solidest claim to fame is the many years he presided over the meetings of the Manhattan Liberal Club.

NEW YORK is a good place to purchase dry goods, and prosperous W. W. Frasier, of Ottawa, Kan., appreciated the fact by making the city a visit last week, and incidentally climbing up to the spacious sanctum of the TRUTH SEEKER Editor. Mr. Frasier is about the only Freethinker at present holding the fort in Ottawa, and he has not escaped odium and calumny for his steadfast faith in the truth. He knows about all the condemned Chicago Anarchists, says they are gentlemen and not dynamiters, and is sorry that they cannot hav a fair trial. Mr. Frazier knows Clark Braden well, having acted as best man to Champion Jamieson in arranging a debate between them, out of which Braden crawled. Mr. Frazier convicted Braden of lying, and finally in Fort Scott Braden mustered up courage to meet Mr. Jamieson. Shortly after the debate Braden's wife died, and Mr. Frasier also lost two children. Braden soon appeared in Ottawa, and in the Methodist church produced a clipping from the Investigator denying the existence of heaven, and asked the audience how they supposed Mr. Frasier would feel to hav had it read at the grave of his children. When at the close of his sermon Braden invited questions, Mr. Frasier, who was in the audience, reached upon the platform and secured the Bible lying there. Turning to Ecclesiastes iii, 9, he read: "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath; so that a man hath no preëminence above a beast: for all is vanity." Looking straight at Braden, he asked him how he would like to hav had that read over the grave of his wife. At once the Christians had Mr. Frasier arrested for disturbing a religious meeting, but when he appeared at court the next morning the public attorney refused to prosecute. Mr. Frasier is the only man in Ottawa who stood up for the Salvation Army when the church-members abused them, telling the orthodox that the Salvation circus was too entertaining to drive away.

False Reasoning.

A certain Infidel calling upon his friend, an astronomer, noticed several globes lying on a table, and admiring their appearance, he inquired as to where they had been obtained and who was the maker of them.

"What would you say were I to tell you that no one made them, and that they came here of their own accord?" questioned the astronomer in reply.

"Such a thing would be impossible," answered the Infidel.

"And yet," said the astronomer, "you believe that the globe we inhabit, the sun and other planets, and, in short, that the entire universe had no maker and came into existence by mere chance."

This is one of the many instances of the narrow-minded and illogical reasonings set forth to demonstrate the falsity of beliefs which are contrary to the established creed. Not only is there a failure to illustrate or prove that which is attempted, for but one side of the question is heard, and no conclusion can therefore be drawn; but the astronomer's accusation is false. Yet it serves as an example to show what bigoted ideas are entertained respecting the beliefs, or, more commonly speaking, the disbeliefs, of so-called Infidels. If, for various reasons, a man cannot conscientiously accept the general beliefs, he is not asked for the reasons, but is, without delay, stigmatized an Infidel. This, then, implies that he has no religion, believes in no God, will break the ten commandments as often as he chooses, and commit any sin without shame or fear; an individual, therefore, to be avoided.

In the case before us, the astronomer's statement of his friend's belief regarding the creation is supposed to be applicable to all Infidels, and is accepted as undeniable; for if a man is an Infidel, he does not believe the Bible; and if he does not believe the Bible, he cannot believe the account of the creation, and therefore he must believe the world was created by nothing. Such a proof as this is regarded as irrefutable, and is such that it must completely silence all Infidels; for the Bible with its story of the creation is impregnable against the attacks of science and Infidelity.

But let us view this matter in the light of reason.

Man's beliefs are dependent upon his state of mentality, and different degrees of mentality naturally produce different ideas. But notwithstanding the multiplicity of beliefs due to this cause, they all are derived from a common source—all are the offshoots of one root.

All men know that the world, in its present form, was created at some time, but how and when is not known; and on this conjectural point it is that men's ideas differ.

Every human being, whether he be a savage of the lowest tribe, or a philosopher of the highest intellectual cultivation, believes that the world he inhabits was created, and that the entire universe is controled, by some power infinitly superior to that of the mightiest human capabilities; a power, a something, too great, too vague, to be comprehended or conceived of. Now, it matters not by what name this is called, whether in the idea of its being law, force, cause, matter, or being, as it is but the human endeavor to express and make tangible that which is inexpressible and intangible. All peoples had, and hav, beliefs regarding it, which, as stated above, accorded with and are adapted to their civilization and mental status.

With such facts in mind, how narrow-minded, how illogical, how absurd the idea appears, that because one denies the theopneusty of the Bible, he likewise denies the existence of any higher power and believes the world came into being by "mere chance!" It might as reasonably be urged that he also denies that such a creature as man exists, because the Bible says he does.

It is the beliefs, and not the fundamental causes thereof, wherein minds differ. DORANT.

The Idler Shatters an Idol.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: How often can any one who admires the truth say a good word for a minister without doing violence to his conscience?

If you read the last instalment of my recent communication under the head of "The Annual Idler," you may recall that I spoke of a certain Rev. Jehiel Claflin as (1) a man who was once an abolition orator, and added (2) that he lost his pastorate by being independent in politics.

The first statement would be true, except for the fact, which I hav since learned from a reliable source, that Mr. Claflin was not an orator in those days, and that he performed his great services to the cause of abolition on paper. He wrote tremendous letters, and frequent, to Pillsbury and Johnson, from which they formed the impression that the north star they had seen in the direction of East Westmoreland, N. H., was set there to indicate the whereabouts of Elder Claflin. At the same time the elder was booming a petition, and had got nearly all the women and children of his parish to giv it the weight of their signatures, praying that the country might be divided, and the slaveholding segment set off by itself. This being the elder's course, my remarks about him on that head lose their force by becoming untrue.

As to the second statement, the cause of his losing his pastorate was not his independence in politics. The fact is that among the chief supporters of the church were men who professed to hav grown weary of being toasted over the everlasting fires. Some even made bold to avow a disbelief in the actual existence of any such fires, and in the hardness of their hearts declined to support a preacher who advocated the brimstone hypothesis. As the elder persisted in giving them Christianity hell-end foremost, he had to go. Such being the case, my previous remarks here also lose their application.

Let me add that I was not always thus. I was in 1872 or thereabouts a regular attendant upon the ministrations of Elder Claflin, and had at that time not the slightest doubt of the ultimate destiny of mankind. The deacon in whose family I lived had assured me that I would go to hell, and I had assured him that he ought to; so on the subject of religion my mind was at rest. I sawed the winter's wood for the meeting-house, and with a good fire at one end and hell at the other, the congregation did not suffer so much from inclemency of the weather as they might but for the efforts of myself and Elder Claflin. I don't like this having to take back anything good that I hav said about my old partner, but truth demands it, and truth and I hav always written with the same quill. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Religion and Its Origin.

Since criticism has rendered the old solution comparativly untenable, none has been given which has won the confidence of the people, and the question as to religion and its origin is still an open one. The memory of the old disputation, and the disgraceful controversy which filled the world with bitter strife and angry feelings, resulting, not infrequently, in the shedding of blood, does not seemingly leave upon us the impression that the end has come. Definitions hav not been wanting, but the one that will end the controversy has not come as yet to stay, I fear. The religions of the gods, of angels and men, all fail in the last analysis in finding a solid substratum upon which they can rest in unity. These religions cannot worship at the same shrine, cannot receive the same sacrament, cannot swear by the same sacred book, cannot tolerate the same priesthood, will not die under the same environments if preventable, will not consent to rest in the same dirt, neither will they hav the same heaven and hell.

There is a longing hope looking forward for the time to come when this vexed and troublesome subject will find a settlement, at least in the minds of the more thoughtful. I think the hindrance hitherto is largely a result of a feeling, on the part of these thoughtful people, of veneration for a name or word which has been so intimately interwoven in the life of those whom they love. The memory of our dear dead may, perchance, tend to turn the edge of the intellectual blade, and our criticism fail to dissect these religions as it otherwise would hav done if these memories were not. Then there are so many praiseworthy things in the life of these religious devotees, so many that savor of sweetness, which are held in loving memory; yet these ought not to stand in the way of finding the real value of religions, if such they hav, and we must not disturb unwittingly the repose of these religious devotees, nor ill-treat these memories. Were it impossible to hav the same sublime hopes without these religions, I would be the last one in this world to slaughter these hopes, but I am fully satisfied that all that ever came to mortal man under the high promises of religions, and the strongest faith therein that ever cherished a hope within his heart, or placed a cup of joy to his lips, or made life noble and sublime—all of these can be attained in a higher expression with a much larger satisfaction than ever came through unbroken allegiance to any or all of the religions in this world.

I cannot but believe if every symbol of religion, every structure raised in its honor, every sacrament rendering it support, every hope that rises above the ocean of doubt, and every thought and feeling springing from religious devotion were forever utterly blotted out of existence, nothing but good could come to humanity's great heart and life. Not a word of love or sweetness, not a word of tenderness or kindness, would drop out of the language in which civilization utters its thoughts. It is evident a change like this would fill millions of eyes with tears, but those tears, and the sorrow that prompted them, would soon giv place to clearer views, and a much greater joy would come as a result of emancipation from that which largely grew out of the accident of time and place. But this will not do. I see that I am anticipating. First, What is religion? The definition claiming the many millions of our race as devotees may be rendered in the following terms. Religion is the gift of the gods. It is a change inwrought in the devotee. "It is a work of grace. It is above the human. Human beings can only use divinely-ordained means. All human agencies are only means to an end, they cannot create religion within. He that attains to or gets religion must find the source of that religion in his divinity. The God, or the gods, work in us to will and to do. Religion is his or their work through the agency of the holy ghosts. We are born again, not of ourselvs but the gift of God, lest any man should boast. It is the God in unity, or trinity, that is reconstructing within the devotee his divinity. He becomes a child of God, and the sinful pleasures of this world hav been crucified to him. He is not of this world, seeing that he is redeemed from the curse of sin, and the seed of God remains within him, and he cannot sin."

Such is the divine providence. It binds us back to God. This is religion. This is the definition substantially of all of the great religions of the world. The background of all religions coming under the definition given is fear and mystery; and this would very naturally suggest Mr. Spencer's theory of religion. Mr. Spencer in his "Genesis of Religion" finds its highest expression in belief in the mysterious, in the Unknowable, the Inscrutable. It is not at all unreasonable that in the infancy of thought this kind of heredity should claim first recognition. Fear and mystery, transmitted from the lower forms to the higher, became the basis of religion in this higher structural form, not necessarily, but incidentally. Max Muller and Mr. Spencer fundamentally are one as to the Unknowable—striking out Mr. Muller's inconsistency, which allows the Unknowable to be revealed. Mr. Muller cannot even find the lowest form of religion only in a conception of the incomprehensible God. The differences in the genesis of religion are widely asunder, as held by these representativ men. Mr. Spencer's belief in the settlement of religion is as follows: "Common sense asserts the existence of a reality; objectiv science proves that this reality cannot be what we think it; subjectiv science shows why we cannot think of it as it is, and yet are compelled to think of it as existing; and in the assertion of a reality utterly inscrutable in nature, religion finds an assertion exactly coinciding with his own. We are obliged to regard every phenomenon as a manifestation of some power by which we are acted upon; phenomena being, so far as we can ascertain, unlimited in their diffusion, we are obliged to regard this power as omnipresent; and criticism teaches us that this power is wholly incomprehensible. In this consciousness of an incomprehensible power, we hav just that consciousness on which religion dwells. And so we arrive at that point where science and religion coalesce." In this brief we hav Mr. Spencer's religious theory. The incomprehensible power, the inscrutable, the Unknowable, is the basis, the foundation, of all religions. Rather, this element persists in all religions. That is the ultimate verity.

Belief in this incomprehensible power is the (religiously speaking) substratum, so to speak, of all religious manifestation. But our thoughts of this incomprehensible power (of this reality), if we hav any at all, cannot be as we think—that is to say, that our thoughts cannot represent anything that corresponds to the reality. Then it follows that our thoughts are not like the reality. But how this conclusion is reached, or how it is possible to arrive at such a conclusion without invoking a process of comparison, does not appear evident. Before it is possible to affirm that our notions of an inscrutable existence are utterly unlike that existence, we must know that existence, as the very basis of that affirmation. This, seemingly, is strangely inconsistent, when religion is made to stand for something, as its background, which is an inscrutable verity. "We shall always be under the necessity of contemplating this inscrutable verity as some mode of being; that is, of representing it to ourselvs in some form of thought, however vague. And we shall not err, in doing this, so long as we treat every notion we thus form as merely a symbol, utterly without resemblance to that for which it stands." This total lack of resemblance is a sure guarantee that "we shall not err!" This is clear and positiv. Now, such clearness as to this total lack of resemblance between objects of thought, when one of these objects is unthinkable, is not evident. If both are not objects of thought, how is this denial of resemblance possible without comparison? This, at once, grants unto us the clue to the following remarkable statement: "Religion, in all of its forms, is distinguishable from everything else in this, that its subject matter is that which passes the sphere of experience." When it is utterly without resemblance to that for which it stands, this would, of course, exclude it from the sphere of experience. This "It" of Mr. Spencer's must stand for something or it has no meaning. Whatever that something is, or is not, is a relativ something, and must stand related; and this necessarily leaves us where all discussions beyond our limits must leave us.

No sooner do we postulate this unknowable behind phenomena, than with equal propriety we postulate behind it the unknowable still—an ever-receding unknowable—an ever-receding, inscrutable, incomprehensible power. Then what progress hav we made, more than the child, when it asks, "Mamma, who made God?" All discussion must necessarily terminate within the sphere of limitation. No affirmations are possible to us only as they entirely relate to the limited. There is a limitation to human thought—if there are objects of thought in the universe that are not limited, we may take it for granted that it will not come within our province to affirm or deny as to them. That we are constantly under such limitation is evident from the fact that we, who do the thinking, are limited. Words, otherwise used, certainly cannot convey to our minds any rational meaning. When we cease to be limited—then, perchance, we can tell what we can think—but not now. When the "I" passes through a thousand translations, or ten thousand incarnations, it may be possible for us to think of Mr. Spencer's "It" that is utterly without resemblance to that for which it stands. But, perhaps, if we could abstract all our thoughts from the "It," its balance might be its quantitativ and qualitativ value. All attempts to found religion upon such a basis must necessarily result in leaving the question just where it was when the discussion began. The "inscrutable verity"—belief in which is religion—this same "inscrutable verity" is the supreme cause, the ultimate cause, the unknowable, the unthinkable, and the noumenon. These terms are all one and the same. We are allowed to know phenomena, but not noumenon; but at this point the problem becomes an interesting one, for when we attempt to invest these worlds with meaning we are met with the statement that "all our notions are utterly without resemblance to that for which they stand." We are told that phenomena necessarily imply noumenon, so there is no phenomenon without noumenon; then there is a necessary relation existing between phenomenon and noumenon; and hence, if phenomenon is a manifestation of noumenon, if the scrutable is a manifestation of the inscrutable, if the knowable is a manifestation of the unknowable, it is a little surprising how these facts were ever found out, when "our notions are utterly without resemblance to that for which they stand."

Thus it is, and thus it ever will be, when we cast our line beyond our limits; there is no response, affirmativ or negativ. There is no man living, or dead, for whom I entertain such profound respect as I do for Mr. Spencer, but I cannot acknowledge that his foundation for religion is true, seeing that it is belief in the Unknowable. M. Comte's religion of humanity—with due respect to the ability of this great man—is the most absurd of anything that ever won recognition. That religion is human as soon as we reject the first definition, is evident enough. While religion is human, it is not the religion of humanity, seeing that there are many that hav no religion at all. There are many kinds of religion, if history is true, and M. Comte's religion is one of the many, and a very small one at that. Its English pope, Mr. Harrison, is the only authorized exponent of the Religion of Humanity. Mr. Harrison must laugh in his sleeves when he cherisheth the thought that his religion is this Religion of Humanity. It is useless to use up time in discussing the absurd claim set up by adherents to this religion. Another new religion of recent origin—while we can recognize its method pointing toward needed reforms, we must think that its name is ill chosen—"Free Religion"—certainly there is no such. We can imagin that under the stress of circumstances this name was chosen. It is doubtless destined to giv way to a better name in the near future, more in accord with the ability of the gentlemen who are its advocates. In connection with this movement we hav an idea suggested as to the function of this religion, seen in the perfecting of oneself, or the perfecting of our nature. This end is founded in no possible experience of our race, for it is supposing religion to do that for which it has an utter incapacity.

Religion does not work in this way. Its tendencies as seen in the light of history point in quite a different direction. I must say, finally, in taking the value of these definitions, I am quite unable to find any relief. The religions of the world stand before us. Their history cannot be divorced from them on account of any fancy definition given. Religions must be studied in connection with their history. Religions are burnt into the black pages which they hav made. Their history has been through all ages a baptism of blood. They cannot claim to be the gifts of the gods. They cannot claim to be inscrutable, unknowable, incomprehensible. Nor can any of them claim to be fundamental in human nature. Human nature is not a pledge for their existence, as religion proper is older than human nature, and, in fact, it is only incidental to human nature. Religions stand out in bold relief. They are naked, and at this day hav no means of concealment. They hav no apparel with which to cover or conceal their names or history. And, in fact, there are no ideas in all history so far from the unknowable, so remote from the inscrutable and the incomprehensible, as are our religious ideas. They are the sickly food of the lowest tribes, and the most degraded and deformed of mankind. So true is this, that religions are stripped of all that is mysterious. So naked are they, and so easily understood, that "the wayfaring and the fool need not err therein." Religions hav, and they do to-day, voiced the blackest villainy and the deepest and lowest degradation of all times and places. They hav kindled the fires of persecution a thousand times in the name of their gods, and they hav defiled and draped with their filthy slime the statutes of all human civilization. And they would rejoice to-day if they could kindle the fires that would burn to ashes every man and woman exercising the freedom of speech, Mr. Ingersoll not excepted.

Our London Letter.

In these days of general enlightenment and advanced scientific knowledge it is rather surprising that members of the British Association, during their annual meeting, now being held at Manchester, should countenance the "devotional" meetings held last Sunday, when, with their usual impudent assurance, the clergy were endeavoring to show how amicably religion and science went hand in hand. At the cathedral the bishop of Carlisle held forth from the text, "Blessed are the eyes which see the things that ye see." He said that one of the chief features of the advance of science was the successful application of knowledge to the wants of man, and that the priests of science and the priests of Christianity must be brothers and fellow-workers, because science was truth, and Christianity was the very truth itself. The bishop of Bedford also discoursed in like manner, and stated that many needless difficulties had arisen from the prevalence of a narrow and mechanical view of inspiration. He gave some illustrations to prove that the biblical writers used the ordinary phenomenal language of their day as to matters of science, without being supernaturally cognizant of the mysteries of the universe or of the records of universal history. There were also sermons preached on the same subject by other and lesser lights, and, of course, the moral was always the same, i. e., that religion had always been ready to help and advance science. Now, I cannot help wondering whether these preachers are knowingly telling most bare-faced lies, or whether the narrowness of their minds, caused by a limited education, has really so blinded them to facts that they believe they are speaking the truth. Of course, parsons are generally reputed to be men of deep learning, though it is a question if the most profound knowledge of dead languages and theological writings can in any way be considered as learning in any but the most limited sense of the term. What knowledge can such men hav of universal or even church history? They hav only to read the works of historians who hav written in favor of what is called Christianity, to see at once that their present statements are utterly at variance with truth. Surely they can never hav heard of such men as Galileo or Priestley, and scores of others, who hav been harried and persecuted by the church for promulgating scientific truths which were at that time seen to be antagonistic to religion But, at all events, the church was so far honest in those days, and acted according to the injunctions laid down by its reputed founders with regard to unbelievers. Perhaps, however, and more likely than not, it would be just as honest nowadays if it had as much power as formerly, but now its talons are cut and its beak blunted; it resorts to lying and subterfuge, and will submit to being shown to be the poor, miserable imposition it is, knowing well that it will take time to utterly destroy its power and strip it of all its ill-gotten gains. So long as it brings grist to the mill, what does it matter? It will doubtless last the time of those who at present liv by it, and their successors must look after themselvs. The pious wish of the bishop of Carlisle, that the priests of science and those of Christianity may be brothers and fellow-workers, if carried out. will be a very good thing for the latter, but will sadly handicap the former. Science and Christianity are and must be utterly opposed to one another, and the sooner scientific men can divest themselvs of supernaturalism and see these matters in their true light, the better for themselvs and humanity. What advances can science make so long as it is tied to such a dead weight? It proceeds, certainly, but far more slowly than it would do were it perfectly free. If scientific men were not skeptical they would become extinct; and it is the skepticism they possess, even without apparently knowing that such is the case, that enables them to continue to extend their discoveries. Perhaps the coming generation will be better able to throw off the theological yoke than their immediate predecessors, who can not rid themselvs of the incubus of "early religious training." J. D.

The Mormon Hierarchy.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I am fully aware of the confidence your intelligent readers place in your editorials. Ever since I became a truth seeker, it has always been my aim and object to tell the truth, as undoubtedly it is yours, but when I read in your excellent paper of August 27, 1887. that you defend Mrs. Slenker for the same reason that you denounce the legal persecution of the Mormon church, I am not only surprised but astonished that you should sip your inspiration from the fountain of all lies, the Mormon priesthood There is no comparison at all between the two. There is not a particle of doubt in my mind that every letter of Mrs. Slenker's has been opened and read by Comstock or by some of that miscreant's emissaries ever since she made herself so conspicuous in the defense of D. M Bennett. She is being illegally tortured by this unconstitutional postal law, which would be repealed without a doubt if the Freethinkers in behalf of Mrs. Slenker would arrest Anthony Comstock for false imprisonment, and carry it to the Supreme Court for final decision. The only reasonable way I can account for your great mistake is that you hav been reading the Senate or the Edmunds bill, which was never passed, and never became law without President Cleveland's signature, and there are no persons in Utah who ever wanted it passed, except possibly a few Christian cranks; and that class is small in Utah. I am pleased to say. You will pardon me, friend Macdonald, if I now make a short reply to your editorial.

Allow me to state. then, that I first heard Mormonism preached in 1851. In 1853 I joined the Mormon church, when a youth, unknown to my parents, at the request of Mormon elders. I left New York city the first week in May, 1856, for Utah. So I am competent by sad experience to speak of this Mormon octopus. I will guarantee every Freethinker in Utah will bear witness to every statement I make.

Now to your article. First, the Mormon church was never organized under the Utah territorial laws, but under the priesthood's independent state of Deseret, in March, 1849. The treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo was in 1848. In 1850 September 9th. the Organic act was passed for the territory of Utah. This independent state of the Mormons embraced Utah, Arizona, Colorado, Carson Valley (Cal.), Nevada, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, and Nebraska. Of course, as soon as the Organic act was passed and became known in Utah it made null and void the state of Deseret. But the Mormons were determined to hav an independent state, that is, a kingdom, to be exclusivly for Mormons, and on Feb. 8, 1851, this state of Deseret, with her state officers, passed an act incorporating the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. This was five months after the Organic act passed. Then the Mormon priests organized the Perpetual Emigration Company, and made it an annex to the church, for the board of the church was to appoint the board of managers of the Emigration Company. Next these divine leglislators gave all Caché Valley to Brigham Young in trust for the church. In fact, it was all church and no state. Brigham Young was governor, prophet, seer, and revelator; head of the church and emigrating fund. and trustee for both. He appointed the legislators, chaplains, and all county officers. He was the high muck a-muck. That this is not so to-day in Utah is owing to the acts of Congress attempting to crush this priestly monstrosity.

If, by any possible means, Utah could become a state, while the Mormons hav such an overwhelming majority the same reign of terror would be inaugurated that existed here in 1855–6–7–8. In one year there would not be a Freethinker alive in Utah. In three years there would not be a gentile in all Utah; that is, of course, if they submitted like lambs to the slaughter, which they would not do; and if ever the awful cry of the gentiles (true American citizens) shall be raised, "Come over to Utah and help us, to save our lives, our families, our property, from these Mormon thieves, thugs, and seducers"—then the Mormon problem would be solved in the name of humanity. To prevent such a calamity, Utah must not become a state. There is not an American citizen, of any political party, or of any religion or irreligion, in Utah who is not willing to liv without state rights indefinitly. You cannot find a man in all Utah who wants a state government, except the Mormons. For the good of all, Utah must not become a state till the back of priesthood is broken.

Secondly, Mormonism is based on the assumption that God came down in the state of New York—with another personage, Jesus Christ—to a young man named Joseph Smith and said, "This is my beloved son; hear ye him." Peter, James, and John are alleged to hav come to the same young man. As a matter of fact, of course, it is all a priestly fabrication, like Joseph's dream, upon which is built Christianity. To be sure, the Mormons hav as much right to their religious belief as the Christians or Freethinkers—there is no one in Utah who attempts to abridge this right, or the right of free thought, speech, and press, except the Mormons. It is only four years ago that Charles W. Penrose, the editor of the Deseret News, filled column after column to prove that blood atonement was a true doctrin, but the time had not come to put it in practice. Why? Because we hav not yet a state government; but before Penrose left England for Utah the practice was in full force all over Utah. It became so frequent in Salt Lake City that it was a common saying, "Another man for breakfast!" This was before the "accursed gentiles" and the hated United States officials came to Utah to stay. You are aware, I suppose, that the Mormons ran out of Utah every United States officer, except Governor Cummings, from the time Brigham Young was removed from being governor till the advent of General Connor and the establishment of Camp Douglass.

I see the New York Sun has about the same ideas that George T. Curtis holds, namely, that there is no reason why Congress should refuse the admission of Utah into the Union since the Mormon constitution prohibits polygamy. They did not notice that this constitution did not giv women the right of franchise. Suppose Utah were admitted as a state, the polygamy clause would be null and void. With Mormon governor, judges, marshals, prosecuting attorneys, etc., there would never be an arrest, much less a conviction, and all the gush about the pardoning power of the president, governor, etc., is only Mormon taffy. Every Mormon as sincerely believes in the celestial order of marriage (polygamy) to-day as he did three months ago. People who believe such superstitions do not change their belief because it is incompatible with a republican form of goverment. This statehood ruse of the Mormons proves these people the most dishonest in the world. Every authority in the Mormon church or kingdom is a well known polygamist. Yet to gain political power, which they would hold absolutely, they counseled their serfs to take the oath prescribed by Congress, not to aid or abet, directly or indirectly, any person who practiced the crimes of polygamy, bigamy, or incest. In August they all voted to make the fulfilling of God's holy revelation on celestial marriage a misdemeanor. Can priestcraft ever sink lower than that? No person in the future can defend them under the pretext that it is their religious belief.

I do not for a moment doubt that the Catholic and Protestant churches, if they had the same opportunity to colonize a vast territory exclusivly of their own peculiar sect, would make just such a hell as the Mormons made of Utah when it was exclusivly Mormon. But the Mormon church has marshalled its hosts in battle array against the United States; it has nullified every law made by Congress for thirty years. In 1862 Congress made a law prohibiting polygamy, and providing that no church in the territories should own over fifty thousand dollars. The church forced the people faster than ever into polygamy, and robbed them more than ever, and made the attempt to compel them to turn over all their property to the church, under the pretext of joining the Order of Enoch. The church then had the brazen impudence to say to the United States officials, from 1862 till 1883, "If any of the Mormons are guilty, why don't you arrest and convict them?" This was the cry of the church papers all the time till the authorities commenced to enforce the Edmund's law, passed in 1882. Then the cry of persecution was raised by the church liars, and the cry of persecution has always been the battle-cry of the Mormon church. But I challenge the Mormon church, and all its aiders and abettors in New York city, or in the United States, to produce a single instance where the United States has ever persecuted the Mormon church or people. I am quite familiar with the true history of Kirtland, Missouri, Illinois, Utah, and the Mormon sensational stories. The five hundred so-called volunteers from the Mormon camp were merely hirelings of Brigham Young—hired out by Col. J. C. Little to President Polk; and Brigham Young sent two men to Santa Fé to receive their (the "volunteers'") pay while en route to Utah and bring it to him. The two men, or agents of Brigham Young, were John D. Lee and Howard Egan, both notorious murderers, and were executed to save their masters from the scaffold.

Brigham grumbled when they returned because government had not paid them up to date. To this hangs a long tale of intrigue of Brigham Young and the Mormon church with President Polk, and the Mormon petition to the British Parliament for funds to land twenty thousand British subjects on the Pacific coast to take possession of Oregon and Vancouver's Island for the British queen. This was in 1846–7. (See correspondence of Lord John Russell, M.P., and T. D. Brown, Mormon agent.) Col. T. L. Kane, of Philadelphia, introduced Col. Jesse C. Little, Brigham Young's agent, to President Polk, who offered to furnish twenty thousand men on the Pacific coast; and Colonel Little was so persistent in his importunities for him to engage these twenty thousand Mormons, as regulars or volunteers, that Polk grew suspicious. and declined to engage over five hundred. And these were all Brigham Young had in America to spare; the balance were in England. If the Mormon church could do this in the green tree, what will it do now if it has the chance?

These are facts, and can be proved by church works which I hav, except the interviews with President Polk, which are in Washington, D. C.

The Maoris Still Heathens.

From the Otago, New Zealand, Witness.

An American religious newspaper announces that "Christianity is making considerable progress among the Maoris of New Zealand." On the principle of going from home to hear news, there is nothing surprising in our getting the latest information about Christianity among the Maoris from religious circles in America. But the news itself is surprising in a very eminent degree. A key to its interpretation may, perhaps, be obtained from another item of church news in the same paper:

A Wilkes-Barre clergyman announced, on a recent Sunday morning, that he would preach in the evening on the topic, "How to Liv a Good Christian Life." The congregation assembled at the proper time and waited to be enlightened, but the minister failed to appear. At last a committee found him at the police station, where he was locked up on a charge of drunken and disorderly conduct. He had been favored with a baby, and. in his exultation, drank more wine than he could manage.

The Maoris are progressing in the Christian life much after the fashion of the Wilkes-Barre clergyman. Read, for example, the interesting details in this week's papers about the new "Parihaka incident." an incident consisting in something like a pitched battle over the capture of Maori sly grog sellers. Another "incident" of the same belligerent character, a few weeks back, occurred at the arrest of some dangerous fanatics belonging to the Hauhau persuasion. The only per contra fact I know of relating to the recent spread of Christianity amongst the Maoris is an advertisment in the Riverton paper signed, "Horomona Paotu, head of Ngatimamoe tribe." Horomona advertises that he has been to heaven, up a ladder, and describes some persons and things that he saw there, which facts, says Horomona, "are very hard for us to think over, except those which are born in the spirit." This seer, fortunately for himself, resides in the extreme south. Had he lived in northern Maoriland he would probably be a Hauhau, and in durance vile with his fanatical compatriots.

TWO THINGS WANTED.

First. We want some money from every friend who owes on his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The balance in the bank from which to draw to satisfy the paper manufacturers and the printer is very small, and we must increase it, or run in debt. There are many hundreds of dollars owing us by subscribers, and we desire to kindly but firmly call their attention to the matter. We need the money, and it is not right for them to keep it from us. We would also respectfully suggest to those whose subscriptions expire during the present month that now is the time to renew. We would call attention, too, to our club rates. Get a new subscriber, and so get your own paper cheaper.

Second. We once more ask our friends to send us the names of all the Infidels of their acquaintance who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. The intention is to send them sample copies of the paper with the hope that they may subscribe.

An Advance in Doctrin.

Judge Stephen Brewer, of Ithaca, N. Y., has forced the Presbyterians to take one step ahead, and to repudiate one of the cardinal doctrins of their creed. In an "Open Letter to Colonel Ingersoll," Henry M. Field, editor of the Evangelist, said: "I never heard of any Christian teacher who said that the creator brought beings into the world to destroy them." Judge Brewer, in a letter to the Evangelist, quotes the Presbyterian "Confession of Faith," which uses this language:

"God from all eternity did, by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass.

"Although God knows whatsoever may or can come to pass upon all supposed conditions, yet hath he not decreed anything because he foresaw it as future, or as that which would come to pass upon such conditions.

"By the decrees of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained unto everlasting death.

"These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definit that it cannot be either increased or diminished."

The creed, as Judge Brewer reminds Dr. Field, then goes on to say that this predestinating was done "before the foundation of the world was laid," and that "without any foresight of faith, or good works or perseverance, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him [the creator] thereunto;" which clearly proves, according to Calvinistic Christianity, that "the creator brought beings into the world to destroy them." With this, Judge Brewer rests his case.

In his reply, Dr. Field admits that these extracts are against him, and that he finds it "a difficult matter to justify or explain them." He therefore repudiates them by quoting, "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" and saying that "we speak only for the churches of to-day." And if, by any possible contingency, "any number of men worth noticing should avow or imply, as contained in their creed, such a horrible doctrin as that 'God created human beings in order to destroy them,' then in that case we should go a step farther, and repudiate, not the construction, but the Confession itself."

Of course this is heresy, but Dr. Field sent Judge Brewer's letter to "one of the most distinguished professors of theology in this country," and the professor agrees with him, by saying:

"Even if it could be shown that the Westminster Confession justifies the interpretation given by your correspondent, the Presbyterianism of our country and our time does not in any way indorse that interpretation. Not a line can be quoted from the writings of any representativ theologian of our church that would sustain such a construction. Our foremost theological teachers maintain the contrary, and declare that our Confession ought not to be interpreted as teaching any such thing; and if a thousand Presbyterian ministers were summoned into court, every one of them would testify that no such doctrin is taught in our symbols. Every man of them would repudiate it as false, and each and all would declare before God and men that they hold no such opinion. Why, then, should a possible interpretation of certain detached expressions in our creed be set over against such living testimony? Why should it be charged upon Presbyterians in this age that they hold what they are unanimous in repudiating, and what their best living theologians hav taken special pains to controvert?"

All this is very satisfactory as a sign of progress in Presbyterianism, but it in no way justifies Dr. Field's assertion that he never heard of a Christian who believed that God brought beings into the world to destroy. Both Dr. Field and the distinguished professor of theology practically admit that that belief did once obtain, and the twist given it by Dr. Field to mean no living Christian is a mere quibble. And it is besides not a little dishonest. For, unless every ordained preacher of the Presbyterian church has told a falsehood when obtaining his license from the presbytery, he believes it now. The second question put to a candidate for the Presbyterian ministry is, "Do you sincerely receive and adopt the Confession of Faith of this church as containing the system of doctrin taught in the holy scriptures?" And a Presbyterian minister's license contains these words: "And he having adopted the Confession of Faith of this church, the presbytery, did, and hereby do, license him to preach the gospel of Christ." Therefore the assertion that no Presbyterian now believes the doctrin so horrible to Dr. Field is false. If "the Presbyterianism of our country and our time does not in any way indorse" that extract from the Westminster Confession, why is it in the constitution of the Presbyterian church in the United States, as ratified by the General Assembly in 1821, amended in 1833, sold by the Presbyterian board of publication at the present time, and used to-day by all the churches? Please stand up, Dr. Field and distinguished professor of theology, and answer this!

Moreover, while we may be satisfied and glad that Mr. Field and a distinguished professor of theology repudiate a doctrin found in the Confession of Faith, this repudiation is no answer to Judge Brewer nor justification of the original remark. Dr. Field abuses Colonel Ingersoll for "misrepresenting" Christian teaching, and says he never heard of a Christian holding the doctrins denounced by Colonel Ingersoll. This is the same as saying, and will be so accepted by nearly everyone unacquainted with the minute diabolicalness of Christianity, that the doctrins were never taught by Christians. Dr. Field did not say that the doctrin had been abandoned; he implied—and with dishonest deliberation, we believe—that it never had been held. Of course, then, there are but two conclusions to be reached. The first is that Dr. Field never heard of John Calvin, nor the Westminster Confession, nor the present Presbyterian book labeled "Confession of Faith." The second is that he distorted the truth for the sake of scoring a point against an opponent. For one, we find it extremely hard to adopt the former hypothesis.

The Province of Quebec.

An editorial in the Toronto Mail of the 19th ult. calls attention to a state of affairs in Lower Canada astonishing, in this era of the world, in a supposed-to-be civilized country. It is nothing more nor less than that in Quebec the ecclesiastics are superior in power to the state officers and legally the governors of the province.

By ancient law, whenever a bishop of the Roman Catholic church shall consider it wise to establish a canonical parish, the lieutenant-governor of the province is compelled to at once recognize that parish as a municipal parish as well. In a case just decided, this old law is held to be still in force, and the bishop of Quebec has used it to transfer an English-speaking settlement from an old town to a new one, burdened with heavy taxes and other things discouraging to an economical settler. This decision leads the Mail to a consideration of the relations between church and state in the province, and finds the marriage to be of the orthodox Roman Catholic pattern—indissoluble till the death of one of the parties. Speaking roughly, says the Mail, "Quebec suffers from that preponderance of clerical government which prevailed in France up to the revolution of 1789 and in Mexico down to the uprising of Juarez." The church has complete control of the appointment of its officers, a condition which France and Germany hav found to be incompatible with the welfare of the state which supported the ecclesiastical officers, and the result is that the civil government is but a servant of the church, and forever on its knees to her. The Mail cites that in the last election, one of the candidates publicly announced that if elected he "should consult the hierarchy on all important questions, and abide by their decision." And the government, which has just incorporated the Jesuit organization, justified its action on the ground that the pope approved of it. Similarly, continues the Mail, "although perhaps ninety-nine intelligent French Canadians in every hundred will, as citizens, condemn the tithe and fabrique assessment system and the system which permits such outrages as that to which the Huntingdon settlers hav just been subjected, as Roman Catholics they uphold these evils; and unfortunately they are Roman Catholics first and citizens afterward, so completely has the church succeeded in occupying the space which in other communities is filled by the state. Again, it is confessed by most French Canadians competent to pronounce an opinion that a map of intellect of the North American continent, such as those formerly drawn of France, would probably represent Quebec as the region of greatest illiteracy. Just now many French Canadian parents are alarmed at the action of the church in removing lay teachers and placing the public schools in the hands of the religious orders, whose members are not required under the law to submit to any test of their professional qualifications, and may be, and often are, unfit from that point of view. It is stated that there is not a single lay male teacher left in the schools in Quebec city. In the rural districts the process of eliminating the lay element and turning public education over to nuns and young girls in training for the convent has been going on for some time. The parent grumbles, for he knows that under the religious orders the three R's will be sacrificed to the seven S's, and his children but poorly equipped for the career of citizens of a modern state. As a Roman Catholic, however, he considers it his duty to submit to a condition of things which, to say the least, is not hopeful. So, too, with respect to clerical interference in elections, there is a widespread opinion among the better class of people that the elector ought to be free to mark his own ballot. Yet, as Roman Catholics, all (or nearly all) accept the view of the church that voting is a matter within the sphere of morals, and that she has therefore a divine right, not merely to advise the elector, but to employ spiritual intimidation, if need be, in compelling him to vote as she desires him to vote."

This subserviency and complete slavery of the French-Canadian population to the church is admitted by all to be the great drawback to the advancement of Quebec. The policy of the pope is to make Quebec thoroughly Catholic, and there is no instance in history, says the Mail, of any set of ecclesiastics declining to take advantage of the powers which accident, self-aggrandizement, or the will of the people in a less enlightened age may hav conferred upon them; and it would be pueril to blame the hierarchy in Quebec for following the consistent and immemorial example of the cloth. But the question is one of great importance to Canada as a country, for under the rule of the priests there can be no liberty at all in Quebec; her population is impoverished by the exactions of the church, which can sell a man's farm, even, if he do not pay the church's demands; there are no schools worth calling by that name; and the constant demand of the people is for money, which goes not to relieve their necessities, but to meet the extortions of the church which is the cause of their poverty.

The Mail frankly confesses that it sees no hope of remedy. The Quebec legislature is in the hands of the church, and even the politicians of Ontario consider it great statesmanship to extend clerical privileges in return for clerical aid in elections. But if there is no hope for Quebec, it is well that a knowledge of her condition should be possessed in the United States, where annexation or commercial union with Canada is much talked about. It would be folly, indeed, to annex to a free country a population of slaves who refuse to make an effort, or to permit others to make an effort, to break away from their bondage.

The Sunday Law a Means of Grace.

In Galveston, Tex., the enforcement of the Sunday law is being pushed with rigor, except against those who most deserve punishment—the clergy and the newspapers which do not dare to denounce the law. Although warrants hav been issued for the arrest of the editors and employees of the Galveston News, they hav not been served, while the mechanics in the oil mills, the clerks in a drug store, the coal cart drivers, and a fruit dealer, hav all been properly punished according to Christian notions. The fruit dealer was an Italian, and he sold five cents' worth of candy. The drug firm paid $40; the employees of the oil mill, ten in number, paid $100; and the coal cart drivers paid $10 each.

The News still keeps on fighting Parson Briggs, of the Christian Advocate, but, O Lord! how pious it has got. "The obliteration of the customary day of rest would be a dismal commentary upon boasted progress in civilization and wealth," says the News now. It looks as though the News had purchased immunity from the Christians, and is paying the price on the installment plan.

The following letter bears on this subject:

"NEW YORK, Sept. 30, 1887.

"DEAR EDITOR: I agree with you that it serves the Galveston News just right to hav its employees arrested for breaking the Sunday law. But you did not reveal all the turpitude of the News. You say that that paper printed not a word against the letter of Judge Cook; but its sin of commission was much worse than its sin of omission. It called attention to the letter, and demanded of the officers of Galveston that they should enforce the law. Now, when it is enforced, the News cries like a child, and says it is the 'general opinion that newspapers are exempted from the operation of the law.' Certainly, newspapers are allowed to be sold on Sunday, but the law does not exempt the mechanics (which include the editors and telegraphers) who manufacture them. See articles 183, 184, 186 of Texas Sunday laws, in TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL of 1887."

The Galveston News is a colossal hypocrit, and we advise Mr. Belo to join a church, as the only appropriate refuge for him. A man who frankly says that he ought to be allowed to make money on Sunday, but that everybody else should be put in prison for doing the same thing, is wasting his talents outside of a prayer-meeting.

Mr. Munn and His Enemies, the Mormons.

Mr. Edward F. Munn consumes considerable space this week in abusing the Mormons and the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who, he insinuates, is their aider and abettor. Mr. Munn, no doubt, means well, but he doesn't appear to understand the English language.

The date of Mr. Munn's entrance into Utah, the particular law under which the Mormon church is incorporated, and the particular bill under which the property of the Mormons is being seized, are all of no consequence in the difference of opinion between Mr. Munn and THE TRUTH SEEKER. Neither do we care to deny that the Mormons are a scurvy lot of fanatics, though doubtless something could be said for them on the score of morality, industry, and general material prosperity. And it is not pertinent to the argument to show whether their proposed renunciation of polygamy, on condition that Utah be admitted to the Union, is sincere or not. We are not defending Mormonism, nor polygamy, nor the Mormons themselvs from the consequences of any crimes they may hav committed. On the contrary, we would punish them, legally, for each and every crime they, as individuals or as a church, hav committed. And if the hierarchy of Mormonism arrays itself against the government in overt acts (which is the constitutional definition of treason), we hold that the priests should receive at least as severe punishment as was meted out to Jefferson Davis and the other traitors who engaged in an armed and bloody rebellion against the United States not more years back than the average mind can easily wander.

What, then, is the sin for which Mr. Munn so soundly berates us? Only this, and nothing more: We said that the United States had no right to enact legislation authorizing government officers to confiscate, sell, and administer the property of any church corporation, be it Mormon or Methodist, Catholic or Congregational. That is the whole of our offending, and Mr. Munn has used up over two columns in "replying" to it, without having touched our position at all, or even mentioning it, or showing that he in any way comprehended what he was "replying" to. His communication shows only that he hates the Mormons, and is willing that a rival sect should harry them through form of law, whether that law be constitutional, or in harmony with American ideas, or not.

When Mr. Munn demonstrates that the United States has the constitutional right to seize the property and administer the affairs of a solvent private corporation, either because it is a religious corporation or because some of its members hav violated a law against stealing or bigamy; and when he demonstrates that this action is not directed solely against one sect by producing the records of any suits against church corporations in the territories or in the District of Columbia other than the Mormon corporation; and, finally, when he demonstrates his capacity to find out what he is railing against, and to write to the point, we shall be very happy to defend the liberty of even so despicable a religious sect as the Latter Day Saints from the persecuting proclivities of so polite a gentleman as Mr. Edward F. Munn.

"Robbed Him of His Crutches."

Probably most of our readers are familiar with the story with the foregoing title. It has been going the rounds of the religious press for two or three years. The story is that Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Beecher were once in company, and in answer to a defense of heresy by Colonel Ingersoll, Mr. Beecher related that, as he was walking along the street, a "big, burly ruffian" robbed a poor cripple of his crutches, leaving him sprawling in the mud. Turning to Colonel Ingersoll (so the yarn goes), Mr. Beecher, "rising from his chair and brushing back his long, white hair, while his eyes glittered with their old-time fire as he bent them on Ingersoll, said, 'Yes, Colonel Ingersoll, and you are the man! The human soul is lame, but Christianity givs it crutches to enable it to pass the highway of life. It is your teaching that knocks these crutches from under it, and leaves it a helpless and rudderless wreck in the slough of despond. If robbing the human soul of its only support on this earth—religion—be your profession, why, ply it to your heart's content. It requires an architect to erect a building: an incendiary can reduce it to ashes.' The old man sat down, and silence brooded over the scene. Colonel Ingersoll found that he had a master in his own power of illustration, and said nothing. The company took their hats and parted."

We hav denied the truth of this fairy-tale some scores of times on the authority of Henry Ward Beecher, who wrote his denial to Horace Seaver. We never thought it worth while to ask Colonel Ingersoll to deny it, but Mr. J. L. Treuthart, of Portsmouth, O., forwarded it to him, and sends us his reply as follows:

"NEW YORK, Sept. 8, 1887.

"J. L. TREUTHART, ESQ.,—My Dear Sir: There is not one word of truth in the article you sent me, entitled 'Robbed Him of His Crutches,' which I reinclose to you. People are continually manufacturing falsehoods for the purpose of avoiding arguments that they cannot answer. I never had any such conversation with Mr. Beecher, nor with any other human being, nor anything approaching it, nor anything out of which such a story could honestly hav been made.

"Yours very truly, R. G. INGERSOLL."

Thus we hav Mr. Beecher's denial of the truth of the tale and Colonel Ingersoll's denunciation of it. But these facts will not make the slightest difference in the regularity and frequency of the appearance of the story in the columns of the religious papers. "If the glory of God hath more abounded through my lie, why yet am I judged a sinner?" is holy writ, and a good enough guide for religious editors.

A SHORT time ago the printers' union of this city considered the advisability of raising the price of composition. In arguing against the plan, C. C. Burgoyne, one of the largest employers of printers in the city, says: "At a few hours' notice a certain 'institootion' on the outskirts of the upper end of the city can furnish you any number of 'compositors'—compositors to whom the short narrativs written by Noah Webster are a sealed book; compositors to whom the rules governing capitalization and punctuation are veiled as with a thick blanket; compositors who yell out, 'Which of you's is got my run-down?'" This is a practical man's certificate to the value of the education dispensed at the Roman Catholic Protectory, which draws about a quarter of a million of dollars annually from the taxpayers of this city, and which is, as to all intents and purposes, a parochial school.

THE Redpath Lyceum Bureau is booming George A. Sheridan in the lecture field as a destroyer of Ingersoll. The bureau publishes a pamphlet descriptiv of the wonderful powers of Mr. Sheridan, and after reading it we are surprised that Colonel Ingersoll is alive. One of the astounding feats of the little David is that he drew two years' pay as a member of Congress without having rendered any service. This indicates his smartness, but at the same time reflects somewhat upon his honesty, and we should think the bureau could well afford to forget the theft. Among Mr. Sheridan's references are the Hon. John Sherman, L. A. Lambert, R. B. Hayes, Lew Wallace, Thomas L. James, and a lot more of politicians who well understand how to "work the religious racket." It is worthy of note that while Lambert only claims to hav sold 100,000 of his book abusing Colonel Ingersoll, the Redpath Bureau has no difficulty in seeing a sale of 300,000. But then, a little lie like that is nothing to religious folks.

THE following, clipped from a contemporary, we commend to the prayerful consideration of those of our readers who are in arrears:

"ST. MICHAEL'S PALACE, TORONTO, Sept. 3, 1887.

"To the Editor of the Catholic Weekly Review:

"SIR: I hav been often pained and astonished at the frequent appeals of editors and proprietors of newspapers to their subscribers, urging them to pay their just debts. Catholics, at least, cannot be unaware of their obligations in this matter, and that absolution to a penitent heartily sorry for his sins does not free him from the obligations of paying his just debts. The atonement for oblivion of justice in this world will certainly be exacted in the next. JOHN JOSEPH LYNCH, Archbishop of Toronto."

We feel just as certain as Archbishop Lynch does that no subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER who owes us money will go to heaven. Justice will catch him just this side of the pearly gate, and he will be as apt to get into purgatory as into Abraham's bosom. Last year's receipt for this year's subscription is of no more use than absolution to a penitent who owes the printer. It is seldom that we can agree with friend Lynch, but this time we can shout Amen with a loud voice.

A BOSTON jury has convicted the Rev. W. F. Davis, a crank preacher, for speaking on Boston Common without permission. Judge Staples, in addressing the prisoner, said: "From 1640 to 1821, when Boston became a city, the citizens of Boston decided for what purpose the Common should be used. After that time this right was given to the corporate municipality, the mayor, board of aldermen, and common council. It cannot be said that the constitutional right to deliver a sermon transcends all other rights, although Christianity underlies the social fabric. There are a good many things which may restrain our personal freedom and liberty, yet in the use of public property and social intercourse there must be some restraints for the best interests and good of the whole community." If Judge Staples had said that Christianity underlies a good deal of our social, but none of our legal fabric, his remarks would be much more acceptable. The position assumed by Mr. Davis was that inasmuch as he taught Christianity, he had rights superior to the whole community, and could do as he pleased with the community's property. If, like C. B. Reynolds, Mr. Davis had hired a lot in which to preach, and had then been arrested, the proceeding would hav been a gross outrage.

IN a sermon on "The United States Constitution from a Religious Standpoint," preached last month, David Gregg, pastor of the Boston Park street church, said:

"If we interpret the Constitution according to its plain reading, it is assuredly a non-religious document. The true God has no standing in it. It offers no more protection to the religion of Jesus Christ than to the religion of Buddha. The oath which the president takes in assuming office has no mention of God in it, although an appeal to God is the very essence of an oath. The absence of the religious character was noted from the very beginning, and it was the subject of consideration by God-fearing patriots. Dr. John Rogers wrote to Hamilton for an explanation of the omission, and received the reply: 'Indeed, doctor, we forgot it.' One class of people claimed that it was an oversight; another that it was intentional and for the purpose of divorcing the church from the state.

"What is our duty as Christian citizens in regard to the non-religious character of the Constitution? We should do that which our fathers failed to do; we should crown our God and Christianity in the very first sentence of the Constitution. We should make it read: 'We, the people, in the name of God, accepting the son as our ruler,' etc.

"The only class that would object to this would be those who rejoice that the state is divorced from religion. The great work of the last century was the setting of the nation right in the eyes of men; the great work of the next century should be in setting it right in the eyes of almighty God. I can make an impregnable argument on this point, and if compelled shall take occasion to do so at some future time. The American Constitution must be Christianized. Thousands of men are at present associated with this end in view, and the weight of the argument is all in favor of these men."

If the Rev. David Gregg were alone in his views, if the country were not full of corrupt politicians who bargain with the church on every occasion, we could afford to smile at this. But as it is, we are inclined to think that the God-in-the-Constitution party are making greater progress than the opposing organization.

Hot-headedly wrong, but forcible, able, and interesting writers—such is THE TRUTH SEEKER'S verdict upon the Australian Anarchists. Singular fact, isn't it, that wherever you find an Anarchist you find a man of brains and talent?

HELIX, OR., Sept. 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As my father, Ben Stanton, was one of the most faithful readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER over eight years, I feel it my duty to inform you of his death. He died July 11th, 1887, aged 53 years and 11 months, after suffering almost a year from dropsy. He was patient to the last, and died a true Liberal. He leaves a Liberal family—a wife and five children. He was also a member of the Liberal League.

MISS ANNA STANTON.

BALLSTON SPA., N. Y., Sept. 18, E M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 20, as per bill. "God and His Book" is a book that every Infidel in the world should hav. It is worth it weight in gold of Ophir. I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that Mr. Farrell is going to publish Colonel Ingersoll's speech at Reynolds's trial in Morristown. If so, as soon as yon receive some please send me two copies. I am sowing the good seed of mental liberty as fast as I can here, and the good Christians are giving me L the best they can, but I am right side up with care yet. That you may liv long and enjoy good health is the wish of the Infidel family of

WILLIAM THORPE.

MUSKEGON, Sept. 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I take upon myself the unpleasant task of informing you that my father, an old subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Wm. Jones, passed from earth life on the 21st of August, after an illness of a little more than a week. He had been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER since its begiuning, and a great admirer of Mr. Bennett. Though a Spiritualist in belief, he had great sympathy with all Liberal movements. We enjoyed these views with him, and though we do not wish to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER at present, we wish you to feel that we are grateful for the good we hav received from it, and shall at all times follow it with our best wishes. If there is anything due up to this date, please inform me and I will remit.

MRS. G. H. FORD.

COLUMBIA CITY, Sept. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I write to you to inform you of the death of Mr. Carpenter. His last request was for me to write to you. He had been helpless almost one year with rheumatism and a general breaking down of the system. Two weeks ago today he could scarcely read, but he had me prop THE TRUTH SEEKER up so he could look at it. He passed away peacefully as he had lived. We took him from our home to South Whitley and laid him to rest. We did everything he requested us to do. We filled his casket with flowers. There was no one of his belief here to say anything, so we buried him in silence. He died the 12th of Sept, aged 57 years 9 months and 21 days. He had preserved every copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. His request was to hav you publish his death. Respectfully, MRS. S. H. CARPENTER.

WOROKSTER, MASS., Sept. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much pleased with the last copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think Mr. W. F Jamieson takes the right ground in regard to debates with even such men as Clark Braden. Let us not giv a Christian a chance to say we are afraid to meet them in debate. As to Herr Most, it seems to me that he only declared his intention of doing what most all Freethinkers are doing. That is, disregarding all laws that we consider unjust. Shall we keep our mouths closed for fear of the blasphemy laws, or shall we break them? Shall we be careful not to break the Sunday laws, no matter how unjust they are? And the same of the postal laws relating to what some people call obscene matter? Where would Freethought hav been to-day if the mental heroes of the past had not resisted tyrannical laws? The Boston tea party used force, and so did the patriots of Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill use force to resist unjust and tyrannical laws. Hurrah for Watson Haston..

C. L. HASKELL.

STRASBURG, ILL., Sept. 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: When a wedding, birth, or death occurs it is customary to notify the family and friends. As all three hav occurred here, I hasten to write this epistle. The wedding was of fraternal spirits in the cause of Freethought; the birth was of a host of new theological ideas, and the death of many absurd notions. The Christians turned out, the Infidels were out, the women were out, little boys and girls were out, I was out, and all to hear C. B. Reynolds tell the object of the Liberals of America. He wrote me Friday evening that he had no hall in Mattoon Monday night, and could come here. I wrote for him to come, and sent word to all I could. The school-house was full, and nearly as many more outside. He gave away a lot of papers, and sold a good many books; we did the best we could, and he said it was a success. It does me good to see the treasurer's report in the papers, for I am president, secretary, and treasurer. After paying expenses we hav $9.67 in the treasury, and the only chance I hav to get rid of it is by paying it to Liberal lecturers; and the more lectures we hav the more I get, so you see our kind of Liberalism reaches clear down to the pocket-book. We are looking for some grand work at the Union at Chicago. Every state should hav a secretary to receive names and reports from every county in the state, and every county a secretary to receive reports from townships. We must stand up and be counted some way. Let us all take one good, long, and strong pull next year for organization. Let the speakers at the Union write their speeches and send them to the Liberal papers for publication, and then get on some committee and work like Turks (I don't know whether Turks work or not) for the very best interests of the Liberal cause. And, to the Liberals living in the country, just let me say, "Make a little effort, and see how easy it is to get money to pay a Liberal lecturer. Don't stand back and say, 'When it rains mush my plate is bottom side up.' Keep your plate right side up and it will always be full; then sift out what you want or can use." If this letter is too long, shorten it; if too short, lengthen it; if good enough, print it; if not, save it to start your fire this winter. Yours truly, A. YORK.

ROOHESTER, MINN., Sept. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me space in your paper to say that I indorse, with emphasis, what Abbie Knapp said in a late number in support of Elmina. We hav little to do with her modes of gaining or giving scientific social facts or fallacies. I believe the Constitution givs every one the right to gain knowledge through the mails, if he so desires; and the article by C. L. James, in August 20th, indicates that sealed letters are inviolate. Thus Elmina's case proves "disgustingly" clear to us that we are losing every right we ever had to free speech, press, and mails.

I shall hope to see the American S cular Union Convention take severe action, and critically feel the public pulse to determin if it be wise to imprison so honest and charitable an Infidel Quaker woman upon so ethereal a pretext.

We are all anxious to know how much this "land of the free" allows to freedom. And must we hav a King Comstock to tell us what is "disgusting?"

I am glad you still keep supplying cartoons. Mr. Heston must hav a prodigious imagination, to clothe the facts so appropriately.

Inclosed please find subscription for another year.

FLORA WARDALL-FOX.

FRENOHTOWN, NEB., Sept. 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: So many able writers more capable than myself hav espoused Elmina's cause, I hav waited (perhaps too long), knowing they would express my own sentiments in regard to her case, and they hav. While I wish to assure Sister Elmina of my profound sympathy for her and her labors, those grand women, Susan H. Wixon (whom we all pity so in her affliction), Lucy Colman, Elizabeth Denton, and Dr. Juliet Severance, together with "Altair" (she being a whole host in herself), hav said so many good things for Elmina, I hav felt that there was nothing at all left for me to say. On reading the letter of "Altair," I heard a person say "she should be made attorney-general of the United States."

The whole world should read Elmina's papers on sexual intemperance, that great emancipation proclamation to women, and be convinced that she has only the betterment of the human race at heart; and the race will bear considerable improvement yet. When Comstock gets the rope off her neck, she will then be the "noblest Roman of them all." Later on, we will build her a monument of pure white marble reaching just as high as our money will take it. She is the Hypatia of modern times, and will be made a saint, as was the Hypatia of old, and that, too, by the very demons who wrought her ruin.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

MYRTLE CREEK, OR., Sept. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Rationalism views everything in its natural, radical, and philosophical reality. It comprehends the sciences, cause and effect. It discovers and acknowledges laws by which everything is controled in the march of progress. But when its development is intercepted by any interference, those laws interpose until the cause of disturbance is removed. It finds no remedy for sin but restitution. It finds no divine right or prerogativ for a few to domineer over and rule the many. It finds no personal devil. It finds no personal or anthropomorphic God in the domain of the universe. It finds a force, a vital principle, which permeates all nature. It discovers that if we would become wiser, better, and happier, and make others so, we must employ the ways and means by which it can be accomplished, instead of praying to a supernatural God. It finds that it is wiser and better to aid the poor, famishing, and ignorant in our midst than to send treasure and missionaries to distant lands with the Bible. It finds that it would be wiser and better to tax the rich churches and relieve the laboring man of some of the burden of taxation. It finds that it is better to teach the young something useful and practical than to teach them church catechisms.

Supernaturalism is a species of insanity. It is a perversion of the natural faculties, and leads to injustice in politics and religion, and is subversiv of the best interests and happiness of mankind.

L. C. HILL.

PITTSBURGH, PA. Sept. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: This orthodox, priest-ridden city has just had an intellectual shaking-up by a course of lectures delivered by Dr. J. L. York, of California, who has justly been styled the "Ingersoll" of the West. The Pittsburgh Secular Union was fortunate in securing this celebrated orator to deliver the opening course of the season. His first lecture, entitled, "The Two Bibles—Evolution or Creation, Man or Monkey—Which," was delivered Sunday, September 4th, in Maltby Hall, to a crowded and intelligent audience who frequently interrupted the speaker by outbursts of overwhelming applause. The second lecture was delivered in Lafayette Hall, subject; "Capital and Labor; or, the Reign of the Common People." The lecture was a master effort, and made a deep impression on the working-people of this city. The executiv board was convinced by the large audience on this occasion that it would be futil to attempt to crowd the people that would be likely to come out to hear the last two lectures into Maltby Hall, hence they secured Lafayette Hall for the following two Sundays, and the crowds of people that attended the third and fourth lectures justified them in taking this wise step. His last lecture was on "Individuality, Courtship, and Marriage." This was a great lecture. The doctor never appeared to better advantage than he did on this occasion. He seemed to be "brimful" and running over with his subject, and he held his audience, as it were, "spellbound" for fully an hour and a half. This lecture will long be remembered by the people here, who hav placed a very high estimate upon the doctor as a public lecturer and Liberal reformer.

After lecturing in Philadelphia, Boston, and Buffalo, he returns to Pittsburgh to deliver two more lectures on Sundays, November 6th and 13th. ANTHONY BARKER;

Vice-President Pittsburgh Secular Society.

NEW YORK, Sept. 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Let well enough alone, is a good proverb. Is it wise, is it policy, for us Freethinkers to be exclusiv, and separate from society without good cause? Hav we not lecturers working early and late to make propaganda for our cause? Will they succeed better when we make needless changes, obstructions, to which we ourselvs do not agree, and which are of no possible use and good to us? A new era, beginning somewhere—or anywhere, not to be particular about a few months or years more or less, as per H. M. P.—may do well enough for most of us, but it will not suit teachers nor scholars, small or large, historians nor chronologists, much less astronomers. A new era means another interruption, a complication and confusion in computing time, as anyone will find by examining encyclopedias. Under Chronology in Encyclopedia Britannica appears the following: "Each small community, and king, and priest had his own era. But by a natural process the mischief was gradually and partially remedi d. The extension of intercourse between the various small groups of societies of men, and still more the union of larger groups, made a common epoch necessary. Astronomers denote the year which preceded the first year of our era by 0, and the year previous to that by 1 B.O., but chronologers, in conformity with common notions, call the year preceding the era 1 B C, and the previous 2 B.O., and so on. By reckoning in this manner, there is an interruption in the regular succession of the numbers, and in the years preceding the era."

Reading the above made me a decided opponent to any new era, even if it were free from error, but to read such fulminating nonsense to uphold a gross error of fact from G. N. Hill makes one nauseate. I ask your readers now, Is our object to make mischief, confusion, complication, and interruption, without a benefit for us or anyone else? Let us put down such innovators as cranks. It would look about like taking down the top story of a stone building, and building in its place a story of brick, and calling it thereafter a brick house. If civilization demands a new era, I am quite sure it will commence it from the earliest time known, regardless of any person's reputation, and make it to conform and acceptable to the whole world, doing away with counting backward, a strain and a stumbling-block more or less to any child learning history.

A much better epoch to start a new era would be the Fourth of July, 1776. It would find thousands of adherents to every one of the so-called Freethought calendar here and in Europe. But who wants it? Not one sensible man.

I hav asked repeatedly, but in vain, for one, only one, good reason in favor of a new era, but there is none to be found. Eras are not suitable any more to commemorate men's deeds or lives.

To count the time correctly is the hour, day, month, and year we liv in, and not past; or else we would h v to date 1886 8 months and 24 days, but this would be no improvement to our dating in use. FRED. KOEZLY.

PIPPIN LAKE FARM, O., Sept. 25, 1887.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: A terrible calamity has fallen to our lot in the sad, sudden, and shocking death of our only son, Hubert, who died Aug. 25th from the effects of alkaloid poisoning.

For four summers his happy presence had made of our home a heaven, but in eighteen short hours the joy of that home is changed to deepest sorrow, and all we hav left is his cherished memory, mingled with the thought that could we hav known his danger in time those willing hands and trusting heart need not lie pulseless in death.

Eminently a child of nature, and taught its wonders by a loving mother, his chief delight consisted in seeing and telling its beauties. Being healthy, and consequently activ and happy, he blessed our lives, and was our greatest help and hope. Truthful himself, he trusted others; self-reliant, yet having a most tender heart; strong-willed, and yet so teachable. Such qualities so often shown in his nature endeared him to us by every tie that blesses and joins parent and child. If, in obedience to his firm will, he had wronged any one, unsolicited he would confess his error, not to an imaginary God, but to the only one who had any claim to the confession—the one injured—and say, pleadingly, "I am so sorry."

Fearing that he might hav inherited a predisposition to those insidious diseases which affect the brain, and knowing the sympathy existing between the viscera and that wonderful organ, the brain, we never allowed him to eat cake, candies, condiments, or flesh meat, but made his diet a fruit and farinaceous one. But in an evil hour his life was risked by a thoughtless domestic, who, violating our express command, gave or permitted him to eat, while in her charge, a hearty meal of richest hash. Undigested, it had lain in his stomach eighteen hours, when he was taken with most fatal symptoms of approaching dissolution, like one poisoned. As if realizing his extreme danger, he said, "Papa, will I die?" Feeling it was too late, I tried to comfort him, and then he said, "I don't want to die. I want to stay with you."

He endured his intense sufferings without murmuring, and died in my arms, a sacrifice, another example of innocence suffering through another's conceited ignorance. Those innocent eyes lie closed so untimely. A little sister whom he loved so well, and whom he had risked his own life to protect, lies in the cradle brotherless at two weeks old; a mother placed upon the verge of insanity; a desolated home, and those who knew and loved that noble boy compelled to suffer all the pangs of separation—all the result of one thoughtless act.

What monstrous injustice to the wronged and trusting child, if death ends all, to be so cruelly robbed of a life he oved so well! If there is another life, and he yet is conscious, what must the pangs of parting be to his tender heart when ours may yet prove unbearable? What shall we say of that conceited ignorance which, disregarding recklessly or wilfully the admonition of experience and older judgment, has brought this great affliction upon us? And yet in the face of this awful experience we are told that all wrongs will be righted in the next world! But how can we expect justice to govern there when it fails here?

Upon the principle that mankind has more faith in him who faithfully keeps his promises in this life, so we would hav more faith in the rule of justice if its debts were not all due in another world. MARIUS HEIGHTON.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3 on my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, with thanks and congratulations that we hav a few periodicals whose managers hav the courage and fairness to publish the logical import of facts on subjects of common interest and importance. My being an uncompromising advocate of the equal right of every individual to liv and to the means of living, regardless of creed, color, age, sex, or nationality, should logically impel me to be neutral or liberal on the religious question. Moreover, religious superstition appears to hav been the first result of human thought, reason, and observation. Hence, it is the germ of social philosophy, investigation, and progress; and appears to be developing into Socialism, which promises to ripen into Materialism. When the fruit has matured, the germ should naturally die of itself; therefore, I shall fail to see the expediency of an effort to kill the germ prematurely. Nevertheless, such effort may possibly do good; it can hardly do harm at the present juncture of human affairs; for popular thought and aspirations appear to be trending to a subject of far more importance to the human race than religious superstition and Infidelity combined; hence, I shall find no cause for hostility to either of them, but will suggest the probability that those who make the discussion of such vagaries a specialty will find themselvs "badly left" at the end of the race.

The histories of the human race inform us of a time—and it does not seem long ago—when the strong oppressed the weak; and those who would plead the cause of the oppressed in the name of humanity were in danger of being hunted like wild beasts, and slain when captured. It was then that the gods and religious superstition did some good service to the oppressed, notwithstanding the efforts of priestcraft to prevent it in the interest of statecraft. Therefore, if the gods, through religious superstition, hav placed us in a position to plead the cause of man in the name of man and for man, hav we not something to thank the gods for, even if they hav but an imaginary existence? The gods having placed us in a position to work out our own salvation, our requesting them to do more, or reviling them because they do not, is equally degrading to our manhood. Better work out our own salvation like men than waste our time reviling the gods or beseeching them to help us further.

MR. EDITOR: I feel that I cannot rest till I hav entered my weak protest against the sentence of the Anarchists, so-called, of Chicago. I think it the most abominable blot that could be put on the escutcheon of our grand republic, for grand it was in its conception, but the ignorance and selfishness of man has put many blots on its fair fame, but this is the cap-sheaf. The Manchester massacre was nothing to it, and it damned Castlereagh forever in history, and in the memory of his countrymen. To think that in a country whose written Constitution says that the liberty of speech shall never be abridged, the people will sit supinely by and see such a sentence carried out, is a thought to make the nations of the earth sneer, and Russia's autocrat smile and say, "The great republic is copying after me." But sixty million tyrants are worse than one; there the responsibility rests on one man, but here we all share it. The whole rests on us, the people, and if that sentence is carried out, whose neck will be safe that dares to utter words that are not popular with the millionaires that now govern the country with the help of monopolists, concentrating their capital in all branches of business to crush out the small tradesmen, and make but two classes—the very rich and the very poor! How long will Knights of Labor, or any other body of poor men, dare to say their soul is their own with such a precedent set by the highest tribunal of the state. It will be the death-knell of liberty, and, in my humble opinion, if the whole body of workingmen do not protest in the strongest manner against the hanging of those men, they will soon find the chains riveted about them so strong by millionaires, monopolists, and priests combined, that their hopes of liberty will be forever blasted. These men were condemned not for murder, but for talking. There is no pretense that either of them committed murder. No, they were attacked by the police when at a peaceable meeting, and did not even try to protect themselvs, but some one threw a bomb and the police were hurt. But these men were known to be dissatisfied with the present state of affairs, and dared to say so, and for this they are to be hung as an example to all dissatisfied men who dare to speak against the wish of the moneyed aristocracy that is crushing the very life out of the nation. Will the people of this country submit to such an outrage? I fear they will. The blood of the Puritans, of the race that first settled the country, is so mixed up with the dupes of priests that it runs sluggish in the veins of the present generation; but there ought to be enough men who "know their rights, and knowing dare maintain them," to overthrow at the polls the horde of priest-ridden slaves who do the bidding of those who would enslave us, and to see the laws so made that liberty of speech should never be infringed upon. J. DOWNES.

ITHACA, N. Y. Sept. 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Nature! What is nature? Answer: It is all our senses comprehend, the substance of our being, animal and intellectual, male and female, the god of law, and the goddess of liberty, the positiv and negativ balancing principle, the sole revolving unity; her science recognizes no good, no evil in distinction. The tree of the knowledge of distinction, through the ignorance of nature's laws and animal excess, we hav created the subtle beast (indulgence) called the serpent because of its deceptivness, and thus propose to divide the unity of the masculin and feminin fundamental principle upon which eternal nature is founded. Thus Babylon (confusion) is established, and the whole world feeds upon the fruit of the tree good and evil. And thus the science of universal nature is entirely inoperativ, and instead of building the lord's (nature's) house, every man runs to his own house and says, "Here, look here!" and forces our feminin attention to his splendid architecture, and we become bewildered and decide at once that his is good for food, and desirable to make one wise, and thus widen the breech between the animal and the intellectual And to prove the truth of what I say along come the cartoons presenting the lowest form of man, a mere beast (sectarianism). I will not recognize him as belonging in my garden of intelligence, hence I turn him out and bar my gates forever against him, and pronounce him dust, and clothe him with skins. He was never a man, nor ever can he be. To be a man is masculin and feminin unity; to be a subtle beast is to divide this unity, and let each dual form take their independence and responsibility. Thus nature seems to make war against herself, and drop the curtain and shame a dog. I accept him only upon the ground of a ghost of appearance, a mental hybridism, the mystery of ignorance. Whatever is must be as a test of the truth of nature. When woman (the feminin of man) takes the ballot it will be the confirmation of mental hybridism and suicide; it will be to do that which is unnatural, and to acquire responsibility that is not compatible with her structure, and will bring with it governmental and military duties which would be unnatural to her taste and family requirements. No, nature can not be thus divided; it is the frustration of natural science and manly reason. The chief end of man is to carry out manly principles in the undivided unity of the masculin and feminin nature. Thus nature seeks her own positiv and negativ structure, and cannot be divided. ZENAS KENT.

TORONTO, ONT., Sept. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Communications from Toronto do not appear often in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so by way of variety I thought a few lines would not be unacceptable in the Friendly Letter department. This is Mr. Watts's headquarters, and, with the exception of being absent a few weeks now and again, he lectures every Sunday evening in Science Hall, Adelaide street. Toronto is remarkable for the number of its churches; they are everywhere, with new ones continually being erected. The Methodist is the all-powerful denomination, from the mayor downward. Sundays are kept in as orthodox a manner as possible; no street-cars running, no stores open, except drug-stores, and but for the presence of two parks everyone would be compelled either to go to church or stay in the house. Toronto is a paradise for parsons. Sam Small or Brother Jones can fill the biggest church here every time. The newspapers every Monday report wishy-washy sermons nearly verbatim, but always ignore Mr. Watts's eloquent and instructiv lectures. A small body of Freethinkers congregate in the Queen's Park every Sunday and address the crowds gathered there. They always get the largest audience. This park is a curious sight Sundays—all denominations, from the orthodox to the most Liberal, trying to get converts by singing, praying, and exhorting. The success of the Freethinkers has caused no little jealousy among some of the followers of the lowly Jew, and quite a spirited controversy has taken place this summer through the Correspondence columns of the Toronto press with a view of stopping the Infidels in the parks, but every letter was ably replied to by different Freethinkers. and the result is that Freethought has more listeners than ever. Ministers here frequently denounce "horrible Infidelity"—but in their churches, where you are not supposed to answer them. One prominent minister, Dr. Wild, said in a sermon a short time ago that he would challenge any man in Toronto that "the pyramids of Egypt refute the theory of evolution." Such an opportunity Mr. Watts could not resist, who wrote accepting the challenge; but the worthy reverend backed out of it with the excuse that such debates did no good. So you see the advantages these men hav. They can talk the vilest trash in their churches, knowing they need not substantiate what they say unless it pleases them to do so.

Mr. Watts last Sunday delivered an interesting lecture on "Science vs. Theology" to a large audience. In the course of his lecture he spoke of the difference between what is subjectiv and what is objectiv, and to illustrate his meaning he related an incident that happened to him twenty-three years ago that I think will be interesting to our Spiritualistic friends. A learned Secularist of his acquaintance, Dr. Clark, of London, Eng., became a convert to Spiritualism. Dr. Clark always affirmed that every night he went home the tables and chairs would rise and bow to him, and that spirits were the cause of this courtesy; that this phenomenon was the reason of his belief in Spiritualism. Mr. Watts and a friend one night accompanied the doctor home with the intention of seeing whether the furniture would be as courteous to them as to the doctor. On their arrival Mr. Watts requested Dr. Clark to remain below while himself and friend went upstairs to examin for themselvs. On opening the door and surveying the room, Mr. Watts exclaimed, loud enough for the doctor to hear below, "Well, if I had not seen this I could never hav believed it." On hearing this, the doctor came upstairs and said, "Did I not tell you so? Perhaps you'll believe me after this." Mr. Watts said, "In what direction is the table bowing now, doctor?" "Why, straight toward me." Mr. Watts: "Are you positiv about it?" The doctor: "Why, certainly." Mr. Watts then informed him that himself and friend had watched the furniture since their arrival, and it had neither stirred nor shown any signs of activity. The doctor's idea was subjectiv, and not objectiv. GEO. WILLIAMS.

ATOKA, IND. TER., Sept. 18. 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav waited and looked in vain for an answer to my proposition on the prospecting expedition, and as none has come, I hav been quietly working along away down here to develop what I hav, and as Aunt Sister Brown used to say in the class-meeting, "I hav cause to be happy," for everything is coming out just as I expected.

And, while working out here all alone in the hills, thoughts will come to my mind, which I'll try in my rough, rude way to convey to you their meaning; so you must not expect a flowery and scientific letter from a prospector, but accept his ideas and explanations in his own langauge. Now, I take my ledge or vein to be the world. On the croppings I find everything mixed—poor ore, good ore, and the greater amount entirely barren. I find this laid here by Mother Nature in strata or streaks, so I giv each one its name. The good, pure ore I call truth, right, light, and reason, and I find it in only thin streaks. The larger I call ignorance, superstition, priestcraft, dogmas, fanaticism, and a host of others too numerous to mention. Having now made my location, I select my most promising stratum, and go to work making a dump for each kind, separating it as I go. I find my pure ore in the largest strata to be truth and right, lying with ignorance and superstition on one side and priestcraft and dogmas on the other, nearly crowding out and mixing up with this other, my small stratum, light and reason; but knowing as I do, I fear not for them, for at some time I hav every reason to believe that they will come into the main ore body if sufficient prospecting and mining is done. So I go to work and pick and hammer. I find ignorance and superstition the easiest ground, but with these few tools and single-handed I make no headway. I then resort to my drills, and drive in long holes. I load them with powder called sound, solid argument; I tamp with science, good morals, etc.; I get fire from the literal hell-and-damnation Methodists, and spit my fuse called enlightenment, and stand from under. My blast is a success. I can make headway and get good ore. I find sometimes that it is nearly pinched out between these, but I work away, and every time it gains I find it wider and richer. Still, I meet with difficulties. Sometimes my tamping blows out, and I hav to use others; and then I find my powder too slow or too quick, and in that way lose that much drilling; but experience is a good teacher, and I know now how to handle the ground better and select my powder, tamping, fuse, etc., to suit it. And then I am rewarded in finding the strata of honesty, sobriety, uprightness coming in as the ore body widens. I place them all on the ore dump, and in size they make a small comparison with the other, but in the bright light of heaven they then show their true worth; while, on the other hand, the other cannot withstand the light and other elements, and show signs of decay and attract but little attention of my visitors. The deeper I go the less I find of it. But I find another obstacle; the other side is crowding in on me. I make an attack, but I can only knock off a chip now and then. This is about to spoil our mine and cut off all our good ore. The prospector has gone to his depth; it now requires experienced miners and such men as Ingersoll. Putnam, Remsburg, Bell, Reynolds, Moss, Oswald, Peck, and all other old-timers. (By the way, isn't it about time Peck gave us another blast of the trumpet? Come into the collar, old friend; your last cured me of a well-seated attack of malaria.) Priestcraft is too hard for us prospectors. Our poor little steel, though good and true, makes but a faint impression with our hardest blows. Ah! these old, experienced miners bring out the diamond drill, and with such a brain as Ingersoll for a foreman, and the others for workmen, the work is started. It is almost diamond cut diamond, but the drill goes on. When striking such things as Billings's "Crimes of Preachers" it all but stops, but after a time it penetrates (and it is a wonder it doesn't get stuck) and goes on through, and the explosions from their blasts shake the earth. Good ore is being hoisted, and this rebellious matter is stowed away in the empty stopes and drifts and out of the way.

We now need other workers on the surface, such as Miss Helen Gardener, Miss Susan Wixon, and all of that kind. Let Miss Wixon bring all of her children, so that they can see and enjoy the fruits of our labor. No man better enjoys the presence of children than a prospector, for you invariably find him a big-hearted, whole-souled fellow, who usually becomes an experienced miner. And, as I digress, the work is going on, and our hopes are now centered on the miners, and we look forward with pleasure and anxiety, and are waiting to hear from them that they hav reached the stratum of light and reason, and then our ore body is complete. These are the thoughts of one working under ground, with no one but old Mother Nature to commune with. Some one has said that truth crushed to earth will rise again, and light and reason will prevail. So thinks the old prospector,

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Grapevine Swing.

Where the woods were green and a trailing vine
Was rent from the tree where brown roots twine,
And thrushes above to chatter so fine,
Never happier trio than we—
Tom, Ned, and Dick, that was me—
And singing we swung from morning till night,
Down the gray slope with savage delight,
Till the torrent's dark chasm hid us from sight.

'Twas not a limp swing to dreamily go
'Neath the bright arcades where the blue-bells blow,
The shade and the sheen flitting too and fro,
But a pendulum strong
O'er the stream with its song,
Racing down from the crest with riotous yell,
Drifting out over the hades-like dell,
The vine swinging back as the tongue of a bell.

Brother Will declared 'twas perilous fun,
But we staked the venture as A No. 1,
Each taking his turn when the other was done.
We three had read or been told
Of Boone, the brawn hunter bold,
Who on a wild vine swung safely over
A roaring stream to the leafy cover,
And the hidden trail stayed the Indian rover.

One day after church and the Sunday-school
We stole from the house, with its too strict rule,
To Nature's temples inviting and cool.
Oh, the jolliest boys were these,
A-climbing the autumn trees!
Hand over hand, as monkeys or bears,
Mistaking for apples the slow-ripening pears—
No praise but a lecture, possibly prayers.

Swing backward through cycling years as I dream
Of honeyed perfume where locust-trees gleam,
And apple-blooms blow their sails on the stream,
And we float past the days
A summer moon sways.
September's cheek glows with the fair Maiden Blush;*
Her hands with Russets and Greenings are flush;
But something we miss—'tis the voice of the thrush.

Our sister shall sing a low song instead,
As she sang of the birds whose mother was dead—
Her song and the dove's upon the same thread.
Her hair of shining brown rings
Waves sweet adieus as she sings
Farewells to the world, with its gossip and lies,
Revealing to-day a like truth in her eyes,
An angel to us in a mortal disguise.

The Mountain Flower.

I grew upon the side of a mountain, and was called a mountain flower. I remember well one cold, windy day being blown upon the ground with many of my sisters and brothers,

Finally a little bird came along and gathered some of us up in its beak and flew away, I knew not where, but suddenly I was dropped down here where I am growing now. I felt very cold and miserable, and could scarcely keep from crying, thinking of being so far from my home and all alone. I was so dazzled and bewildered I could see nothing. All was confusion.

That evening a cold rain came, and sank me deep within the earth. It was so dark down there I could see nothing, but the earth protected me from the cold wind and I felt slightly comforted.

I lay there I know not how long, but one day I came up into the light, which so dazzled my eyes that I could scarcely see, but by degrees I became used to it and looked around me. It was very beautiful there after all, and my heart leaped with joy as I gazed about me, for I was not entirely alone, as I supposed. There were large trees, such as I had seen when I was in repose upon my mother's bosom. They all looked down kindly on me as though glad I was there.

The sunbeams came down on me with a caressing touch, and I felt very warm and comfortable indeed.

The warm sun I had so admired began to sink at last, and passed from my sight. And I missed him so much.

I, too, must hav gone to sleep, and slept for many hours, for when I awoke the sun was again above the horizon. I was glad to see him, for I feared he had left forever.

I was suddenly startled by a low sound, and gazing in the direction whence the sound came, I saw a little brook chattering over the rocks, and on looking closer saw my own reflection in the water. The soft breezes touched the water so gently that they made tiny waves that were very pretty. The birds visited the little brook and me very often, and they were our most welcome visitors.

And though I hav dwelt here for a long time now, I am still content with my lot, and shall never pine again for my nativ land.

Correspondence.

GRAND COULEE, W. T., Sept. 11, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My grandma takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like the Children's Corner very much, and the pictures. I thought I would tell of my papa—he is a Catholic, mother and I are truth seekers. The priest came to baptize me, and I hid in the barn. I am nine years old and am going to school. THOMAS G. BARRY.

Arctic Industries.

It may not be gnnerally known that important mining operations are carried on within the Arctic circle. Cryolite is brought from Greenland to Philadelphia by the shipload to be used in the making of candles. At Alten, near the North Cape in Finmark, extensiv copper mines hav been worked for a long time. When it is remembered that most of the work has to be done under ground, and that heat is what the workmen suffer most from, it becomes apparent at once that mines may be almost as profitable in those high latitudes as they would be on our coast. The main thing is to hav communication open once a year for bringing supplies and carrying away the ores.

An engineer who visited the mines at Alten a few years ago, to study the condition in which they were worked, found that the climate interposed no obstacle. The mines, when fairly deep, are warmer in winter than in summer.

In such work as has to be done above ground, there is scarcely any interruption. During the three dark months, when the sun does not shine, there is no lack of light to the eye accustomed to the conditions. The sky is clear and starry, and the aurora is playing most of the time; whatever light there is, the reflection from the snow increases and intensifies.

More than a hundred and fifty years ago mining was carried on extensivly about the shores of the White sea by Saxon workmen. Silver, copper, and lead were produced in quantities.

Now that the whale fishery has declined, mining enterprise seems most likely of anything to promote exploration and settlement within the Arctic circle.—Youth's Companion.

Popular Science.

By the use of palladium in the hairspring and balance, a Geneva watchmaker claims to hav produced accurate timepieces which are unaffected by magnetism.

To aid in an analysis of noise, Prof. Crum Brown, of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, hopes to be able to make a machine to giv very loud imitations of vocal sounds. He expects the apparatus to hiss with a thousand-man power.

A new discovery is that by the use of citric acid or citrate of silver sea-water may be made drinkable. By this means chloride of silver is precipitated and a harmless mineral water is produced. An ounce of citrate makes a half-pint of water drinkable.

A leaf of the giant water lily (Victoria regia) has been known to measure twenty-four feet 9¼ inches in circumference, its weight being nearly fourteen pounds. One of the flowers was four feet two inches in circumference, with petals nine inches in length, and weighed 3½ pounds.

Platinum wire, experiment has shown, can be drawn so fine as to be invisible to the naked eye, although it can be seen by the aid of a small magnifying glass when laid upon a perfectly white card held in such a position that the wire casts a shadow. Its presence on the card can also be detected by the touch.

The bee's sting, says Naturalist Clark, is by no means made for stinging only, but is used in doing the artistic cell-work, capping the comb and infusing the formic acid, by means of which honey receives its keeping qualities. The sting is really a skilfully contrived little trowel with which the bee finishes off and caps the cells when they are brimful of honey. This explains why honey extracted before it is capped over does not keep well. The formic acid has not been injected into it.

In a paper to the Liverpool Astronomical Society, Mr. W. H. S. Monck suggested lately that the puzzling climatic variations recorded by the rocks may hav been produced by the near approach to the earth of intensely hot stars. This may hav been due to the traveling of the star itself, or to the motion of the solar system in space. Moving with the earth's own rate, a celestial body would traverse in 50,000,000 years the distance separating our globe from the most remote of the 70,000,000 stars visible in the most powerful telescopes, making it possible that, with suitable proper motions, any or every star known may hav visited the solar system during the period commonly assumed by geologists to hav elapsed since the first dawn of life. Intensely hot stars may hav added materially to the earth's heat without coming sufficiently near to greatly derange the planetary orbits.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

News of the Week.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND has been invited to lay the cornerstone of the big Auditorium building in Chicago, but the Knights of Labor say that if he does he is no friend of theirs, as non-union carpenters hav been employed on the structure.

JENNIE LIND, the great singer, has had a stroke of paralysis.

THE Prohibition issue in the recent Tennessee election was defeated by 20,000 majority.

THE Anti-Poverty Society is holding a big fair at Madison Square Garden for the benefit of the George campaign.

JACOB SHARP, the alderman-briber, has been granted another stay of proceedings, otherwise he would hav gone to Sing Sing Sept. 30th.

THE case of the Chicago Anarchists is now in the hands of General Roger A. Pryor, of New York, who will endeavor to carry it before the United States Supreme Court.

THE Rev. J. W. Day, pastor of the Channing Memorial church at Newport, R. I., has been obliged to resign in consequence of his recent marriage with a divorced woman.

THE American Institute Fair at sixty-fifth street and Third avenue opened Sept. 28th with an attractiv exhibition of mechanical contrivances.

THE sexton of St. Paul's Episcopal church in Newark, N. J., was sentenced on the 18th ult. to seven years in the penitentiary for criminal assault on his 15-year-old daughter.

THE Rev. Edward Trevor, a Methodist clergyman of Laurel Hill, Westchester county, N. Y., left that place suddenly on Monday of last week. He is charged with revolting conduct, his accuser being a boy formerly belonging to the Salvation Army.

AT midnight, Oct. 1st, the Rev. Mr. Cooper, curate of Cretingham, Suffolk, Eng., murdered Vicar Farley. He entered the vicar's bedroom and cut his throat with a razor. He then fled, but subsequently returned, and was arrested.

PEOPLE who went to the Anti-Poverty Society's meeting Sunday evening were charged 25 cents each for admission, and when every one of the three thousand seats in the Academy of Music were filled the crowd was let into Nilsson Hall at the same rate. There was also a big collection taken up. George and McGlynn addressed both meetings.

THE Socialists of Union Hill engaged a hall for the purpose of holding a meeting last Sunday to express sympathy with the condemned Chicago Anarchists; but when they reached the place of meeting they found it in possession of the police. Some of the Socialists protested, and were arrested and clubbed out of all semblance to themselvs, and the town clerk read the riot act. When the arrested men were taken to court a crowd of their sympathizers followed them, and were dispersed by the fire department, which turned a stream of water upon them. The work of the police is described as brutal and cruel.

THE American yacht Volunteer won the international races sailed here last week against the Scotch cutter Thistle. The first race was sailed Tuesday in a light wind and smooth sea over a 38-mile course, the Yankee coming in 19 minutes ahead. There was plenty of wind and a rough sea for the 40-mile sail on Friday, and the Volunteer won by 11 minutes. The race was for the queen's cup, won by the sloop America against the whole Royal Yacht Squadron in 1851, and which has since that time been successfully defended by American yachts against all comers. The Volunteer's superior powers were shown in the beat to windward, as the Thistle gained several minutes on the home stretch before the wind.

Gems of Thought.

IF my Christian friends choose to consider that my time had not yet come, my "work" not yet accomplished, I will not quarrel with them about it, for I had not at that time started THE TRUTH SEEKER nor begun to preach the glad gospel of truth.—D. M. Bennett.

WHEN Sir Walter Raleigh was led to the scaffold, a bald-headed old man prest (sic) through the crowd, and prayed that God would support him. "I thank thee, my good friend," said Raleigh to him; "and I am sorry that I am in no case to return thee anything for thy good will. But here [observing his bald head], take this night-cap; thou hast more need of it now than I hav."—Guesses at Truth.

ONE of my fellow-teachers whom I interrogated on religious questions thinks that there are "some most barbarous things attributed to God in the Old Testament," and as to religion generally he thinks "something must be taught," and adds most unconsequentially, "What does it matter what is taught?" So, by the aid of mental reservations and shameful casuistries, he will [pretend to] believe as he is ordered, and will duly teach the children that a God, who afterward learned to love little children, once sent a she-bear to tear forty-and-two of them to pieces. [Let the curious searcher turn to 2 Kings ii, 19-25, and he will learn not merely the story of the she-bears, but also how Elisha healed the waters of a certain well, and brought it about that "there should not be from thence any more death or barren land.' The stories are well fitted for a winter-evening fire, and any child that can read them unmoved must be a hardened little wretch.] And that Abraham, by his unnatural readiness to murder even his own son at the divine command, secured God's blessing and became the father of the faithful. Such a teacher will giv incomprehensible accounts of Christ's personality and parentage. He will do his best to make the boys believe in impossibilities and absurdities, in pueril miracles, in demoniacal possession, extending even to swine. He will tell them of a fig-tree withered by an unmerited curse, of a money-bearing fish, of miraculous healing virtue going out of a garment, of the thief whose dying belief gained easily and certainly a (supposed) highest reward of infinit and eternal happiness, such as the noblest devotion of a whole life could never deserve or win. He will shock the thoughtful boys with slavish doctrins of non-resistance and of utter improvidence, or he will puzzle and delude them by explaining away and reversing Christ's plainest words.—Religion in Schools.

"WILL it pay, now, for you to speak out boldly against the errors of our old religion? Will it prove any advantage to you to urge the adoption of this new faith? Look at your business, which will be wholly ruined if you come out openly as a Christian. Your old friends will desert you. Just be content to hold your peace. Entertain what views you please in secret, but for policy's sake, keep silent!" Now, these words, which might hav been with perfect propriety addressed to the convert to Christianity in the third century, are perfectly similar to those which the majority of Radicals, in the nineteenth century, hear daily from their friends of (what is now) the Old Faith. —The New Faith, by J. L. Stoddard. ["The New Faith" is No. 119 of the Truth Seeker Tracts, and while I consider many of the series valuable, there is none that I put a higher value on than this one. I earnestly recommend it to the notice of serious inquirers, and if, after reading it, they agree with me, I should hope that some of them will order, say a dozen or a score or a century of them, and send them to others, who will "go and do likewise."—Hylax.]

THE high and titled ranks among the clergy, though they may not believe all that is taught in the liturgy (or any other authorized exposition of religious belief), must profess it in public, that the lower ranks may be kept in order. They bow the knee, that the vulgar, taught by their example, may do the like, and may really believe what is pretended only by their superiors; and, what is worse—according to the newest fashion—the man who professes Infidelity among his confidential associates is the very person who is the most systematical in enforcing orthodoxy upon his inferiors. He revels in his liberty, and makes it his boast that he has freed himself from all superstitious shackles, and at the same time that he holds it for "very stuff of conscience" not to let in the least glimmering of light upon his servants and those who are placed in a station below him.—Godwin's Essays.

CATO, the censor, being scurrilously treated by a man who led a dissolute and infamous life, said, "It is upon very unequal terms that I contend with you; for you are accustomed to be ill-spoken of, and you can yourself speak ill of others with pleasure; but with me it is unusual to hear myself ill-spoken of, and disagreeable for me to speak ill of others."—Plutarch.

THERE is inherent in our minds an insatiable desire to know the truth and to communicate it.—Cicero.

THE FIRST WRESTLING MATCH ON RECORD.

And Jacob was left alone; and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day.—Gen. xxxii, 24.

Odds and Ends.

IN these days the preserving housekeeper has a good deal to put up with.

WHEN a bank boodler skips to Canada now it is in order to ask: "Was it the lady or the tiger?"

WHY is a jack-o'-lantern like a watch-key? Because there's a b in both. [N.B.—This answer will fit any conundrum.]—Religious Exchange.

THIS is the festiv season of the county fair, when the big pumpkin vies with the pretty country girl for the attention of the crowd, and gets left every time, world without end.

THE dog show has been a great failure at Newport, but the duke show has been a great success. Yet there is room for doubt as to the comparativ merits of the exhibit at either show.

"To what do you attribute the curativ properties of your spring?" asked a visitor at a health resort. "Well," answered the proprietor thoughtfully, "I guess the advertising I've done has had something to do with it."

OLD lady (to grocer's boy): "Don't you know, boy, that it is very rude to whistle when dealing with a lady?" Boy: "That's what the boss told me to do, mum." Old lady: "Told you to whistle?" Boy: "Yes'm. He said if we ever sold you anything we'd hav to whistle for the money."

BOBBY was lolling restlessly on the rug. "Ma," he said, "you say that pa will giv me a good spanking when he comes home?" "Yes, young man," replied his mother, "the moment he comes home." Bobby rolled over once or twice, and then remarked, "Well, ma, what do you mean by a 'good' spanking?"

YOUNG wife (weeping): "You promised to love and cherish me forever, and we hav only been married two years, and now what has become of your everlasting love and affection." Young husband: "Great Scott! you are always kicking about something. How long did you suppose this everlasting love was going to last, anyhow?"

"GEORGE, dear," said the girl, "do you ever drink anything?" "Yes, occasionally," George reluctantly admitted. "But, dear," she went on anxiously, "what do you suppose papa would say if he should discover that the future husband of his only daughter drank?" "He discovered it this morning." "Oh, George, what did he say?" "He said, 'Well, George, my boy, I don't care if I do.'"

"DEARLY beloved," said the pastor of an Oakland church yesterday, "for the past week my heart has been torn by conflicting emotions. I hav long labored among you, and if I could hav my will here is where I would die. But I recently received a call to care for a flock in Los Angeles, and I hav wrestled with the Lord in prayer to know whether it was his will that I should proceed to that new field of duty. I——" At that moment the clerk tiptoed softly forward, and handed the pastor a brief note from the treasurer. As the good shepherd read it his brow cleared. "Brethren," he continued, "the Lord has vouchsafed an answer to my prayer. I see an inward light which convinces me that it is the divine pleasure that I should continue to labor among this people whose spiritual interests hav been dear to me for so many years."

SHE said not much beside the sea;
At set of sun she sat with me,
I held her hand, so fond and free,
Thrilled at its touch;
Softly I spoke and tenderly,
She said not much.
We saw the billows come and flee;
Oh! tremulous heart and throbbing sea,
How near alike they seemed to me!
Upon the sands I bent my knee,
"Oh, wilt thou not my true love be?"
She said, "Not much!"

AFTER the late Dr. Dashiell had risen to prominence in the Methodist church, he returned on one occasion to his old home on the eastern shore of Maryland and preached. Among his auditors was an old colored man who had taken care of him when he was a child. The old man was delighted wi'h the sermon of his young master, and was very proud of him. At the close of the service he shook the doctor warmly by the hand, and said: "Larry, you's a good preacher; you's a good preacher. I tell you, you's a soundin brass and a tinklin' cymbal." Very nearly of the same sort is the remark said to hav been made lately by a colored woman in the South concerning the cultured and affable Bishop Galloway, of the Church South. She said: "Brother Galloway always do preach a powerful good tex'."

"TO BE OR NOT TO BE"—A HINT TO THE TIMID

Notes and Clippings.

BISHOP MOORE of Florida has sent an application to the pope asking that Dr. McGlynn's case be reopened, the excommunication annulled, and Dr. McGlynn reinstated.

THE proportion of dignitaries in the Mormon church is almost equal to that of officers in the United States army and navy. In Utah there are 400 bishops, 2,423 priests, 2,947 teachers, and 6,854 deacons.

ACCORDING to the Columbia, Ga., Sentinel this is the way a man died down there: "On Friday last, just after the sun had kissed this world good-night, and passed to its bed of crimson and gold, the spirit of A. G. Sturgis vacated its habitation of clay, and wended its way to the father who gave it, and to-day is walking the glory-lit hills of immortality in the New Jerusalem, where there is no night."

MISS EMMA ABBOTT, the actress, attended the Methodist church at Nashville, Tenn., last Sunday, and the pastor, the Rev. W. A. Chandler, took advantage of the occasion to preach a sermon against the theater. At the close of the discourse Miss Abbott arose and in a short speech entered a general denial of the pastor's statement. There was applause at the close of her remarks, and the preacher had nothing to say.

ALL of the members of the McNish, Johnson & Slavin minstrel company whom the police could catch were arraigned in Cincinnati last week on indictments for giving performances on Sunday. They pleaded guilty, and Frank McNish and Robert Slavin were fined $10 each, and Martin Hogan and Bert Haverly $5 each. It was the first time tha members of a theatrical company had ever been indicted for this offense in Cincinnati, although Sunday performances are a regular thing.

THE death of Beecher is reuniting the Congregational churches of Brooklyn, and Plymouth church, which was disfellowshiped at the time of the so-called Beecher scandal, is now admitted to the Congregational Association.

AN old man went running up and down West 37th street in this city one night last week, shrieking, "The almighty is sending me money and a wife! The Lord forbids me to work." A police officer took him in off the street, and his son shortly appeared and made a charge of insanity against him. His name is John C. Felt. He is a mental wreck, and owes that fact to having experienced religion.

A TALL man, with please-don't-hit-me eyes and a long beard, wandered into the great gallery of the New York Produce Exchange the other afternoon. The grain and hog men kept right on with their howling. The man looked lonesome. Nobody noticed him. He seemed to look longingly at the odd bushels of corn, oats, and wheat which are left for the sweepers at night. The doorkeepers were informed that the man was Rutherford B. Hayes. Ex-Mayor Franklin Edson and George Milmine, the self-constituted perpetual reception committee of the Exchange, gathered themselvs together and hurried to invite the Ohio chicken-breeder to inspect the building. There was a rumor in financial circles that Mr. Hayes was there to bid for the chicken feed on the floor. This was officially denied.

IN the Hannibal, Mo., court of common pleas, on the 7th inst., E. J. Ohmer, proprietor of a hotel and restaurant, was fined $100 for selling cigars on Sunday contrary to the state law prohibiting the sale of all articles of merchandise not of immediate necessity. For years the Sunday law has been inoperativ there, and saloons, clothing stores, groceries, barber shops, and confectioneries hav been open on Sunday as on other days. About two weeks ago the ladies of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union began a movement aimed at the Sunday closing in general and the shutting up of all saloons in particular. Accordingly the mayor issued a proclamation ordering the enforcement of the law. Strenuous opposition was made by those whose business was affected, and Ohmer's was selected as a test case. An appeal has been taken to the St. Louis Court of Appeals.

THE New York state committee of the Woman's Suffrage party publish a statement showing that a number of important persons hav declared themselvs in favor of woman's suffrage. Judge Roger S. Greene, formerly chief justice of Washington Territory; Judge E. D. Culver, Professor Ordronnaux, of Columbia College; Judge C. C. Cole, of Iowa; Mr. W. I. Bowditch, of Massachusetts, and John Hooker, of Connecticut, all appear to hold that in New York women hav the right to register as voters; and if at the polls the vote of a woman should be challenged, she can take the oath for challenged persons, and her vote cannot lawfully be rejected. "It is the duty of inspectors of election," says Professor Ordronnaux, "to receive a vote from every woman who takes the oath prescribed by law; and it is their duty to administer that oath to any one who demands it."

DR. PARKER, who came to America to deliver a eulogy on Beecher and is staying to lecture, spoke the other night at Chickering Hall on "Job's Comforters." His object was to show how little comport science can giv as compared with religion. The next time Dr. Parker has a boil he will probably pray for it instead of invoking the aid of medical science to relieve his pain—that is, if he is sincere, which he probably is not.

THE Radical papers of Rome say that while the Peter's pence is not so abundant as it was in the days of Pope Pius IX., it is still a source of considerable revenue to the papal exchequer. The Vatican budget profits also by the interest on the sum of 14,000,000 francs, deposited by Pius IX., in the bank of England as a pension fund for the benefit of the ex-officers of the papal army, the number of those officers having been greatly reduced by death. Leo XIII. is said to hav invested a considerable portion of the Peter's pence in the shares of the bank of Rome, and in industrial institutions founded by it. In addition he has made large investments in Italian rentes, thus contradicting, in the opinion of the Radical papers, his own predictions concerning the instability of the Italian government. One of these worldly investments, however, nearly turned out disastrously, for the pope had been induced by Cardinal Czacki, then the nuncio in Paris, to deposi a million francs with the famous "Union Générale." When Bontoux, its manager, was arrested, the Pope succeeded, only with great difficulty, through the intercession of Monsignor Czacki, in recovering his deposit.

The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Secret of the East," etc.

III.—Moral Maxims.

CHAPTER XII.—TRUTH.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

The enemies of Nature have for ages based the favorite arguments of their creed on the doctrine of Natural Depravity. According to the theories of that tenet the natural instincts of the human heart are wholly evil, and its every nobler impulse is due to the redeeming influence of theological education. The baseness of the "unregenerate soul" is their favorite antithesis of "holiness by grace;" and the best test of that dogma would be a comparison of the moral characteristics of a young child of Nature with the moral results of theological training. We need not adduce the extreme case of a child like Kaspar Hauser or the ape-nursed foundling of Baroda, whose propensities had been modeled in communion with solitude or the dumb denizens of the wilderness. For, even in the midst of "Christian civilization," thousands of peasants and mechanics are practically pure Agnostics, and ignore the absurdities of the New Testament as persistently as their deer-hunting ancestors ignored the absurdities of pagan mythology. At the end of his sixth or seventh year the offspring of such parents would still represent a fair specimen-child of unregenerate Nature, and the normal bias of that Nature is revealed in the honesty, the trusting innocence, the purity, and the cheerfulness of the young Agnostic, and the absence of every appreciable germ of the secret vices, the rancorous spites, and the joy-hating bigotries of the representative Christian convent-slave.

But the most characteristic features of that contrast would perhaps be the double-tongued hypocrisy of the old Jesuit and the artless candor of the young peasant boy. The truthfulness of young children antedates all moral instruction. Its motives are wholly independent of theological, or even abstract-ethical, influences, and are based merely on a natural preference for the simplest way of dealing with the problems of intellectual communication. Truth is uniform, falsehood is complex. Truth is persistent and safe; falsehood is unstable, fragile, and precarious. Children instinctively recognize the difficulties of plausibly maintaining the fictions of deceit, and dread the risk of incurring the suspicion of habitual insincerity. Hence their uncompromising loyalty to facts; their innocence of artifice and mental reservation; hence also their extreme reluctance in conforming to the conventional customs of social hypocrisy and polite prevarication.

"Are you not glad Mrs. D. is gone?" Master Frank once asked his mother in my presence. "Well, yes, I am." "Then what's the use asking her to call again and stay for supper? She could not help seeing that we were tired of her gabble." "Well, it wouldn't do to insult her, you know." "Oh, no, but what's the use telling her something she cannot believe?"

That last remark, especially, recurs to my memory whenever the expedience of hypocrisy is defended by the conventional sophisms of Christian civilization. That prevarications are unprofitable as well as unpardonable is a truth which Jesuitry has shrouded with a veil of its choicest cant, but the clear vision of childhood penetrates that cant, and the "natural depravity" of unregenerate souls may reach the degree of doubting the merit of simulation even in the interest of an orthodox creed, as the reverend dogmatist might ascertain by happening to overhear the recess comments of our American Sabbath-school youngsters.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

The Utilitarians hold that motives of enlightened self-interest would be sufficient to make a man perfectly virtuous. With the conventional definition of "virtue," that tenet might require certain qualifications; but it is more than probable that perfect prudence would insure a voluntary devotion to perfect truthfulness. In its most aggressive form the hatred of falsehood may imperil the temporary interests of the aggressor, but in every other sense the path of truth is the path of safety. All the ultimate tendencies of the moral and physical universe conspire to vindicate truth and discredit fraud.

Assertions based on fact stand erect, upheld by the evidence of experience as an upright building by the law of gravity; deception, with all its props of plausible sophisms, is tottering like a wall out of plumb, or a rotten tree upheld by artificial supports which in their turn must yield to the test of time.

Even from a standpoint of purely secular considerations, truth, like honesty, is in the long run the best policy. Abstinence from insidious poisons is easier than temperance, and the lessons of experience have at all times convinced the most clear-sighted of our fellow-men that consistent abstinence from the vice of hypocrisy is preferable to any compromise with the interests of imposture. The non-clerical, and almost Agnostic, education of the American wilderness seems to favor that type of moral teetotalism, and among the hardy hill-farmers of our New England highlands, and Southern mountain states, one may find men almost constitutionally incapable of conscious deceit in deed or word, and practicing veracity without the least pretense to superior saintliness, in a quite untheological and often, indeed, decidedly profane medium of speech. They stick to truth from habit, rather than from moral principles, yet among their simple-hearted neighbors they enjoy a respect withheld from unctuous hypocrisy, and in emergencies can always rely on the practical value of a life-long reputation for candor. Their word is sufficient security; their denial of slanderous imputations is accepted without the aid of compurgators.

The simple religion of Mohammed has favored the development of a similar disposition, and on the Austrian-Turkish frontier the word of a Mussulman generally carries the weight of a casting vote. On the Indian ocean, too, the verdict of international opinion favors a preference for Unitarian testimony. "Wish to heaven we could fall in with some Acheen fishermen," Captain Baudissin heard his pilot mutter among the reefs of the Sunda Islands; "it's no use asking such d——— liars as those Hindoos and Chinese."

The love of truth compels the respect even of impostors and of professional hypocrits, as in the case of that curate mentioned by the German Freethinker, Weber (author of the philosophical cyclopedia, "Democritus"). Professor Weber passed his last years in the retirement of a small south-German mountain village, where his undisguised skepticism made him the bugbear of the local pharisees; yet on moonless evenings he was more than once honored by the visits of a neighboring village priest, who risked censure, and, perhaps, excommunication, for the sake of enjoying the luxury of a respite from the sickening cant of his colleagues, and devoting a few hours to intellectual communion with a champion of Secular science.

Lessing's allegory of "Nathan" is founded on something more than fiction, and there is no doubt that even in the midnight of the Middle Ages the gloomy misery of the Hebrew pariahs was often cheered by the secret visits of some intelligent Christian whom the thirst for truth impelled to defy the vigilance of the heretic-hunter, and to prefer an intellectual symposium in the garret of a Jewish slum alley to a feast in the banquet hall of a Christian prelate.

"It is lucky for you that your opponents have not learned to utilize the advantage of truth," Mirabeau replied to the taunt of an insolent Jesuit; and in logic that advantage can, indeed, hardly be overrated. "They find believers who themselves believe," and, as the philosopher, Colton, observes, a sort of instinct often enables the simplest countryman to distinguish the language of honest conviction from the language of artful sophistry. "Our jurymen seem to appreciate a first-class lie only from an artistic standpoint," confessed a lawyer of my acquaintance, "for some of them privately hinted that they could tell it every time."

Others, no doubt, lack that degree of acumen; but first-class orators, as well as first-class authors, have always recognized the wisdom of not relying on such mental defects of the public. Charles Darwin's works, for instance, owe their popularity to their erudition and their grace of style, hardly more than to the absolute candor of the author, who reviews the evidence for and against his theories with the fairness of a conscientious judge, and by that very impartiality has succeeded in prevailing against the partisan arguments of his adversaries. For similar reasons our "Christian" temperance societies can date their triumphs only from the time when they frankly repudiated the sophisms of their predecessors, who hoped to reconcile the lessons of science with the teachings of the alcohol-brewing Galilean. For truth prevails against half-truth, as well as against absolute untruth.

C.—PERVERSION.

Since the dawn of rationalism perhaps no other literary product of Freethought has provoked the enemies of Nature to that degree of rancorous fury excited by the appearance of Moliere's "Tartuffe." The hero of that famous drama is an old pharisee whose resolve to renounce the "vanities of earth" is constantly tripped by the promptings of his physical instincts, and who resorts to all kinds of ludicrous sophisms to palliate the antagonism of two ever irreconcilable principles:

Le ciel défend, de vrai, certain contentements,
Mais on trouve avec lui des accommodements—

and the drama never failed to attract a jubilant audience; but the French priesthood moved heaven and earth to stop the performance, and can, indeed, hardly be blamed for rejecting the apologies of the author's friends; for the irony of Tartuffe ridicules the shams, not only of the Catholic clergy, but of their creed and the creed of their Protestant colleagues: it is, in fact, a scathing satire on the absurdities of Christian Antinaturalism. The impossibility of reconciling the demands of Nature with the precepts of a world-renouncing fanatic has, indeed, made the worship of that fanatic a systematic school of hypocrisy and subverted the moral health of its victims as effectually as the unnatural restraints of convent life subverted the basis of physical health.

God is paid when man receiveth;
To enjoy is to obey;

says Nature with the poet of reason. "God delights in the self-torture of his creatures—crucify your flesh, despise your body, disown the world; renounce! renounce!" croaks the chorus of Christian dogmatists, and can silence protest only by turning health into disease or candor into hypocrisy.

The dogma of salvation by faith offers an additional premium on mental prostitution. By punishing honest doubt as a crime and inculcating the merit of blind submission to the authority of reason-insulting doctrines, the defenders of those doctrines struck a deadly blow at the instinct of free inquiry, and for a series of generations actually succeeded in eradicating that instinct from the mental constitution of their victims.

"The persecutor," says W. H. Lecky, "can never be certain that he is not persecuting truth rather than error, but he may be quite certain that he is suppressing the spirit of truth. And, indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that the doctrines I have reviewed represent the most skilful and at the same time most successful conspiracy against that spirit that has ever existed among mankind. Until the seventeenth century, every mental disposition which philosophy pronounces to be essential to a legitimate research was almost uniformly branded as a sin, and a large proportion of the most deadly intellectual vices were deliberately inculcated as virtues. . . . In a word, there is scarcely a disposition that marks the love of abstract truth and scarcely a rule which reason teaches as essential for its attainment that theologians did not for ages stigmatize as offensive to the Almighty."

And those perversions culminated in the miracle-mongery of the wretched superstition. If the material universe was at the mercy of witches and tricksy demons, no man could for a moment trust the evidence of his own senses and was naturally driven to complete his mental degradation by an absolute surrender of common sense to dogma. The history of Christian dogmatism is the history of an eighteen hundred years' war against Nature and Truth.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

The drift sand of the deserts covering the site of once fertile empires still attests the physical consequences of a thousand years' reign of Antinaturalism, but, happily, the time has already come when many of our fellow-men almost fail to credit the degree of mental abasement realized during the most orthodox centuries of that reign. It would be no overstatement to say that for nearly six hundred years the priests of the Galilean miracle-monger persuaded a plurality of the Caucasian nations to risk their lives in defense of dogmas the mere profession of which would start a modern Christian on a galloping trip to the next lunatic asylum.

Decapitated saints were believed to have emerged from their tombs and paid their respects to a newly appointed bishop; flying dragons descended through the air to snatch the bodies of unbelievers and disappeared with screams that frightened orthodox neighbors to take refuge in their cellar-holes; swarms of angels carried bones, crosses, and whole buildings from Bethlehem to Loretto; King Philip the Second paid a thousand doubloons for a skeleton of St. Laurentius, and having been informed that a complete skeleton of the same saint was for sale in the south of Italy, he at once ratified the bargain and blessed heaven for having favored him with a duplicate of the precious relic. Thousands of unfortunates were tried and executed on a charge of having taken an aerial excursion on a broomstick or a black he-goat; of having caused a gale by churning a potful of froth and water of having turned themselves into foxes, wolves, and tomcats.

The instinct of recognizing the absurdity of even the most glaring superstitions seems to have become wholly extinct in the minds of the forty generations from the middle of the tenth to the end of the fourteenth century; and during that millennium of madness the suppression of free inquiry encouraged thousands of pious tract-mongers to devote their lives to the wholesale forgery of saintly biographies and miracle legends, and disseminate under the name of historical records insanities too extravagant even for the readers of a modern nursery-tale.

The war against Truth was carried to the length of suppressing not only the skeptical inferences of science, but science itself; chemists, astronomers, physiologists, mathematicians, and bona fide historians could pursue their inquiries only at the risk of an inquisitorial indictment; and a cloud of ignorance, which in the days of Horace and Pliny would have been thought disgraceful to the obscurest hamlet of the Roman empire, brooded for ages over the face of the entire Christian world.

For a series of centuries the encouragement of credulity and imposture almost annulled the value of contemporary records. Travelers and chroniclers, as well as biographers, accommodated the popular taste by dealing, not in marvels only, but in miracles; witchcraft anecdotes, preternatural resurrections, prodigies of skill and physical prowess, giants, dragons, were-wolves, and no end of spectral manifestations. It is no exaggeration to say that for a period of more than nine hundred years the dogma of the Galilean antinaturalist systematically favored the survival of the unfit, by offering a premium on mental prostitution and making common sense a capital crime.

E.—REFORM.

The triumph of the Protestant revolt has ushered in a dawn which, in comparison with the preceding night, may justly vaunt its era as an Age of Reason; but the thousand years' perversion of our moral instincts has not been wholly redeemed by the educational influences of a short century. For even eighty years ago the educational reforms of the Protestant nations attempted little more than a compromise between reason and dogma, while their southern neighbors revolted against the political influence, rather than against the dogmatical arrogance, of their priesthood. Nay, even at present the fallacies of the compromise plan still hamper the progress of reform in manifold directions. As an American Freethinker aptly expresses it: "Truth is no longer kept under lock and key, but is kindly turned loose to roam at large—after being chained to a certain number of theological cannon balls." Evolution may pursue its inquiries into specific phases of organic development, but must not question the correctness of the Mosaic traditions; rationalists may inveigh against the insanities of the Middle Ages, but must pretend to overlook the fact that the doctrine of the New Testament contains the germs of all those insanities; the science of health may denounce modern fallacies, but must beware to mention the anti-physical precepts of the body-despising Galilean; Materialists must attack the hobgoblins of the Davenport brothers, but ignore the hog-goblins of Gadara; historical critics may call attention to the inconsistencies of Livy and Plutarch, but must not mention the self-contradictions of the New Testament.

Yet logic and philosophy will be little more than a farce till the axiom of a great biologist can be applied to the pursuit of every human science. "Inquiries of that sort," (the descent of man) he says, "have nothing whatever to do with personal tastes or vested interests, but only with facts. We should not ask: 'Will it be popular?' 'Will it seem orthodox?' but simply, 'Is it true?'"

And in just as much as the theory of moral duties deserves the name of a science, the exponents of that science would gain, rather than lose, by the adoption of the same maxim. "Religion," in the traditional sense of the word, needs to be purged from an enormous percentage of spurious elements, before its ministers can be acquitted from the guilt of tempting their disciples to associate the ideas of Ethics and Imposture, and thus reject the basis of morality together with the basis of an Asiatic myth. "Truth is the beginning of Wisdom," "Justice is Truth," "Mendacity is the Mother of Discord," would be fit mottoes for the ethical Sunday-schools of the Future. "What is Truth?" asks Pilate; yet even in religious controversies the fury of sectarian strife could be obviated if we would truthfully admit the uselessness of disputes about the unknowable mysteries of supernatural problems. Still, we cannot hope to eradicate the roots of discord unless we resolve with equal frankness to reject the interference of Supernaturalism with the knowable problems of secular science. Evident Truth can dispense with the indorsement of miracle-mongers, and "evident Untruth," in the words of Ulrich Hutten, "should be exposed whether its teachers come in the name of God or of the devil."

Just a Little Queer.

A Quakeress once said to her friend: "Everyone is queer except thee and me; and thee is a little queer sometimes." We none of us go as far as that; but I can't help thinking Prof. V. B. Denslow just a little queer in what he says about a tariff article I had in THE TRUTH SEEKER for September 3d.

For instance, I asked what right government has to prevent our buying thousands of "useful articles as cheaply as we can," and went on to explain my meaning thus: "Why should not the free American be able, like the Englishman, to purchase foreign-made goods, when they are cheaper and better than domestic products, without being taxed for it?" Mr. Denslow disregards my explanation of the phrase "as cheaply as we can," and quotes it with the comment: "It is a mere misapprehension to say that in enacting a protectiv tariff the government deprives any one of the power to buy as cheaply as he can. Each subject of the government keeps on buying as cheaply as he can after, as well as before, a protectiv tariff is enacted." If this is not a mere quibble, it is a denial of a very important fact. Our protectiv tariff does prevent our buying as cheaply as we otherwise could. We pay about $150,000,000 a year of duties on imported necessaries of life; and all this money has to be paid by the purchaser in addition to what he would hav to pay if they came in free. More than that, these duties are imposed on commodities which are produced at home as well as abroad; and the price of the entire supply, not only that of foreign, but that of domestic origin, is raised in consequence. Sugar, for instance, costs twice as much at retail in New York as in London, though much of our sugar is grown and refined in this country. The price of salt has been increased enormously for the benefit of a few owners of springs, who thus hold a lucrativ monopoly. The cheap cloth worn by the poor man paid, in 1883, a duty of 116 per cent, though that worn by the rich man paid but 58. At the same time, a cloak which cost $3 in Germany was taxed 85 per cent, though one costing $12.50 was taxed but 49. This is just what we ought to expect. No manufacturer is protected by the tariff if it does not enable him to make his fellow-citizens pay more for what he makes than the price at which it would otherwise be imported. A protectiv tariff is meant to raise prices. If it did not, it would be like an alarm-clock I know of, which ticks noisily until the time set for it to go off, and then stops before striking the bell.

Protectionists generally admit that our tariff raises prices, but hold that it more than offsets this by raising wages, a plea which I answered so fully that Professor Denslow has really nothing to reply, except that I misrepresented him. Let us see. He said on June 18th:

> Whatever higher values attach to American labor and its products, over what attach to foreign labor and its products, are due, therefore, to the obstacles to the free introduction of the products of foreign labor, and to the obstacles to the general supplying of foreign laborers with our facilities. Free trade, by removing these obstacles, tends to throw the whole world into one market, having but one price, and thereby to destroy that very difference on which our higher values for commodities and for labor rest. Protection tends to preserve and increase these differences in value. And these differences in values constitute the whole difference between the condition of the free American laborer and the Hindoo cooly.

I understood him to mean, as I said on September 3d, "that our tariff keeps up wages." He now complains that I charge him with "holding it to be the cause," whereas he only holds "it, under proper concurring conditions, to be a cause." Now it does not seem to me that I misunderstood him very grievously, and at all events I think I hav proved that our tariff is neither the cause nor a cause of our high wages, by showing as I did, from Professor Denslow's own figures, that laborers are better paid in free-trade England than in protectionist Germany.

My opponent here objects thus: "Trade is not free in England. The application of the phrase, 'free,' to English trade is a simple misnomer." He forgets that he used himself the words, "British free trade," in his former article. The fact that 4182 articles are taxed here, including many of the necessaries of life, and only a dozen luxuries in Great Britain, coupled with the fact that our tariff yields $100,000,000 a year more than is needed for revenue, while theirs imposes no such needless burden, seems to justify both Professor Denslow and me in speaking of "British free trade," in spite of his plea that nearly the whole export trade of England has been forced upon barbarian purchasers, like Portugal and Japan, "by fighting, by conquest, by fraud, and by false pretenses!" Perhaps the next time he feels moved to exclaim of one of my articles, "It is amazing that the perverted ingenuity of misinformation could embody so much falsehood and so little truth into so few words," he will kindly tell us when the war between Japan and England took place, and what portion of the mikado's dominions was conquered by British troops.

A much more important point is whether our tariff really helps or hurts our manufacturers. I began my remarks on this point by admitting that the protectionists are perfectly right in holding that our country would better do as much manufacturing as possible. "The only trouble," I added, "is that they charge their opponents with being less friendly than they to manufactures. The fact is that the so-called free traders are just as desirous as the protectionists to hav our manufactures flourish." Now, is it not rather queer for Professor Denslow to say that "Mr. Holland next pleads that it is the free traders who want manufactures to flourish here?" Does he mean to charge me with holding that the free traders are more desirous than the protectionists? Why does he not quote my words, "just as desirous?" Can he prove them false?

He could not hav failed to understand me, if he had taken the trouble to read my article through. His own words show that he had not read more than half of it. Its main purpose was to advocate abolishing the duties on raw materials, especially wool, coal, lumber, hemp, dye-stuffs, chemicals, iron ore, and pig iron. This plan has been advocated, as I mentioned, by a senator who represents one of our great manufacturing states. It is incorporated into the platform of the New York Democrats, who say: "The taxation to be first reduced or altogether removed is that on imported raw materials, which now assist and promote foreign competition with ourselvs in our own markets and prevent or hinder the sale of our surplus products in foreign markets." In the Forum for October both Senator Kelly and Speaker Carlisle present, as the most pressing question in politics, the necessity of choosing between such a reform of the tariff and such a reduction of the internal revenue taxes as will cheapen whisky, brandy, beer, and tobacco for the saloons.

It is in order to make the importance of this issue understood that "Mr. Holland indulges in the nonsense of measuring imports and exports." The fact that England exported in 1880 sixteen times as many dollars' worth of cotton goods to Central and South America as we is worth thinking about. So is her having exported to various parts of the globe, last year, forty times as many yards of cotton cloth as we did, and also her having sent out in 1880 $450 worth of woolen goods to our $1. Is it mere nonsense to say that it would be a good thing for our woolen manufacturer, as well as for all his neighbors, to hav the duty on wool, and other articles which are raw materials as far as he is concerned, diminished sufficiently for him to undersell his foreign rivals all over the world, and be no longer in danger of glutting the domestic market, to which he is confined at present? Many manufacturers, like Rowland G. Hazard, say this plainly. Professor Denslow thinks that if we fully consider the value of the home trade to New England, "its commerce would far exceed that of old England." But this would make New England the richest country on the face of the earth, and I fear that the news is rather too good to be true. Even having the whole of the trade of 50,000,000 people is not worth so much as the share, estimated at one-half, which England has of the trade of 1,200,000,000.

Our attempt to withdraw ourselvs from commerce with other countries is worth considering as one of the reasons why not a single ship is now building in the United States; why the tonnage of all our seagoing vessels is less than one-fifth of the British, and why Great Britain owns more than twenty-five times as many iron steamers of over one hundred tons as we do (see the Boston Herald for Sept. 13th, 14th, and 26th).

I spoke of this decline as having taken place under our high tariff, and Professor Denslow has the politeness, after misquoting the remark, to say that it "might become a boy ten years old." It doesn't seem to me very pueril, in view of the equality of British and American tonnage in 1810, the year before the tariff was raised greatly. He tells me that I should learn the following facts, as he calls them:

1. "Ocean-going American vessels hav had no protection as carriers" or "subsidies since 1816;" but our government actually paid $4,750,000 to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company from 1867 to 1877, besides $1,812,000 to a line between the United States and Brazil (Wells: Our Merchant Marine, p. 139).

2. The decline began, he says, in 1855, "right in the midst of the free trade period;" but the fact is that the tariff had been raised in 1846 so high as to yield nearly twice as much revenue as before, and in conformity with the wish of the protectionists, who managed to keep it up, despite its causing a heavy surplus, until 1857. Then came a reduction, followed by such prosperity of the laborer as constitutes an argument against protection, which cannot be got rid of by talking about what happened in 1853 and 1854 as if they were years of low tariff. I don't see any need of troubling a man who mixes up his dates in that way to pick out "facts" for me which I "should learn."

3. "The British carrying trade has been subsidized out of the fund in the hands of the British board of admiralty to the amount of about $6,000,000 a year for the past forty years." I don't feel sure that I ought to learn this as a fact, for I find our national board of trade say, in their report for 1880: "There is no evidence before us that, during recent years at least, Great Britain has sought to promote shipbuilding by the direct payment of bounties or subsidies." I suspect that she has paid out very little money in this way lately, except what she made by conquering Japan.

4. I am further told by my opponent that the prosperity of the British marine is due to the high tariff in force there until 1842, but as this prosperity did not become very marked before 1849, I could as soon suppose that the cleanness and polish of my shirt, as it comes out of the laundry, are due to my having had it on before it went in.

I hav felt bound to answer thus at length a writer who speaks of those who differ from him honestly about the tariff as "grossly ignorant or malignantly lying scribblers," "vealy charlatans," who suggest "the problem whether intelligent government can endure when men so unscrupulously deficient in their acquaintance with the facts assume to teach," etc. He must excuse my reminding him of an old proverb about people who liv in glass houses.

News and Notes.

The campaign at Canyon City, beneath the shadow of the state penitentiary and half a dozen churches, was just the exact opposit of these gloomy and kindred institutions, that somehow seem to flourish on the same soil. I suppose mental slavery eventually results in bodily slavery, for material and spiritual conditions interblend. My good landlord, C. L. Lewis, who is a Liberal, and knows how to run a hotel, guided me from the bright sunlight into the stately prison-house, where everything goes on so smoothly with orthodox nicety; no sinning at all, no drinking, no swearing, early to bed and early to rise, good grub three times a day, and a bed to sleep in; in fact, all that a prison-house needs is harp-playing to be a fair picture of the orthodox heaven. But there are very few Christians outside that want to go inside unless they hav to. Liberty is sweet to all, and no amount of other conveniences can make up for the loss of following the bent of one's own mind. The labor problem would be pretty nearly solved if into the comfort and order of a penitentiary could be put the element of liberty. Giv to every laboring man and woman on this planet the prison life of a criminal plus liberty, and universal happiness would be the result. But the tug of war is to make people happy, prosperous, and unrestrained. The element of freedom is what makes the problem of life of such infinit difficulty. If all men and women were sticks and stones, how easily they could be arranged together in a perfectly respectable community!

I gave three lectures at Canyon City to fair audiences, and they increased from night to night. I am sorry to say that some Christians were present who could not remain until the close, but stampeded in the middle of the discourse. My theme was "The New Heaven and Earth." It may be that they expected an exposition of the scriptures, and were confounded, when they understood the heresy of the affair. Only a few, however, departed, and it is to be hoped that this mental agitation will not cease, for therein is life.

Canyon City is quite church-ridden, but Jamieson and York hav fired some lively guns into the orthodox camp, and we purpose to keep it up. Our forces here are not numerous, but they are brave and loyal.

I had quite a pleasant visit with my friend, John Lake, and his family—all Liberals—who liv just outside the city in the midst of a beautiful orchard, where the fruits glisten in the sun. This is a happy Freethought home, where music prevails, and the shadows of superstition linger not. Here one finds refreshment for the mighty battle that is still to be fought.

Friend A. B. Pickard is eighty-seven years old. He was once a Methodist minister and presiding elder, and was a good one, I hav no doubt, and worked faithfully in the "vineyard of the Lord"—for he is a man of the utmost sincerity and of bright intellectual power. He quit the pulpit and maintained his independence by sturdy toil. It was a pleasure to meet this venerable Secularist, who has lived a life of honest thought, and for whom death has no terror. In old age the world is still beautiful, for the beams of truth are forever fresh.

Mr. and Mrs. George Towers, who gave me good cheer in their cosy home; Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Stafford, who in their frontier life hav never lost the fire of intellectual progress; Mr. and Mrs. Jos. Baker, Anton Magerl, J. C. Agard, A. F. Stockley, B. F. Young, and others are those genial Western comrades who are used to all sorts of fortunes, and who "bate no jot of heart or hope," whether the storm blows or the sunshine falls. Canyon City is about six thousand feet above the level of the sea. The air is bright and beautiful. Close by is the Royal Gorge, with its rugged and stupendous walls, fifteen hundred and two thousand feet high, through which winds the Arkansas, with turbulent flood, and alongside this the railroad. The ride from Salt Lake City to Canyon is one of marvelous beauty and variety. We pass through the lovely and garden-like sceneries of Utah, thence into the bold and desolate mountains. In the early morn, the golden sunshine streaming and glittering on the hundred peaks, we rush through Gunnison Canyon, where sweet and sparkling landscapes mingle with views of awful grandeur; then we climb round and round the vast and fluctuating hills, eleven thousand feet above the sea, over Marshall's Pass, while the blue and snowy summits stretch far as the eye can see. It is a glorious ride. We appear to be gliding in mid-air, as we look down a thousand feet and see the road that a few minutes ago we were bounding along. Up and down we plunge, and it seems as if our fiery horses themselvs, with all their iron muscles, must be getting tired of such enormous journeys above the clouds.

We leave Canyon City at midnight, with cheery farewells and the moon over our right shoulder, and the mountains and plains glistening like fairy-lands. In the morning we are in the beautiful city of Denver, queenly still, and yielding not one particle of its splendor to all its eager rivals. Our Secular Club is flourishing, although Dean Hart is trying to convince the world that Joshua really stopped the sun and moon. But the Denverites don't seem to care much for these ancient legends. They take a great deal more stock in the nineteenth century and gold and silver mines and transatlantic railroads. They are continually building into the heart of the mountains, and thence to the Pacific coast, and so the streams of traffic flow to Denver's busy marts, all of which makes way for Secularism; for the more noble this world becomes, the less desire there is for the New Jerusalem, where railroads never boom and corner lots never go up.

It is a pleasure to strike Denver. Everything is on the go. The mountain atmosphere is brilliant, exhilarating. It keeps one awake. Again we greet our friends. We lecture on Sunday evening at the Rink to a large audience. Thos. J. Truss, president of the Union, introduces us. Z. Shed, John G. Jenkins, Charles Roth, John D. Capless, H. E. Hurlburt, A. H. Weber, and families Alexander, the Smiths, and the Campbells, Richard F. Day, of Alamosa, Mueller, and others who hav already been enrolled in the News and Notes of former campaigns, are present. I gave a lecture on "The Ideal Republic," which amid the conflicts of to-day shines in the future—the goal of all our struggles.

I was glad that Dr. York had aroused such interest here with his eloquent addresses, which made our own way easier and brighter.

We only wish we could stay longer at Denver among its genial people. This is a most important point in the center of the continent, a magnificent city indeed, where industry, and art, and wealth, and power concentrate, and where side by side with the churches must stand our temple of humanity.

Over the vast plains of Colorado, the mountains sinking into the glowing distance, into the Republican Valley dotted with handsome villages, through the billowy prairie lands of southern Nebraska, over the muddy stream of the vast Missouri which looks resplendent in the golden twilight which makes even its sand-banks glitter with pomp, into Iowa where autumn's glories greet with varied ranks, to Shenendoah we speed, where we find a brief resting-place in the home of H. S. Holcomb, and we expect to close our twenty thousand miles of travel and lecturing here next Sunday afternoon and evening, and the prospects are that we shall hav a happy and successful ending to our year's work. With the Congress new fields will open for the future. I shall immediately arrange to return to the Pacific coast, and continue the campaign there and also in the states of the interior.

Reynolds on His Western Tour.

CENTRALIA, ILL., Sept. 23d, 24th.—An increase of attendance marked each night. Mr. Gilbert Williams, who came fourteen miles to hear the first lecture, returned home that night on horseback, and on Friday evening brought his entire family, a goodly wagon-load of true Liberals, and on Saturday evening not alone came with all his own family, but induced quite a number of others to accompany him. A very great interest was awakened at Centralia, and it was much regretted that I could not remain over Sunday. I was most kindly entertained by Mr. Fayette Rexford. He keeps the Centralia House at the railroad depot, and travelers will do well to make a note of it. Mr. Rexford is one of the very few men in southern Illinois who know how to keep a hotel. He is a gentleman of culture, deep thought, high principle, and of course greatly respected. He can be relied on as ever ready to help in every good work. I had a most pleasant and instructiv interview with Dr. G. W. Dibble, the dentist, a veteran Infidel. He writes me in regard to "Life's Duties and What Liberalism Teaches:" "I wish you every success in this great and good cause. For twenty years I hav declared to Christian friends that the purest and holiest religion the world ever saw would grow out of the teachings of so-called Infidels, and now it is proved that I was right." I desire to thank all the many friends of Centralia and vicinity for their cordial welcome, hearty good wishes for my success on my long tour, and for their earnest desire that I should return to them. I shall rejoice to do so.

BELLEVILLE, ILL., Sept. 25th.—This is a German town, and so far as keeping open stores and beer saloons on Sunday, they are decidedly liberal. Belleville was excited over the great rally of the G. A. R. at St. Louis, and had no thought or care for Liberal lectures. Doubtless a German speaker would hav been more acceptable. My first inquiry when I am told how many Liberals there are in a place is, How many take Liberal papers? and I find this a sure gage. Cash-in-advance subscribers to Liberal papers are eager to do all in their power to advance the best interests of their fellow-creatures; those in arrears are generally lukewarm or indifferent; and those who do not subscribe for any Liberal paper can generally be depended on to prove the embodiment of selfishness. I would make no charge to deliver the funeral oration over a hecatomb of such. I hav been most kindly and hospitably received in Illinois, and shall be glad to comply with the many urgent requests to come again. But I do not find everything and everyone perfection. It is not all roseate.

I do not like prairie country; it is wearisome in its monotony, and compares very unfavorably with New York or Michigan. The majority of the farms are very large, but look dreadful shiftless. Farmers evince a desire to overreach, to spread their efforts over too large an area. One quarter as much land thoroughly worked would giv much more satisfactory returns. The men hav a weary, discouraged, worn-out look. The farmers' wives and daughters are outrageously overworked, and lack that ruddy glow of health and bright vivacity that tells of happy or contented life. Of course, allowances must be made for the fact that I saw Illinois under disadvantages. For three years past crops hav been light; this year the drouth made sad havoc. I passed acres and acres of corn, miserable little spindle stuff that scarce would yield even nubbins; immense fields of cabbage, with not one head worth cutting. Potatoes they grow small over here; but, for that matter, so they do this year clear from here to Lake Ontario, and sell from $1 to $1 25 per bushel. Cattle are poor, and very many farmers hav had to sell at fearful loss; no pasture and no water. For the last five days it has rained, and prairie mud abounds—the blackest, stickiest, dirtiest mud ever made. If God had made man of prairie mud, he could only hav been the blackest of black negroes. Prairie mud clogs and clings like snow. Horseback is the only possible locomotion. On many farms, if sickness or accident occurred, it would be impossible even with the strongest horse to go two miles for a doctor. Most of the roads in farming districts are mere wagon tracks. The villages are laid out nicely—long, wide streets and a park—but it is dreadful discouraging to find them all alike. Look up or down street, and it's the same view—you gaze clear away off into nowhere. The hotels are, with few very rare exceptions, execrable; the charges are exorbitant and extortionate. The St. Nicholas of Springfield is a glorious exception. It is really the very best hotel between here and New York, first-class in every particular. The New Windsor of Bloomington has a stately, imposing exterior, but it is misnamed; it should be called, instead of New Windsor, the "Old Misery."

MINIER, ILL., Oct. 1st, 2d, 3d.—This place is about the center of the state, and seems the center of intelligence. The best people of this town are Liberals. I was greeted by a hall filled with ladies and gentlemen on Saturday evening comprising the best citizens of the place, and as I unfolded life's duties, and what Liberalism teaches, it seemed to enkindle enthusiasm. Every point was appreciated. Sunday afternoon, bright with sunshine, there was a very large attendance. I distributed a very large quantity of Liberal literature. Friends came from Mason City. I hav agreed to go from here to Havana on Tuesday, the 4th inst. Sunday evening, an hour after the afternoon lecture, the heavens were black, and suddenly rain descended in a juvenil deluge. I feared it would put a damper on the evening lecture, but at 7 o'clock it held up. The Lord is always good to me because I never bother him or dictate to him about things, and despite damp and mud a large number of ladies were present. The hall was comfortably filled, while neither of the churches, I am informed, had a corporal's guard.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—I hav received a great number of requests for lectures since my route was decided, and time assigned. Will friends kindly look over the list of appointments? I am very desirous that every date should be filled, but application should be made as soon as possible. Especially I solicit those I hav written to to reply; to write even if they decline, so that I may giv the time elsewhere. My appointments are: Westfield, Ill., Oct. 5th, 6th, 7th; Tuscola, 8th, 9th, 10th; Olney, 12th, 13th, 14th; Chicago (Congress), 15th, 16th; Kewanee, 19th, 20th, 21st; Nunda, 23d; Newton, Ia., 28th; Des Moines, 30th.

Missouri: Hopkins, Graham, Burlington Junction, Bethany, Jamesport, Chillicothe, Brunswick, Kansas City, Clinton, Nov. 29th, 30th, Dec. 1st; Springfield, Liberal, Carthage, Joplin, Neosho, Dec. 17th, 18th, 19th.

Kansas: Galena, Dec. 25th; Columbus, Cherokee, Parsons, Osage Mission, Burlington, Fall River, Leon, Augusta, Andover, Wichita, Benton, Sterling, Dodge City, Jan. 22d, 23d.

Colorado: Canyon City, Jan. 29th; Florence, Colorado Springs, Elizabeth, Denver, Golden, Canfield, Erie, Longmont, Greeley, Dumont, Georgetown, Leadville, Salida, Garfield, Romley, Gunnison, Montrose, Grand Junction, Mar. 6th, 7th, 8th; thence to Utah, Nevada, California.

Immediate application for vacant dates from places reasonably near will insure lectures.

C. B. Reynolds.

For Mrs. Slenker.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Since my last report in The Truth Seeker of July 23d, I hav received for Mrs. Slenker's Defense Fund the following sums:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Thomas Goddard | $2.00 | C. Korhne | $ 50 |
| J. H. Bush | 1.00 | Wm. Seville | 50 |
| H. Augier | 1.00 | J. B. Schnellar | 1.00 |
| Elijah Clark | 1.00 | Charles Augustus | 25 |
| John Steves | 1.00 | Urban Hartung | 50 |
| Scott Monteath | 50 | B. Salinger | 25 |
| Ed. Messenger | 50 | F. S. Montgomery | 25 |
| W. H. Holtschnieder | 1.40 | C. C. Holenback | 25 |
| H. M. Lyndall | 25 | J. Osborne | 1.00 |
| L. Seville | 50 | Mrs. M. A. T. Steeper | 1.00 |
| R. H. Ralston | 50 | C. Fannie Allyn | 50 |
| Sam. Iglich | 25 | O. H. Jacobs | 50 |
| Geo. J. Ladon | 25 | C. A. Starr | 50 |
| Odumar K. Theobald | 50 | J. W. Stewart | 50 |
| Wm. P. Midas | 50 | C. Koehne | 25 |
| David Hood | 50 | T. E. Blesich | 1.00 |
| Wm. Powell | 1.00 | Samuel Goodman | 1.00 |
| J. V. Stanton, M.D | 2.00 | Jos. Simpson | 25 |
| Flora W. Fox | 2 00 | Frank Frederich | 50 |
| Oliver Hoyt | 1.00 | C. R. Kelly | 10 |
| E. R. Evans | 50 | J. B. Chochran | 50 |
| Stephen Bailey | 50 | Jas. T. Auchenfangs | 25 |
| P. M. Gideon | 1.00 | | |

I take this occasion to say that I am also in receipt of a great number of letters—so many that I hav not been able to undertake answering them—some elegantly written and couched in scholarly language, others plainly written and manifestly from obscure people, and many from persons whose names are well known in reformatory work of various kinds; all indicating earnest interest in the work Elmina has done, and expressing abhorrence of the outrage by which the enemies of free speech hope to quench thought, discourage investigation, limit knowledge, and make the United States mails a detectiv agency more oppressiv than the secret system of the Russian police. These letters will be very helpful, and I am grateful for the moral support and strength they furnish.

Yours sincerely,

Ed. W. Chamberlain, Treas. N. D. A.

The Fanaticism of Infidels and Infidelity of Fanaticism.

Infidelity, in theologic lingo, is but a cant word, which unbelievers in a certain cant repeat of themselvs in mere defiance; but fanaticism, implying blind partisanship or hostility, is mischievous, irrespectiv of the fanatic's opinions; and fanatics are really unfaithful to the cause of mental emancipation when by injudicious zeal they provoke persecution. That our enemy may be wrong about some things does not make it just to wrong him about others.

The idolatry of a fabled Christ is no excuse for vilifying the Jesus of the legend. This is not merely an esthetic question, like the character of Hamlet, though that of Jesus be as problematic; it is a question of social policy, involving the relations of labor and capital.

Apart from his communism, or besides this, the traditional Jesus is the tribune representativ of the poor, and of the masses who, undisciplined in reasoning, hav their faith. This faith has passivly concurred in the persecutions of science and of Freethought by the church. A respit has occurred; but symptoms of reaction threaten. Is it wise, by gratuitous insult, to provoke it anew? The persecuting spirit is rife as ever. The hanging of men for blasphemy against capitalism, hypocritically masked by proofless accusations of bomb-throwing, attests this, and the church makes common cause with the capitalist persecutors. Even the Unitarian does—witness the organ called Unity at Chicago—and this while allowing the absence of any proof of crime, as well as nobility of character in the condemned. In the actual phase of civilization, the economic problem of distribution, and the attitude of the rich toward the poor, or of the employer and employee toward each other, dominate the moral world, and differences of doctrin, even so great as between the ethical societies and hard-shell Baptists, are mere fashions of verbiage and ceremonial.

The functional activity of brain cells in the emotional tract specifically religious is about the same for all sorts of religionists and anti-religionists, differing only in degrees, just as the neighboring tract, which belongs to amusement, may be equally satisfied by performances at low sensational theaters or at the grand opera. Conscience for the conduct of life stands aloof. I am not alone among Freethinkers in appreciating the expediency of moderation and of fairness toward adversaries. I welcome with sympathy the kindred views of Mr. T. E. Longshore in The Truth Seeker of September 3d. Its practical bearing is as sensible for the safety as for the success of Liberal propagandists. "To convert, not condemn; to save, not abandon, the erring, is the true wisdom and benevolence of the higher type of men."

Edgeworth.

How Should Liberals Vote?

The above question might be answered briefly by saying that Liberals should always vote for principles which are right and just, and against principles which are wrong and unjust. They should vote in favor of the natural rights of all, and against all laws which grant favors to some by depriving others of their natural rights. Liberals should vote for just principles even if it should seem that they as individuals might lose by the triumph of such principles. Liberals should hav such strong faith in the goodness of justice as to prefer it to injustice at any cost to themselvs.

But let us proceed to inquire how Liberals should vote at the approaching election. There are at least four parties in the field—the Republican, the Democratic, the United Labor, and the Prohibition. Only one of these parties will ever assist Liberals in securing any one of their Demands. The United Labor party will assist in securing the taxation of church property. The new method of taxation advocated by that party presents the only feasible scheme of accomplishing this result. To tax churches under our present system would be wrong. The fact that churches should be taxed as much as private dwellings proves nothing, for Henry George has proved that it is wrong to tax private dwellings. Our whole system of taxation is wrong, unjust, and infamous. Liberals should vote against it.

Our present system of taxation ignores the distinction between the two kinds of things, natural things and things which are brought into existence by human labor. Natural things, not being the result of human labor, should belong as much to one person as to another; and things which belong as much to one person as to another we call public things. We speak of public roads, public lands, public schools, etc., and we mean by this that these things belong as much to one person as to another. Our unjust laws hav taken from the public nearly everything belonging to them, the lands, the mines, etc., and given it and sold it to private individuals. But, whatever the laws of unjust Congressmen and senators may affirm, the law of nature will forever declare that all men hav equal rights to all natural things, and therefore, according to the great law of nature, natural things will forever be public things. Lawmakers hav no more right to change this law than they hav to pass a law permitting slavery or cannibalism.

Natural things are, and forever must be, public things, and therefore it is perfectly right that the public should derive a revenue from its own things. It is perfectly right that the public should charge the private citizen whatever is right for the use of those things. It is perfectly right that the public should tax those things. The public has as much right to tax public things as private individuals hav to tax private things, and no person denies the right of a private individual to charge for the use of his things.

The other kind of things are the products of labor. They may be public, or they may not. Our schoolhouses, custom-houses, legislativ buildings, and postoffice buildings are public because they are built by public money and used for public purposes. But our dwellings, our shops, our offices, and, in this country, our churches, are not public because they are not built with public money, and are not used for public purposes. It therefore cannot be shown that the public has any more right to derive a revenue from these things which are private property than that a private individual has a right to derive a revenue from public property, or from private property belonging to some other person. The public should derive their revenues from public property, and private individuals should derive their revenues from their own private property.

Labor is the only thing which can giv the right of private ownership. The man who has produced anything by his own labor can lay his hand upon it and claim it as his own against the world, because he can say that the thing would not hav existed but for his labor. By appropriating the fruits of his own toil he takes nothing from anyone else which would hav existed but for his own labor, and he therefore impoverishes no person. But he who appropriates any natural thing does take from others what might hav been theirs but for him.

For this reason the public has no right to tax church buildings. The United Labor party will not only refuse to tax church buildings, but they will refuse to tax any of the products of labor. They will refuse to derive a public revenue from property which does not belong to the public. But they are pledged to collect all public revenues for the benefit of the public, and will therefore tax the land upon which churches stand the same as all other lands.

Liberals should be satisfied with this method of settling the question. Under the action of this law churches would cease to grow enormously rich, as many of them do now, by the rise of land. They would gradually move their churches off of land needed for business purposes and onto cheap land. This would be a great improvement. The clatter of their bells would not annoy so many people and they would not interfere so much with business.

The tax on such land as churches would need would not be high, and they would not hav to buy lots, as they often do now, as lots would be found free to any who would pay the taxes on them.

Now, suppose the United Labor party does not agree to grant the Nine Demands of Liberals, if they come forward advocating a great principle of right the Liberals should support them, even if that principle of right was not demanded by the Liberals. The Liberals ought to demand every principle of right, and they ought to assist any party in securing any principles of right. For these reasons, I believe all Liberals should support the United Labor party.

In the contests between scientists and theologians it has long been apparent that the theologians are steadily receding. The time was, two or three hundred years ago, when fearless scientists were imprisoned or burnt by theologians. Now, the scientists who lead the age treat theology with contempt, and the press sustains them. Meanwhile, scientific skepticism is invading the pulpit, and all that distinguishes the Bible from any treatis on moral philosophy is gradually being surrendered by leading theologians; they are losing religion as well as theology. —Buchanan's Journal of Man.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. Bell will lecture in Kansas during November. Parties wishing to engage him for lectures can address him at 302 State street, Chicago, Ill.

Dr. J. L. York will speak in Paine Hall, Boston, on the 16th and 23d; at Buffalo, N. Y., the 30th; Pittsburgh, Pa, Nov. 6th and 13th; Kent, O., Nov. 19th, 20th, and 21st; Denver, Col., Nov. 27th.

Mrs. H. S. Lake speaks at Norwich, Conn., the Sundays of October; at the Spiritual Temple, Boston, the Sundays of November; at Berkley Hall, Boston, the Sundays of December; at Salem, Mass., the first, second, and fifth Sundays of January; at Lynn, Mass., the third and fourth Sundays of January. She is reëngaged by the First Spiritual Society of Philadelphia for the Sundays of April. Her open dates are the Sundays of February, March, May, and June, as also all week evenings. Address, during October, 50 Washington street, Norwich, Conn.

The annual convention of the Secularists and Freethinkers of Canada will be held in Toronto on Saturday and Sunday, October 29th and 30th, in Science Hall, under the auspices of the Canadian Secular Union. The prospects for Secularism were never more encouraging. This will be the most important convention ever held in Canada. The coöperation of every Secularist and Freethinker is needed to promote our common cause. All who sympathize with our principles are urgently invited to attend, whether they belong to our organization or not. Further particulars will be given in due time. By order of the Central Executiv, Wm. Algie, Alton, Ont., President; J. A. Risser, Toronto, Secretary.

We were in error in saying last week that Dr. York would speak before the Manhattan Liberal Club on the 7th inst. This error, however, was no fault of ours. In making up the list of lectures for October Dr. York was offered, through us, the 14th inst. At the same time Mr. Henry Nichols was offered the 7th. Dr. York could not be here the 14th, and afterward it occurred to Dr. Foote, Jr., that Mr. Nichols might be willing to allow Dr. York to speak on the 7th, and he wrote us to offer the doctor that date, which he did, and which was accepted by Dr. York. But Mr. Nichols refused to extend this courtesy to the pilgrim from the West, and insisted that the Club should hear Mr. Nichols, as per program. Inasmuch as Nichols resides here, and can talk any time—and, in fact, as most people think, talking more than is wise or prudent for one of limited capacity to impart instruction—his conduct will bear the construction of boorishness which some hav put upon it.

Religion and Its Origin.

Tell me not of religion shadowed by the incomprehensible. Tell me not of religion the gift of a designing God. Tell me not of a religion having power to perfect our human nature. Tell me not of a religion of humanity. Tell me not that any religion is fundamental in our human nature. Every gesture religions hav made, as they shake their bloody hands, stands up in denial that any of these definitions of religion as given are true. Religions when released from these unnatural robes of mystery are capable of being defined so that the terms of the definition are clearly understandable. I will hazard the following definition, hoping that the kind reader will withhold judgment until he arrives at the end of this paper: Religion is a mental disease, and it has arisen in the genesis of evolution like many other diseases. I am of the opinion that, if this definition of religion is sustained, it will explain the religious history of this world, in harmony with facts, as it never has been done. It is impossible to believe for a moment that religious history can be explained in the light of a divine origin, or in the light of the inscrutable, the incomprehensible; neither is it possible to find an explanation in anything that is fundamental in human nature, but with our definition we hav a key to religious history and its philosophy. Its origin becomes quite obvious if our definition is true. And the evolutionist will find no difficulty in answering the question as to the origin of religion in accepting this definition. And the moralist will, by doing the same, find a reasonable apology for the otherwise unaccountable facts in the religious history of our race. If the terms in religious history mean anything, the moralist must ever feel that the difficulties which encumber his endeavors to render that history reasonable are immense. The advantage here offered to him is a result of viewing the facts of the universe in harmony, without limitations. Definitions rendered upon this basis make the universe real and thinkable. Allow me here to say, in our definition of religion no disrespect in any sense is intended to the religious devotees. Our humanity, under the influence of many religions, deserves pity more than censure. We cannot feel a sentiment of hate or disrespect to the man or woman born with a marked tendency toward tuberculosis. No more can we feel a sentiment of hate or disrespect toward religious devotees. But what is the origion of religion? In the answer given to this question it will more fully appear what our meaning of religion is. Before this question can be answered, it is quite necessary that we should consider a fundamental distinction. For some reason, man has had assigned to him an eminent distinction, which places him at the head of the universe. Evolution can assign to him no other position than this preëminent one. That is to say, when compared with any other structure, or all others, he is high above all. Beyond man we hav Mr. Spencer's inscrutable Unknowable; but we are unable to institute any comparison between the scrutable and inscrutable, and hence we must decide in favor of the one we know, and not the one we do not know, and hence we plead justification in placing man at the head of this universe.

Man is so clearly differentiated from all structures that, in considering him, we are to note what there is in him which renders him worthy of this eminent distinction. We are impressed with the idea that there are certain things which are fundamental to him, without which he would not, could not, be what he is. These things which are fundamental to him are to be considered in attaining his quantitativ and qualitativ value. To leave out anything fundamental to him would cost him his place, and his distinctiv eminence would at once be compromised. Whether we are competent to point out all that is fundamental to him or not, it is nevertheless true that certain qualities and quantities, or attributes, are so related to what he is necessarily, that, to leave out any of them, he would cease to be the human being that he is. There are three attributes without which he would not be human. These are strictly fundamental. There is no being in the universe having these three attributes coördinated in self-consciousness with the power of introspection. All animal structures are doubtless represented in the human. Thought, feeling, and volition in subordinate forms exist in the lower structures, but the why that man is human, and all others are not, is because of the fact that these attributes, thinking, feeling, and willing, are in their coördination in consciousness above all other forms, and these are fundamental in man—any of these left out, he would not be human—hence, again, all human beings must hav that which is fundamental to humanity. That which is fundamental in one human being must, necessarily, be fundamental in all human beings. The wide differences seen in the study of tribal and national life is due to the accidents of time and place. Yet in the presence of this marked difference, a critical and an exhaustiv analysis of one human being, as to what is fundamental to him, would equally be an exhaustiv treatis of the entire race. That is to say, the differences are consequent upon difference in circumstances—environments. Strike out change in the history of man, and history becomes impossible. Yet in spite of change, he, as man, is fundamentally what he is. It is the changed environment which makes human history. This brings into view the fundamental and the incidental side of man. For want of this distinction between what is fundamental and incidental to man, the greatest difficulty has arisen. Differences among human beings are expressed by the terms might or might not hav been. Contingencies belong only to that side of man's history where he, and hence his history, might hav been otherwise than as it is. The other side of human character which never changes is due to that which is fundamental, and the other is due to that which is incidental—that which might or might not hav been.

Any of the incidentals, to be or not to be, make no difference as to what is fundamental to man. They make no changes in human nature. They render the chances for its expression favorable or unfavorable. Favorable environments make good men, unfavorable make men bad; in either case subject to slight modifications, owing to the fact that the man is a factor in the chain of environments, yet so limited is this factor in its potencies that it is hardly safe to pit it against a group of nerves which hav a prior engagement in an opposit direction. We will now sum up our arguments partly in the use of illustration. To think is fundamental (with this left out, the structure, however constructed, would not be human, only on the incidental side), but the how of that thinking is incidental. To feel is fundamental, but the how of feeling is incidental. To will is fundamental, though how we will is quite incidental. Permit us here to say, That on the fundamental side we blend these several facts in consciousness. And here in this blending of these facts we hav rational thinking, and hence the basis of all discrimination, and hence the foundation of right and wrong—the basis of ethical science—morality. In this blending or coördination, we hav gradually evolved art, science, morality, and all that tends to throw around life the inspirations of love, goodness, and kindness. But the question may arise, How does it come to pass, if these attributes are fundamental, and if all things that tend to make this life desirable come of these coördination—how is it that we do not find these things in all men? The obvious answer is, Environments hav not been such as to call forth the manifestation, hence, though fundamental in all, are not seen through a want of essential conditions. This is enough to show the line of thought in relation to the question preferred. We are now to offer our arguments in support of our definition.

Our proposition is that religion is not fundamental in human nature; hence, whenever it exists, it exists only as a possibility of human nature, or, in other words, it is incidental. There are many of the greatest and best of human beings who are without religion. Take any of the accredited definitions of religion, and we find many without it. There are many kinds of religion, and they are so far unlike each other in the light of their respectiv definitions that one does hardly suggest the other. Is it not evident, if religion is fundamental, that there could be one, and only one, and all would hav that one? If all hav religion, where is the unity such as the fundamental would demand? If it is possible for any human being to meet the demands which the environments impose upon him without religion, then it is true that religion is not founded in any needs necessary to the fulfilment of his mission or his destiny. Who is prepared to say that man and woman, without a vestige of religion, are disqualified to reveal all that is good and praiseworthy in human nature; that they are less qualified to manifest the highest qualities of manhood and womanhood as well, at least, as those who are religious? Who will say with open eyes, who will dare to say, that we hav not just as good, true, and noble fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, and husbands; just as good, loving sons and daughters; as good citizens; as reliable, moral, and truthful men and women, without religion, as any in this wide world who are full of it? And if so, then is this thing called religion an absolute verity, essential, fundamental, in human nature? History will not, dare not, commit itself in the affirmativ. Science will never thus answer, nor will philosophy. The immoralities of religion, can they answer in the affirmativ? No, never.

Religion is an accident; it is incidental; it is circumstantial; it might not hav been—and in that event many of the dark pages of history would also not hav been. It is hardly possible to imagin that our humanity has ever been the gainer by the incidents which gave to our world religions. No more is it possible to imagin how this world has been the gainer by this or other mental diseases, and without them we could not arrive at mental science, and that our mental forces, and the millions of nerve fibers through which mental action is manifested, could not be only through mental disorder; that the well-being of our mental selfhood could not fill the high sphere of mental action without a diseased brain. Mental and physical obliquities are well-nigh universal, but who would imagin that they are helps in the attainment of our best? All diseases, mental and physical, are incidental to our natures. They are not needed for our welfare as human beings, but come as the accidents of time and place.

Religion is a mental disease, and only on this account are we able to read and understand its history. Not likely a disease in the low structure in which it first arose, but became such when transmitted to a higher structure. The measles in the low structural form in which it first appeared was not a disease, but when transmitted to a higher structure it became such. Tuberculosis, in the lower structure, was not a disease, but in the higher structural form it has becoms one of the most formidable diseases. Scrofula, whooping-cough, itch, and, in fact, many diseases were harmless in the low forms of organization in which they first came into existence, but when they were transmitted to the higher organized structures, they became harmful. That mental disease, called religion, like the diseases which we hav mentioned, was harmless in the low structural form in which it first arose, but when transmitted to a higher structural form it has become the most formidable of all diseases. So true is this that in the last eighteen hundred years it has slain, in the most heartrending methods, sixty millions of human beings. Remember, too, that this is only what one form of this religious disease has done! No other disease can show such a list of slain in the last eighteen centuries. It is hardly possible, with the fatal work of diseases before us, that any one will maintain that these diseases which are possible to our nature are in any way a necessity, or that they can in any way be made subservient to the interest of human nature. Is it not much more likely that they are, and ever hav been, in the way of the realization of our higher possibilities? The rule of the universe is healthful structure. So eminently true is this that nature ever persists in running off the track those that are sick, and has, at the same time, ever impressed the student of nature with the doctrin of the survival of the fittest. Disease is not the rule of the universe, but health; disease is the exemption, and there is no question as to the fact that mental and physical diseases hav held the race back in its progress for thousands of years. That is to say, that the race is not what it would hav been had it not been for the transmission of conditions in which diseases arose in the higher forms. It, perhaps, hardly admits of a doubt that our ancestral line runs back through a thousand generations, from whence we hav inherited tendencies which stand in the way of realizing intellectual and moral attainments such as would, in all likelihood, hav been attained had it not been for these adverse inherited tendencies in the form of mental and physical diseases. All of these hindrances which are in our way are only possible to our nature, but in no way necessary or fundamental, and hence our highest aim or end is attained with much greater ease through coördination of environments free from these drawbacks. This is so evidently true that the reverse of this has not the dignity of a hypothesis.

The pathological student of diseases has never disclosed that there is utility or design in disease. Disease is any morbid state in general. It implies a change of structure as distinguished from disorder of function in particular. Disease is any deviation from the normal completeness, or any breaking up of the coördinated parts which compose the structure. There is no mental disease dissociated from structure; if there is, I am ignorant of the same. Mental diseases are usually identified with some abnormality of structure. A morbid state may giv rise to mental disease, and so mental action, superinduced by great sorrow or disappointment, may giv rise to like disorder. In fact, in numerous ways groups of nerves may be involved, upon which mental action depends to such an extent that loss of nerve element, degradation of nerve cells, will take place, and disordered mental action will be the result. A wide diversity of character is seen in the presence of mental disorder in any retreat where the poor unfortunates are treated. The mode of disordered action will reveal to us in the study of the insane something as to the cause of their insanity. In fact, perhaps it is not saying too much, when we say that sanity in all things is not the rule. The adverse incidentals of life hav in a measure rendered sanity in all things quite improbable. Doubtless, it often exists when even the expert does not detect it. Among criminals it exists to a great extent; and many are punished for crimes when a correct mental diagnosis would hav shown unconscious cerebration was the criminal, and not consciously premeditated crime. So shaded are mental diseases on the brink of sanity that their detection is not always possible. And so it comes to pass that we call people eccentric, when, in fact, they are a little off, if not really insane, on certain points. There are certain rules which enable the critical observer to settle the question with a reasonable amount of certainty, though there are no rules which will come to our aid by which we can always detect those that are insane. When we detect our fellow-men in doing certain things, we conclude at once that they are insane in part, at least.

The Meanness and Hypocrisy of Philadelphia.

Last month the city of Philadelphia undertook to celebrate what so many editors and speakers there and elsewhere called the centennial of the adoption of the national Constitution. The prematureness of the proceeding may easily be seen by reading the history of the great document, lying open, as it does, before every eye. As in a convention in our day called to consider some specific subject, a committee raised for the purpose reports a series of resolutions to be discussed, and finally adopted or rejected by the meeting, so the Constitutional Convention, appointed by the states of the Confederation to meet on the 14th of May, 1787, in Philadelphia, reported through their president, George Washington, on the 17th of September of the same year, that they had performed the duty assigned them, and had drafted the form of a national Constitution and of a republican government under it, and recommended that it be submitted to the people of the Confederated States for their consideration, adoption, or rejection. The Congress, approving of the recommendation of the convention, took immediate steps to lay the draft before the people of the states, declaring in the act that, when nine out of the thirteen states had adopted it, further steps would be taken toward the organization of a government. Only three states, Delaware, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, had adopted the Constitution in 1787, but enough more in the succeeding year had done so to justify the Congress in ordering an election for presidential electors to be held in January, 1788. In the next month, the electors chosen assembled in their respectiv states and voted, and in due time, on counting the votes, it was ascertained that George Washington, of Virginia, was elected president, and John Adams, of Massachusetts, vice-president, of the United States. In the following March, 1789, the proceedings commenced under the Constitution by the meeting of the senators and representativs in Congress from the eleven states which had ratified the Constitution. On the 21st of April following, John Adams took his seat as president of the senate, and on the 30th of that month Washington took the oath of office as president of the United States, administered to him by the chancellor of New York.

Thus, the wheels of the national government under the Constitution, in contradistinction to the confederation of independent states under its "articles," began to revolve in the city of New York; and the two states which had stood out adopted the Constitution as their sister states had done—North Carolina in November, 1789, and Rhode Island in May, 1790—and came into and perfected the Union. The birth of the nation took place at Philadelphia in 1776; but the birth of the government of the United States under the Constitution occurred at New York in 1789; and by right the centennial of that event should be celebrated there. The mere drafting of the Constitution by the convention appointed for the purpose was no very great event. It was an intermediary step. The adoption of the Constitution, and the beginning of the government under the administration of Washington, was an era second in importance only to the Declaration of Independence; and, as these events occurred in New York, the observance of their centennial falls appropriately to the people of that city. But Philadelphia, wishing to monopolize all the honors and to promote her own aggrandizement, greedily and prematurely seized upon the convention's report of a draft of the Constitution on the 17th of September, 1787, and allowed the people to believe that they were celebrating the adoption of that instrument by the states. Even President Cleveland, who might hav been expected to hav an accurate knowledge of the constitutional history of the government he is administering, seemed dazed in the speech he made on the occasion.

But I took up my pen to call attention to the gross incongruity of the arrangements at Philadelphia whereby Bishop Potter, of New York, was made to open the proceedings with a prayer, and Cardinal Gibbons to close them with another. Now, there are three things which made this interjection of religious forms not only incongruous in itself, but an outrageous insult to the memory of the man who framed the national Constitution, which the crowd were pretending to glorify. The first is that the Constitution was a purely secular document. The name of God does not occur in it from beginning to end. There is no recognition of any religion, or of any other world than the one we liv in. It has no religious test for citizenship or office whatever. A nativ-born Jew or Mohammedan is eligible to any office, from president down to tide-waiter.

Secondly, the convention that passed this wonderful Constitution of government began its sessions on the 14th of May, and adjourned on the 17th of September, and not a prayer, nor any other religious act, was ever performed, from the beginning to the end of that time. The instrument they drafted was the production of the human intellect alone, without any supernatural help, or any application for such help in the mummery called prayer. What the Quakers call "the weight of the meeting" was, in that convention, thoroughly and notoriously Infidel; that is, deistical, believing in a God who has the general superintendence of the universe, but disbelieving entirely in the Christian religion. To be sure, when a Dutch dominie in New York expressed his surprise to Alexander Hamilton that the Constitution contained no recognition of God, or the Christian religion, he was told by this great man: "We forgot it." But this was a pious fraud on the part of Hamilton. He knew full well that on these points the convention remembered to forget. They knew, from the history of European governments, that the thing called religion was a Pandora's box, full of incurable mischiefs; or, as we would say in our times, a dynamite bomb, which, from the friction of events, would be sure to explode, and scatter ruin round about; and therefore they gave it no countenance in the Constitution.

Thirdly, during the administration of Washington, the government made a declaratory announcement, in the 11th Article of its treaty with Tripoli, one of the Barbary powers, that "in no sense is the government of the United States founded on the Christian religion." It is founded on the Constitution, and this is a purely secular instrument. This is its grand peculiarity, and explains the reason why the government has made such an advance in the wealth and happiness of the people. It is neither for, nor against, any religion that now exists, or ever did exist, but ignores them all. Knowing that the conflicting definitions of God, and the interpretations of his will, given by the different sects of Christendom, and backed up by the governments they influenced, hav filled the world with enmity and bloodshed, they wisely avoided the subject, but protected every citizen in the enjoyment of his opinion concerning religion, whatever it might be.

It was, therefore, grossly improper for the Philadelphians of this day to put contempt, as they did, on the solemn convictions of the men who framed an entirely secular Constitution of government, the wisdom of which a century of trial has proved. There are scores of Christian sects in the country, and all of them more or less antagonistic to each other. If the Constitution had recognized, and patronized, any one of them, to the exclusion of the rest, as the various governments of Europe hav done, it is easy to see that the time of the government would be mainly taken up in the solemn nonsense of what is called honoring God, and attending to the interests of another world, concerning both of which subjects we know positivly nothing at all, however much we may speculate upon them.

But, even granting that there might be a distant propriety in celebrating with religious forms the praises of a Constitution which has not the word God in it, the choice of a Protestant Episcopal bishop, and a popish cardinal, both dressed up in their robes of office, to do the praying on the occasion, was an insult to all the other sects in the country. If we examin the church statistics of the Revolutionary period, it will appear that the Congregationalists numbered 575 ministers and 700 churches; the Baptists, 370 ministers and 400 churches; the Presbyterians, 140 ministers and 300 churches; and the Catholics 6 priests and 6 churches. The Methodists, now so numerous, were just beginning their existence as a sect, numbering only 20 ministers and as many churches, whose sympathies in the Revolutionary struggle were all with the British king. If the Rev. Dr. Duchêt, an eminent Episcopal minister who was chaplain to Congress in 1776, was a sample of the patriotism of his church, we cannot estimate it very highly; for when the tug of war came on, he lost confidence in the cause of independence, and in 1777 addressed a letter to Washington, then in the field, in which he dwelt upon the hopelessness of resistance to the British crown, and urged him to lay down his arms, disband his troops, and return to his allegiance. Washington was so exasperated at his Toryism that he transmitted the letter to Congress, and Duchêt having in the mean time fled to England, his estate was confiscated as that of a traitor. The Episcopalians were Church of England Christians, and it is not so wonderful that their zeal for the success of the Revolutionary army sometimes took cold. The patriots of the Revolution who fought its battles, and endured its unspeakable trials and privations, were neither Catholics nor Episcopalians. They were Congregationalists and Presbyterians, some Lutherans, and Baptists of the Roger Williams stripe. Where, then, was the propriety of passing by the descendants of all these patriotic sects, and choosing the "heads" of the two fuss-and-feathers denominations to take part in the hypocritical business of glorifying a secular Constitution? The Church of England has always been on the side of monarchy. It dovetails with, and fits, the empty pomp of hereditary government; and, as Macaulay says, it has never been known to be, even by accident, on the side of the people's rights. The Catholic church, of which Cardinal Gibbons is the American "head," as Bishop Potter is of the Anglican church, has been for a thousand years, now is, and forever will be, the sworn and avowed enemy of the people's rights and liberties, and in league with monarchy. Although Ireland has always been devotedly Catholic, the pope has secretly sided with England, a heretical power, in trampling the people and their political and civil rights into the dust.

And yet the committee of arrangements at Philadelphia, when they wanted to distinguish their celebration with religious exercises, passed by all the sects from Maine to Georgia whose patriotic ancestors had sacrificed their lives and fortunes during a seven years' war, to preserve the life of the nation and make the Constitution possible, and conferred the honor of officiating in that capacity upon the "heads" of the two sects whose history proves them to hav been always opposed to the fundamental principles of a republican government! I repeat it, it was not only an insult to the memory of the framers of our secular Constitution, but to all the Protestant sects of the country whose fathers were loyal to the cause of human rights in the times that tried men's souls.

However, when we come to think of it, Philadelphia may enjoy the unenviable distinction of being disgracefully consistent in her mean conduct. She accepted the trust from the executors of Stephen Girard respecting the college he founded for educating the orphans of that city, and agreed, by their acceptance of it, to carry out the provisions of the will in which he says: "I enjoin and require that no ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect whatever, shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatever in the said college; nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises appropriated to the purposes of the said college." But this attempt to protect the minds of his orphan beneficiaries against the wiles of religious bigots was all in vain, for the bones of the noble philanthropist had not turned into dust before the authorities violated this express provision, did the very thing they were enjoined and required not to do, and the very thing they pledged themselvs not to do. Girard College is now, and has been for years, under ecclesiastical influence, and sectarian religion is sung into, and preached into, "the tender minds of the orphans" by as unscrupulous a set of Jesuits as the world ever saw. "Ecclesiastics, missionaries, and ministers" visit the place at their will, and the will of Girard is treated with contempt.

During the Centennial Exhibition in 1876, Philadelphia shut the doors on Sunday against the mechanics and workingmen who could visit the place on no other day of the week, on the hypocritical pretense that it would be a violation of the Sabbath, but they opened the doors to her favorit "dead-heads," who defrauded the treasury of their proper fees. And to cap the climax of her meanness, she refused to allow the statue of the illustrious Thomas Paine a place in Independence Hall among the portraits and memorials of the other founders of the government, because, like his Revolutionary contemporaries, he could not believe in the plenary inspiration of the volume called the Bible!

Mortgaged Farms in the West.

While traveling in Michigan lately the editor of the Christian Advocate made, he says, inquiries about the farms. This is the knowledge he acquired: "I found that most of them were heavily mortgaged. Persons who lend money on farm mortgages often wonder at the rate per cent they get, and the fact that they do not hav to pay anything to the agent who transacts the business. The fact is that the borrower not only pays the per cent which the lender finally receives, but pays all the expenses of transaction, and the commission of the negotiation. From an official of Cheboygan county I received the following, which had come under his personal knowledge. A friend of his desired to borrow $500 to improve his farm. The lawyer procured for him a loan at eight per cent, and he charged him two and one-half per cent for each year that the loan ran. It was a four years' loan; he computed the two and one-half per cent on the $500, making it $12.50 a year, paying over to the borrower $450. Now paying eight per cent per annum on $500, but having received only $450, he practically pays not far from eleven per cent; and has thus far been so oppressed by the interest as to be wholly unable to improve his property or reduce the principal, for he is compelled to work away from home in order to get money for interest." In going to Cleveland, Ohio, the editor fell in with a Republican candidate for office, who told him that "two-thirds of the names on the state ticket of the Republican party were Methodists." Buckley picks up more valuable information when he is traveling than when he is thinking.

Another Southern Outrage.

From the Charlotte Daily Chronicle of to-day I learn that in Rock Hill, S. C., Rev. E. J. Price, a Methodist minister, was, on yesterday, cowhided by J. B. Johnston, for uttering slanderous reports about Johnston's sister. Both parties are white.

TWO THINGS WANTED.

First. We want some money from every friend who owes on his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The balance in the bank from which to draw to satisfy the paper manufacturers and the printer is very small, and we must increase it, or run in debt. There are many hundreds of dollars owing us by subscribers, and we desire to kindly but firmly call their attention to the matter. We need the money, and it is not right for them to keep it from us. We would also respectfully suggest to those whose subscriptions expire during the present month that now is the time to renew. We would call attention, too, to our club rates. Get a new subscriber, and so get your own paper cheaper.

Second. We once more ask our friends to send us the names of all the Infidels of their acquaintance who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. The intention is to send them sample copies of the paper with the hope that they may subscribe.

Jeremiah and the Reporters.

"But, behold, the false pen of the scribes hath wrought falsely."

We are not certain that lachrymose Jeremiah had the reporters on the daily papers of the nineteenth century in his mind when he said that, but it is the one sentence in all his watery composition bearing internal evidence that he was a prophet.

In the Progressiv Age of Grand Rapids, Mich., a week or two ago we found this:

"Col. Robert G. Ingersoll was the guest of the New England Club, which dined at Young's, in Boston, on the 24th ult. The topic discussed was 'The Anarchists,' and Ingersoll when called on said: 'I do not agree with you who say the Anarchists were convicted and sentenced as they deserve. Few who speak in this manner are willing to look at the case in a generous light. Remember the conditions of their birth. Sir, if I had been a German, surrounded by all the ignorance and bigotry, I should probably hav been the most violent of Anarchists. They are not and cannot be to blame. In their serf-like state it is hard for them to discriminate the nicety of the ends by which they obtain justice. I am always on the side of mercy. I don't believe in damning men for confidence secured by fraud, by breaking and entering a man's private safe, and thus securing evidence with which to secure his conviction.'"

The Age did not giv the source of this paragraph, but it undoubtedly came from some daily paper. The paragraph, however, reads very little like Colonel Ingersoll's rounded periods, and we forwarded it to headquarters for a corrected version, supposing, in the innocence of the editorial heart, that its inaccuracy was due to imperfect reporting, and that in some way Colonel Ingersoll must hav expressed a regret that hanging was deemed necessary to convert the Chicago Anarchists into American citizens. The paragraph was returned with this comment, signed R. G. Ingersoll:

"I never said one word of the above—not one. I do not see how any reporter could hav made up this nonsense."

On reading this, it occurred to us that Jeremiah was right about the scribes, and we agree with him that wise men might easily be dismayed at their mendacity. They are certainly a precious lot, and it would take a body of water bigger than Jeremiah's head, even though both eyes were perennial fountains, to wash away their sins, as Jerusalem and the cities of Judah must hav been spotless compared with them.

But what a joke this is on those journals—the Galveston News, for instance—which hav based on this fabrication editorials long and heavy, prophetically warning and authoritativly rebuking! And how they will enjoy eating such words as these: "Ingersoll appears now to hav become an Anarchist or something akin to one!" And what a pity it is to topple over the religious edifice reared by the religious editors upon Jeremiah's foundations! See the wisdom embodied in the remark of the Galveston News, which is now all wasted: "Mr. Ingersoll speaks plausibly in saying that if he had been surrounded by the same influences as the condemned Anarchists he would hav been a thorough Anarchist himself. There is really nothing in such an observation, except a reminder of the doctrin of circumstances or philosophical necessity." It really is too bad that Colonel Ingersoll did not say what Jeremiah's scribe says he said, for as the matter stands the writers of these leading editorials appear a trifle ridiculous. To relieve their embarrassment, Mr. Ingersoll should say something to justify the deep philosophy underlying this sententious utterance: "And, perhaps, if Mr. Ingersoll had been surrounded by influences which make thieves and other criminals, he would hav been a criminal." When a religious editor gets hold of this philosophical "perhaps" of the News, it will take him about a minute to evolve a statement something like this:

"In a defense of the righteously condemned Chicago Anarchists, Bob Ingersoll said that in his youth he himself was surrounded by bad influences, and therefore he believed in murder, and had, in fact, killed a great many people himself. His only hope now was in Christ."

And every blessed church-member in the country would believe the religious editor, and tell his neighbor that "Bob Ingersoll had confessed to having been a murderer and a horse-thief," and that neighbor would tell the next one that "Bob Ingersoll had just killed his wife and two daughters;" and that neighbor would add, in passing it on, that "Bob Ingersoll had set his house on fire and burnt up all his servants, and was now in jail;" and the other fellow would help the story along, and put on that "Bob Ingersoll had been visited by the Rev. Dr. Talmage, and had become converted to Christianity, and would, if not hanged, become a missionary to Africa." For that is about the way these things grow in the fertil fields of orthodox journalism. Indeed, if we do not see this outlined possibility come back to us, in some Christian journal, as a recital of positiv fact, and THE TRUTH SEEKER, "an Infidel organ," given as authority, we shall be very much surprised. For Jeremiah's scribes are by no means extinct, but flourish apace in the offices of daily papers and weekly religious journals.

A Police Outrage Right Here in New York.

An account of an outrage on the voters of the Progressiv Labor party of this city that will stir the pulses of the whole American people went jumping over the wires late last Saturday night. It occurred in the early evening at Union Square, and consisted of an indiscriminate brutal attack and clubbing of some scores of men by some eighty policemen.

The occasion was the meeting held to ratify the party's nominations, which had been called to be held in the place generally chosen for such purposes, the plaza, or north side of Union Square, where Seventeenth street broadens out into an acreage capable of holding several thousand people. As usual on such occasions, the police were present in force, drawn up in line on the sidewalk of Seventeenth street, under command of Captain Reilly. There were three stands for speakers, and among the orators were T. B. Wakeman, R. J. Hinton, Mr. Shevitch, and others. Around one of the stands about fifty George men clustered, who constantly interrupted the speakers by shouting out, "George! George! Henry George!" One of the Progressiv Labor party's men asked Captain Reilly to stop it. Choosing twenty men from the hundred under his command, he started toward the noisy crowd. The eighty men left followed him, as he claims, without orders, and at once began an indiscriminate attack upon the assemblage, ordering it to disperse. Every man within reach of a club was beaten, and many knocked down. Heads were cut open, shoulders pounded, and arms broken by the heavy clubs. A score of men went home with blood flowing down their faces and over their clothes, and surgeons on the East Side were hunted up and kept busy. Police Commissioner Voorhis was on one of the stands, and when he saw the attack he rushed among his men ordering them back. He was seconded by Captain Reilly, and by grabbing the arms of the infuriated policemen, and shouting out orders, the brutes were finally quieted. While the affair lasted, it was the Chicago Haymarket riot duplicated, and it wanted but a shot or bomb to end in as bloody a tragedy as did that meeting.

The police officials are busy now explaining the conduct of their men. They say the men acted without orders, and probably got a little excited, but on the whole they look upon the matter as a mistake for which an apology ought to be gratefully accepted by the clubbed people as sufficient reparation for the clubbing. The press of the city is unanimous in condemning the outrage as entirely inexcusable, but inclines to the opinion that the police officials are not to blame. But they forget that if it was only a mistake, the fact that such mistakes occur shows the police officials to be unfit to disciplin and command the men who made the mistake.

The truth of the matter is, however, that this antagonism of the authorities to the Socialists was in the air, and bound to come out. The Socialists hav been denounced so much and violently that the police hav come to regard them as the Chicago police regarded the so-called Anarchists—as men who should be looked after, and made to feel the strength of the law. This feeling among the higher police officials has percolated down through the ranks, where it has taken concrete form in a desire to club all Socialists. The average common policeman in New York city is an Irish brute, a vulgar, uneducated ruffian, thoroughly loyal to his Romish religion, and frantically desirous of an opportunity to use his long night club on the heads of the "domned Dutch," who compose the majority of the Socialists. The men who broke loose from such restraint as the captain had over them last Saturday night hold that a policeman's club is the rightful embodiment of law, and the best expression it can take. And as a dog will do that which he thinks will please his master, so these human brutes clubbed the Socialists because they thought public sentiment would sustain them. Every one of them should be imprisoned for felonious assault.

Probably another thing that suggested the clubbing to them, and gave them the idea that their conduct would be applauded, is the indifference manifested over the equally scandalous and inhuman conduct of the Hoboken police, who would not allow a meeting to be held in which the Illinois authorities were to be denounced for their treatment of the Chicago Anarchists. The Hoboken sympathizers with the Western Anarchists had hired a hall, paid for it, and were peaceably making their way thereto, when the Hoboken police stationed themselvs at the door, forbade entrance to the hall, and at once began to club all questioners of their authority. Then they arrested their victims, and the men are now in jail awaiting trial for "inciting riot," when everyone knows and says that the police struck the first, last, and only blows that were struck on the occasion. Possibly the New York police were desirous of also seeing their names in print as heroes who had clubbed the dangerous Anarchists and thereby saved society from complete and sudden destruction.

A law committee of five members of the Progressiv Labor party, with T. B. Wakeman at the head, has been instructed to prosecute the brutal New York policemen, but we hav yet to converse with an intelligent New Yorker who believes that justice will be had in the matter. Possibly one or two policemen, with few friends and only a small "pull," may be dismissed, but most people doubt that even so much will be accomplished. But it is not alone the personal side of the affair that must be considered. The gravest side of this outrage is the spirit manifested by the police, and the general tendency of the legal authorities almost everywhere to interfere with social heretics and by force compel them to be silent. They are pursuing a course sure to lead to trouble. Self-respecting people are not going to be clubbed into silence, either by accident or by design. And when they are so clubbed, if they cannot obtain redress by law, they will take the remedy into their own hands. The Progressiv Labor party voters behaved magnificently under the most wanton provocation that could be offered. They were counseled wisely by their leaders, and not one of them struck a blow. They thus put the entire blame upon the police, and won the sympathies of the public. And in their prosecution of the police the good wishes of order-loving people will be with them. But if any are found who uphold the police in their murderous work, mark them well: they are the enemies of the republic and would welcome a despotism.

The Persecuted Pastor.

While from all of the so-called oppressed classes a cry for deliverance is going up and down, and in various other directions, something should be said in defense of the down-trodden clergy, one of whose dearest privileges bids fair to be snatched, jerked, and otherwise wrested from them. These reflections are instigated at this critical period by the persecution of the Rev. C. W. Millen, Methodist, of Brooklyn. The amount of persecution of this sort directed against ministers of the Methodist church is remarkable, and shows that sectarian jealousy is still perniciously activ.

The foundations and pretexts upon which the charges against Mr. Millen are based are numerous. About a year ago this afflicted and long suffering saint, then occupying the Washington Street Methodist pulpit in Brooklyn, made a pastoral call upon Mrs. William Squire, one of his congregation. Mr. Squire not being present, the reverend gentleman voluntarily offered to assume the burdens of consolation which naturally fall upon the head of a well-regulated family. But his kindness was unappreciated, his offer rejected, and the misguided woman bade him depart, even hastening his going by threatening him with the handle of a broom, so that he reached the street, it is said, by a series of long and dangerous leaps.

Mrs. Squire's unkindness did not cease here. She went before the trustees of the church and entered a complaint of improper conduct on the part of the Rev. Mr. Millen, thereby making the matter public, and the tongue of scandal wagged against him. A day was set for the trial, but ere it came the plot thickened and sorrows accumulated. All the way from Haverhill, Massachusetts, came the story that Mr. Miller had gone out of that town some years ago, leaving his furniture and even much of his clothing behind, and without preaching a farewell sermon to his bereaved congregation. While in the discharge of his pastoral duties, so said the evil report, he had been interrupted by an unbelieving husband and driven out of the place under threats of personal chastisement. The clerical committee had scarcely ceased to weep over the obdurateness of unregenerate husbands when another charge came accusing Pastor Millen of immoral conduct in the parsonage of the De Kalb avenue church, Brooklyn. Also from Boston a voice smote upon their ears saying that while on his vacation in Boston in August last Mr. Millen had been guilty of ministerial excesses. Nor was this all. In Fourteenth street, New York, so said another detractor, the exercise of the clerical function had been misconstrued into wicked conduct, and another charge of immoral tendency was scored against the persecuted pastor, making five in all.

So far has this persecution been advanced by designing persons that the Rev. Mr. Millen is even now on trial before an ecclesiastical tribunal of clerical experts. The Haverhill affair outdating all the rest of the items in the plot, the tribunal has taken that as charge No. 1. An affidavit from Mr. John N. Snow, of Haverhill, deposeth and witnesseth that he, John N. Snow, looking through the window into a room containing the Rev. Mr. Millen and a girl named Nellie, saw that which in the printed affidavit is expressed by a row of asterisks. The Rev. James Pike, Mr. Millen's presiding elder, reluctantly admitted that from what he knew of Mr. Millen he should judge that the charges of the affidavit were not without substantial foundation. So the organized persecution proceeds.

We hav acquired, through a former attendant at Mr. Millen's church, information which may explain the gentleman's conduct to some extent. He is, in fact, a close student of anatomy, and his researches in this direction hav been characterized by great assiduity. Our informant states that the picnics of Mr. Millen's church afforded the reverend scientist his chief opportunities for the prosecution of his discoveries. For this purpose Mr. Millen could be found, so continues our informant, in the vicinity of the swings, in whose pendulous excursions the young women of his flock sought healthful and exhilarating diversion. At such times the pastor, at whatever risk to his person, invariably placed himself immediately beneath the swings, with his gaze turned heavenward, presenting the spectacle of a devout man whose heart was lifted up in silent prayer; whereas he was, in reality, merely in pursuit of material information. This little involuntary deceit might be forgiven Dr. Millen if he could be induced to impart to the tribunal the result of his researches.

On the other hand, according to the source of our information, whenever Dr. Millen attended receptions given by the ladies of his church, his attitude was reversed, and, standing in close proximity to some sister in more than ordinarily full dress, his downcast eyes and masculin hight enabled him, while in the posture of true humility, to still add to his scientific information as in the former instance. Any slight excess of zeal should be pardoned in a person whose aim is the attainment of useful information. It is true that the observer might remark a certain familiarity in the reverend gentleman's manner of laying his hands upon the persons of the ladies. Our informant confesses that he himself on various occasions observed that the Rev. Dr. Millen was unfitted by reason of his religious zeal to mingle in respectable society; and altogether the impression might be formed that a good broad palm, smartly applied to Mr. Millen's cheek, would hav a salutary influence; but such thoughts are immediately smothered by the transcendent reflection that he is a minister merely exercising a prerogativ with which ministers hav been tacitly vested by immemorial usage, and of which, moreover, they hav never been backward in taking advantage. As long as the pastoral call is countenanced, the annual crop of Millens will not be lessened by drouth or flood.

Germans Combining.

The Germans of New York state hav formed a "Personal Liberty League," the main object of which appears to be to secure the opening of the beer saloons from 2 o'clock P.M., on Sundays, till midnight. To that end the leaguers met in convention at Albany last week. The two important articles in the league's constitution are:

"The object of the association is the repeal of obsolete laws which curtail the enjoyment of life, and unwarrantedly restrict the individual liberty of the citizens in direct contradiction of the Constitution of the United States.

"This object shall be attained in this way: That the societies belonging to the association shall stand firmly together in the election of law-makers (assemblymen and senators), and pledge themselvs to vote only for such candidates as shall promis, under oath, or over their signatures, not to vote for Prohibition and the excise and Sunday laws which restrict individual liberty, but, in harmony with the progress of the civilized nations of Europe, to stand for the views of the organization both in word aud deed."

If our German friends are going in for the repeal of all Sunday laws, and for placing the saloons under the same law on Sunday that they are on Monday, they hav our sympathy, and will get our vote. If they are only anxious to hav the legal right to drink beer on Sunday from 2 o'clock in the afternoon till midnight, they will get neither sympathy nor votes from consistent Freethinkers. Beer is not a priceless boon, nor a very inspiring rallying cry, but liberty to do what one pleases on Sunday, not only after but before 2 o'clock, P.M., is worth combining for and voting for.

A Too Innocent Contemporary.

The Rev. Dr. Alden, secretary of a missionary organization, is accused of packing the committees of his society in order that he may retain his grip upon it. A member of the organization recently remarked that "Dr. Alden's methods in packing committees to suit his purposes are unworthy of a ward politician."

The Evening Sun calls this a queer accusation, and seems surprised that a minister can be guilty of such conduct. This surprise doubtless arises from the extreme youthfulness of the Evening Sun. When it has lived as long as its morning brother, it will not be surprised at any charge brought against a minister, but will take it as a matter of course, and to be expected. Let us hope, however, that it will be less hypocritical in dealing with ministerial delinquents, and less prone to tell lies for the benefit of religion.

Editorial Notes.

THE following significant paragraph we take from the Boston Investigator:

"☞To whom it concerns:—The subscriber who stopped taking the Investigator because we said that the Chicago Anarchists, if innocent should be acquitted, and if guilty should be imprisoned, may hav a correct idea of Anarchy, but he is ignorant of what Liberalism means."

We extend to Messrs. Seaver and Mendum our sincere condolence. We know just how they feel.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND, in the course of his Western tour, stopped over Sunday at Madison, Wis. Previous to his arrival the members of Grace Episcopal church tricked out the edifice with bunting, and announced that the president would attend their service, admission to which would be by card. And every Christian in Madison who knew he or she could not get a card, immediately rose up in wrath and reviled Grace Episcopal church in picturesque and emphatic language. All of which goes to show that Christianity, in its moral effects, is more or less of a humbug.

CLARK BRADEN seems in a fair way to be pretty thoroughly shown up. Mr. Putnam has forwarded—for our amusement, we take it—a copy of the Silverton, Oregon, Appeal, in which Braden rails against the secretary of the American Secular Union for refusing to meet him in debate. From this we infer that Mr. Putnam has sustained the dignity of his office by refusing to associate with blackguards. This is as it should be, and as we could hav told the Christians who engaged Braden that it would be, for we know that Mr. Putnam wouldn't touch Braden with a forty-foot pole.

THE Galveston, Texas, News, as we hav once or twice pointed out, is a Christian journal, though it does personally assail a minister now and then. In the Sunday law crusade the News has been an able ally of the preachers, except when its own mechanics were threatened with arrest, and it obtained its reward at the Baptist convention held at Dallas on the 1st inst. The Rev. Mr. Beauchamp read the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we regard the News as dangerous to the morals and good order of society, and recommend to our friends everywhere to shun it as they would the Police Gazette or any other impure literature; that we do this irrespectiv of the attitude of the News toward Prohibition or any other political or religious question."

Before the resolution was passed, the meeting adjourned, but not before Major Penn got in a parting shot in the form of a prayer in which he beseeched the almighty to direct the editorial staff of the News in the right way, and finally land them all in heaven. Truly, the way of the transgressor is hard.

HORACE SEAVER prints his yachting enthusiasm in the Investigator this wise:

"This is one of the most popular sports in England and Scotland, and it is getting to be about the same here in the United States, where are the fastest sailing yachts in the world. Some thirty-five years ago a New York yacht, the America, went over to England to compete for a famous prize, the queen's cup, and won it. She beat everything English in the shape of a boat, and brought the cup over here in triumph, since when a number of attempts hav been made by English racing yachts which hav come over to capture the cup, but they were defeated one after another all being too slow.

"Finally a Scotch clipper, the Thistle, was built on the Clyde expressly to beat the Yankee yachts; and having lately arrived, she raced twice last week in New York harbor with a Boston yacht, the Volunteer, and was beaten both times between two or three miles. It was probably the most exciting yacht race ever known—a sort of international competition among Yankee and Scotch yachtsmen, and the Yankee Volunteer was victorious, though it is allowed that the Scotch Thistle did remarkably well. But as the Boston Volunteer was invincible, and probably the fastest yacht in the world, the queen's cup will hav to remain on this side of the Atlantic, until some kind of a craft, Scotch or English, can beat the Yankee Volunteer. 'Hail Columbia!'"

We wish that Brother Seaver had gone further and stated his views upon the comparativ merits of centerboarders and cutters; for instance, whether the initial stability of lead keels is greater than that of broad beam, and if the division of the single jib into jib and forestaysail adds to the capacity of the boat to go to windward. This division, we believe, is a notion of the cutter advocates, and is generally adopted by American yachtsmen. Another question we submit is whether the Thistle's agility in stays, gained by cutting away her forefoot, compensates for the corresponding loss of grip on the water, and attendant liability to sag off to leeward. It seems to us that it does not, but as the Thistle outwinded all the cutters on the other side, the question is an open one. Again, should the midship section of a yacht be given a slight rake aft, and be straight-sided above the water, or be built plumb, with bilge running well down to the keel, and a tumble home above the load water-line? In the race just concluded, over the result of which Brother Seaver voices our own enthusiasm, Captain Haff, of the Volunteer, kept his boat full and by and a rap full, and still pointed closer than the Thistle, which boat Captain Barr pinched very close. Was this capacity of the Volunteer the result of her centerboard alone, or partially of her slightly rockered keel, sharp but moderately deep entrance, and remarkably fine run? New York, nowadays, has to look to Boston for information on yachting matters, and we feel interested in these questions. We do not mind revealing that our prejudices are in favor of keel boats of moderate draft and beam, as being safer and more commodious, though perhaps less speedy. Boats that hav to use mast-head runners, with jib set flying, necessitating a jigger on the halyard, and a nigger to haul on it, we never could abide. But, after all, our favorit model is the one that flies the Stars and Stripes and gets there first. Therefore, with Brother Seaver we would remark, "Hail Columbia!" and would add that Columbia cannot boast a worthier citizen than our venerable contemporary whose hail we hereby echo.

Letters from Friends.

LINKVILLE, OR., Sept. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: For the inclosed stamps please send me Paine's "Age of Reason," Remsburg's "False Claims," Robert G. Ingersoll's "Great Centennial Oration on the Declaration of Independence," and the "Public Schools and the Catholic Church," by L. K. Washburn.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is still a welcome visitor to me. Please giv us more of those "Heretical Personalities." Those pen pictures of the men we read so much are a great treat. And the oftener we hear from G. E. M. the better.

WM. TERRILL.

SANOTUARY OF LOGAN ASSEMBLY, K. OF L., No. 6414,
LEWISTOWN, PA., Sept. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: This assembly has passed resolutions condemning the action of the supreme court of Illinois in regard to those seven men condemned as Anarchists. The same vote also authorized me to forward the same for publication. I do not know whom to communicate with in regard to the matter. Will you publish the same, or otherwise inform me where to send it to insure publication? W. J. HAWK.

[We do not know the titles of the papers to whom such resolutions should be sent, but suppose that Knights of Labor journals would be the organs through which Knights of Labor assemblies would communicate with the world. An engrossed copy of the resolutions should be sent to Gov. Richard Oglesby, Ottawa, Ill. Perhaps some of our readers can giv Mr. Hawk further information.—ED. T. S.]

WANSHIP, UTAH, Sept. 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Putnam is a brick. This may be slang, but it seems to express the Westerner's idea of an energetic, joyous, hopeful, brilliant, and earnest lecturer, and an able exponent of the Secular cause. At the Liberal Convention at Salt Lake City, on September 24th, 25th, his lectures were received with round after round of enthusiastic applause. Utterances that would hav been considered extremely blasphemous a few years ago were vociferously applauded by hundreds in the audience, as he made so plain the absurdity of the so-called sacred things.

Owing to the busy time of year there was not as good a turn-out as would hav been later. Still, the different parts of Utah were well represented. Sixty-eight names were enrolled, and double that number are expected right away.

The organization of the Utah Secular Union was completed with a strong organization, including some of our best and most prominent citizens. We expect a boom (more expressiv slang) in Freethought that will keep pace with the expected boom in real estate, and one that priest power will never smother. WM. REYNOLDS.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Sept. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Believing that yourself and the readers of your interesting paper are ever glad to hear of the meritorious efforts of every noble, faithful, and honest worker in the cause of universal mental liberty, I hereby pen not only my own opinion but the general feelings expressed by all who attended the lecture of Friendship Liberal League last Sunday. The meeting of the League was made memorable last Sunday by the presence, eloquence, logic, and humor of Dr. J. L. York, of California, whose ability as a speaker beggars description; a man who must be heard to be appreciated, and one who cannot be heard by any intelligent person without being admired. His eloquence and logic hold his audience spell-bound, while the wit and humor interspersed in his discourse fill his audience with delight. Never had our society a more intellectual feast than last Sunday evening while listening to the doctor's lecture on "Evolution." The doctor will remain with us two Sundays more, and, from the sample of his ability last Sunday, and the just appreciation manifested by his hearers, I am satisfied we shall be benefited beyond a parallel in the history of our League.

W. SEYMOUR.

DELMAR, CAL., Sept. 28, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I read all the letters that appear from time time in the column that is allotted to friends in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and am often instructed thereby; but I see so much fault-finding among the different writers that I am constrained to "fall in" and find fault too. Some find fault with the Editor because he advocates, or fails to advocate, ideas different from or similar to theirs, or publishes articles of others who differ with them upon the various methods of assaulting the popular superstitions of the day, commonly called religion. Some find fault because he is too tenderfooted for them, other because he is too radical, and many find fault with the various contributors.

Now, Mr. Editor, I believe that this fault-finding, as above indicated, is unworthy of a Freethinker, and ought not to be indulged in by any Materialist or Spiritualist worthy of the name of a Freethinker, or who has for his object the elimination of superstition from the minds of mankind. Every blow given—I care not what the methods used—ought to receive the unqualified approval of every friend of Freethought in this "land of the free and home of the brave."

We do not gain anything for the cause by negativing others who are as much in earnest as are we, and who hav as much right to express their opinions as we hav. I say in all kindness, Let us stop finding fault with others and renew our vigor in driving nails in the coffin of superstition until it is as dead as is the orthodox hell of yore; then we can all attend its funeral en masse, and congratulate all over the good work done. When we get that (the greatest curse that ever afflicted humanity) out of their brains, it will never return again to torment and afflict as it has done in past ages. Nations and states will be purged of crime and immorality; locks will become useless on doors as a bar to thieves; Canada will cease to be a resort for hypocritical Sunday-school bank defaulters; "ascension robes" will be out of fashion, for heaven on earth will be a reality; tickets to the "New Jerusalem" could not be given away, and a round-trip ticket to the realms of the "great white throne" would not bring the price of a second-hand harp, or a wornout crown of thorns or a faded halo. Right here and now we would hav an everlasting picnic with a diet more varied than "milk and honey," and laws that would be operativ without the resort to kings, gods, or devils, and "none would molest or make us afraid." Every man would be his own god, every woman a goddess, and all the children veritable angels.

I say, Hurrah for THE TRUTH SEEKER, with the masterly Heston, its army of able writers, and various contributors. In short, I say, Hurrah for anybody and everybody who hits superstition a whack. H. L. SHAUG.

LE MOORE, Sept. 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We hav deeply sympathized with the time-worn veteran of reform, Mrs. Elmina Drake Slenker, since her arrest by a dastardly crew, and though she may hav trespassed upon the sensibilities of certain cultured schools of thought, nevertheless her past life and strictly moral status should be sufficient protection for the personal rights of one of our liberty-loving advocates, who in her ardor discusses what to her mind is for the true amelioration of the family of man. We can discern no good reason for any human interference that can stand the test of logic.

There is no wonder, dear Elmina, "that the fabled Eve, hunted and haunted as representativ in search of knowledge, should at last arise in palpable shape, to deny the charge of being that terrible monster that has brought the race to such ignominy and dire destruction.' Who, then, as reformers in search of all living truth, can disclaim the sacredness of your work? And as stubborn soil calls for the subsoil plow, reaching the strata below the surface, so no true husbandman should assail or evict any needed power in the field of progress that renders service by current force, arousing sentiment leading forward to more replete and perfect culture.

Please accept small contributions, Mrs. Slenker, in aid of your cause for the elevation of sex and hereditary principles: Mrs. L. L. Moore, $1; S. G. Fox, 50 cents; Mrs. Emma A. Fox, 50 cents; Mrs. Laura Sweetland, 50 cents.

SARAH GREGG FOX.

GUNTERSVILLE, ALA., Sept. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Observing my name, with the charge of "flopping about," in a letter from "J. H. W." in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept, 3d, I read this, but without finding any explanation of the asserted inconsistency, other than ignorance and ill-will on the part of the writer, with whose positions in this letter, however, I am agreed in so far as they are intelligible. The cant phrase "free government" is not so to me, the freedom of governments being generally inverse to that of the governed, and direct in the exercise of their enslavement. I find no appreciation of my issues with the Editor, which relate in part to the policy of combating superstition, my views in regard to which are expressed in the issue of the 10th by T. E. Longshore. In part, on a subject, the discussion of which has not been allowed me, viz., the distinction between autonomic administration and general or state government, the former being confined to economic affairs, the latter to political.

As to my differences with other editors or organs, they involve not the slightest change of principles or views of policy on my part, whether as regards the conscienceless egoism in which Tucker and his "Takkak" would swamp justice, honor, and good-fellowship; or the abortiv pretensions to personal liberty of the Harmans and Walkers.

The revolutionary ideas of the Chicago Internationals hav brought ruthless persecution on the devoted heads of honorable men, innocent of any legal crime, and whose judicial murder is a blow to liberty of speech and press. But their propaganda, without being criminal, has always been opposed by me and other Anarchists on grounds of policy. I look for no social good from rebellions of the oppressed, but only from the enlightenment of the oppressors, and from the absence of their political agency of oppression which is resumed in the functions of the sheriff.

M. E. LAZARUS, M.D.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Oct. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I would say a word to friends who hav so kindly come forward in my behalf and given testimony in my favor.

I want you to feel assured I never hav and never expect to accept anything I do not feel I deserve. I am aware I hav some malignant enemies who are sending letters to publishers and private friends warning them that Elmina is a Free-lover, a miscegenationist, and unworthy of all the work that is being done for her. I only ask to be judged by my printed and written words. If anyone can bring forward an immoral idea or sentiment in my handwriting, then you may feel it is time to believe the accusations of the venomous. Till you see some such proof of my departure from the good and the true, I ask you to trust and believe. For myself, personally, I desire no money from anyone, but I am glad of every name enrolled on the list of defenders as one more testimonial to the value of the work I tried to do. "Woe unto you when all men shall praise you." It is good for us to hav enemies; it even makes our true friends still more warm in their good feelings on our behalf. We hav already received hundreds of testimonials in favor of the small good I hav been enabled to do. I should not deem it worth while to say even this much regarding the work of enemies only that I feel my duty to friends demands it. The morally depraved seek only immorality, meanness, and dishonesty because of the unfortunate construction of their own organisms. I hav always been glad that I hav inherited an optimistic, healthful, hopeful spirit that rejoices in the good, the true, and the beautiful, and is glad to see all the world full of sweetness, joy, and love. I try to cherish no ill-will even to enemies, for malignant feelings always canker the heart and recoil upon the owner of them. I am grateful to the fates that gave me a peaceful, gentle, meek, and loving Quaker inheritance.

I hav received several letters asking if by paying the $11 anyone can get the sewing machine offered for sale for my Defense Fund. The $11 is due the company; the notice will cost me $—, and where, then, will be any for the Defense Fund? I hoped some generous friend who wishes to help the Defense Association would be glad to do it by paying something toward full value for it. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

[The notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER will cost Mrs. Slenker just what she expresses it by the blank she left for us to fill. All that she gets for the order for the machine she can hav for the Defense Fund; THE TRUTH SEEKER will not take a cent of it.—ED. T. S.]

BOSTON, MASS., Sept. 30, 287.

MR. EDITOR: As Brother Koezly has nobly and voluntarily presented the gallant TRUTH SEEKER with $25, whichever way the decision goes, I will also do the same by the Investigator, and accordingly send you my $25 for that other grand helper in the cause of reason. The two papers will, therefore, gain $25 apiece in any event. All gambling or bribing being thereby absolutely eliminated from the decision, the only thing remaining to do is to place the printed resolution herewith inclosed, which was the original cause of Brother Koezly's objections, before your readers, along with your decision as to whether or not it is figured in a correct mathematical manner.

Brother Koezly and myself hav always perfectly agreed on one point, and it is that, in order to count now 287, the figure 1 of my Bruno-Wakeman or Year of Science Calendar must be placed at the figures 1601 of "our Lord's" time register. But I affirm and he denies that a figure 0—the mathematical starting-point in all accurate computations—must be put down previous to writing the numeral 1, and, of course, has to be placed at 1600 "A.D." because that is my beginning.

Even baseball game-counting has to use an 0 to start with, as you will see by the inclosed slip and picture. Calendar figures mean completed years mathematically speaking, although popular figuring opposes this fact in many cases—Brother Koezly for instance. GEO. N. HILL.

[The resolution referred to was offered by Mr. Hill at a Paine celebration in Boston in 1882, and reads as follows:

Resolved, That in everlasting commemoration of that rise of science and Freethought—the two best friends humanity has ever had—which began during the sixteenth century of the superstitious "Year of our Lord," and in perpetual honor, also, of the heroism of that glorious teacher of reason, and noble martyr for science and man, Giordano Bruno, of Italy—so inhumanly burnt at the stake by the Christians, at Rome, on the 16th day of February, 1600, for proclaiming scientific facts—therefore, in future, all records, and other official documents of the Investigator Freethought Society of Boston, Mass., shall bear date from a calendar, beginning on the 1st day of January, A.D., 1600, thereby placing our society, and all persons also adopting it, entirely out of the bedeviling fog of the age of Bible faith with its "Year of Grace, 1882," and into the humane light of the "Age of Reason" and Year of Science, 282.

We shall print shortly an article on this question which we hope will be satisfactory to Messrs. Koezly and Hill.—ED. T. S.]

ONEIDA, KAN., Sept. 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We hav moral, social, political, as well as so-called religious conflicts ahead that seem to need such men as Martin Luther and William of Orange. The American Mohammedan (or so-called Mormon) church, attaching polygamy to its debauchery, has been a source of a great deal of annoyance to this government, which has cost a vast amount of money as well as time to eradicate that cess-pool of iniquity, and still it seems to baffle the skill of our most eminent statesmen. Why? The reason is obvious, just like the fight against the liquor traffic. While we are trying to wipe out the stain of polygamy on the one hand, on the other we are allowing Mormons to empty on our shores by the thousands, from Europe, the most ignorant creatures conceivable, just fit subjects for the manipulations of those assumed Latter Day Saints, as they style themselvs (frauds). But while we are endeavoring to suppress polygamy, here is another sect pouring into the country by the millions with their ignorant, superstitious, peculiar proclivities, establishing cathedrals, parochial schools, churches, priest houses, monasteries, convents, nunneries, "monkeries," etc., in which poor, ignorant women are kept secluded, prohibited from any intercourse with the outside world, there to remain, taught that it is for the greater glory of God that they should liv and become mental dwarfs, as it were, thereby trammeling the minds of human beings in order to gratify the hallucinations of stall-fed, pampered sacerdotal celibates denominated priests, who may order that it is for the glory of God and induce poor creatures to believe such nonsense.

Hav we not statutes that provide for idiots, lunatics, and also provisions for investigating the causes which produce deaths, etc.? And that this government should tolerate the keeping of any American imprisoned by any sect, creed, or clique, under the guise of any religious or other pretense, is an abomination to a free government. It is alien to a free country. If any church is to be allowed to keep in perpetual imprisonment the women of this land allured into those convents because some prelate so orders it, what preposterous tyranny must we not sumbit to or sanction if some men, assuming to represent God, should so elect, claiming it to be a part of their religion? All church denominations hav the fullest liberty to worship according to the dictates of conscience. But that givs them no right to destroy the liberties of American people by undermining the Constitution of this free country. For such imprisonment of American subjects cannot be granted without allowing our rights and liberties to be trampled upon. Hence the duty of all American men and women who claim to be loyal to their country would be to advocate the throwing open of all such institutions as monasteries, convents, nunneries, etc., for inspection by the civil authorities, by petitioning legislatures of the various states to this end, which we would most cordially support.

Don't let us be hoodwinked any longer by pretense. The Hindoos might pretend that to keep them from offering an occasional human sacrifice to their imaginary God would be placing restrictions on their religious liberty, but fortunately the British government has placed restrictions on such atrocities in India. Most certainly this government ought to put an end to the cruelty and tyrannies practiced upon helpless women in this country, by throwing open those nunneries and convents to public inspection, in order that America may maintain her prestige as the home of the poor. The wonder is that they hav not been suppressed by legal enactment long ago. AMERICA.

DAVISON STATION, MICH., Sept. 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I received THE TRUTH SEEKER all right. I am very much pleased with it; hope to always hav one in my house. I wish to bring a new thought before the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is new to me, and I hope it will work. All of us Liberals hav lost friends. I know how inconvenient it is to get Liberal speakers. There is none near me, nor is there one that I know the address of. It is very humiliating to employ one of those orthodox attorneys in such a trying time. I would suggest that we should raise money by each Liberal that is interested contributing so much a month to be sent to a treasurer for the purpose of paying a speaker and his traveling expenses. A speaker on such occasions should not expect too much. A funeral could be postponed three to four days, and that would giv time enough for a speaker to go a long way. By so doing we could secure the best men we hav. Hav some permanent place to telegraph to for a speaker, so that there would be no delay. L. VANSCHAICK.

HARWICH, MASS., Sept. 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In running over the list of "Letters from Friends" I am amused to see the different likes and dislikes, the strictures and plaudits, expressed therein, but I am glad to be able to notice so little of bitterness from the writers, accustomed as they are to radical, outspoken language. It requires a philosophical turn of mind to know how to steer clear of open rupture, and I apprehend the task of an editor is no small one to so arrange the contributions that they shall balance each other with a happy, neutralizing effect.

Captain Kennedy, in the issue of September 17th, thinks "the cartoons are immense," but has "one objection," and that is "those letters of Mrs. Colman." I guess if Captain Kennedy could hav known how those letters interested old veterans in the work of those days—veterans like Parker Pillsbury and Mrs. Colman—he would hav hesitated before recommending a "let-up on those letters." To me they were victuals and drink, as I identified myself with the Garrisonian Abolitionists, and remember some of the incidents mentioned by her in those letters. Few appreciate the immense labor performed by Garrison and the noble souls that so heroically rallied around him. History, at best, will but poorly portray it, and the half will not be told. I remember vividly the day when, at an antislavery camp-meeting in Harwich, a howling mob of church-members and others (see Parker Pillsbury's "Acts of the Antislavery Apostles") set upon Stephen Foster and others—especially Foster—when he dissected Captain Grafton Seers for returning a fugitiv slave that had taken refuge on board his vessel. The captain had been induced to tell his own story, and upon the platform he completely inculpated himself, after which Foster, utilizing the facts as told by the captain himself, figurativly speaking, tore him limb from limb. The poor man stood like a culprit, as he was, while Foster, in a masterly manner, rehearsed the story, and poured into his ears the horrors of slavery, and the awful crime of plunging a poor, panting fugitiv, who was just on the borders of freedom, as it were, back into the jaws of slavery's hell. If inspiration ever lent its aid to anyone, it did to Foster then and there, as he stood side by side with the captain, and, with marvelous power of language and eloquence, showed up the facts in the case, and condemned him out of his own mouth. Enough of this now.

Then, on the same page of "Letters from Friends," "A Spiritualist" thinks that Heston's picture of Jacob's ladder "is entirely uncalled for in the light of modern Spiritualism." To be brief, I would say, Let every one work in his or her own harness, and cure the world of superstition as best they may. B. F. ROBBINS.

NEWARK, N. J., Sept. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read your article in the August 13th TRUTH SEEKER, entitled, "The New Aspect of Mrs. Slenker's Case."

Believing that no one wields the editorial pen with greater skill or maintains a position with clearer-cut logic than Eugene Macdonald, yet this time I feel justified to challenge you on one or two points in the aforesaid article.

In speaking of the work in which Aunt Elmina has been engaged and "which to her seemed necessary and good," you aver: "Others, however, hav not seen the necessity of the work, and hav disapproved of it. Probably ninety of every hundred Freethinkers condemn the work as uncalled-for and useless."

I am uncertain whether you class yourself with the ninety or the ten, but in either case I infer that you would justify one in condemning a work when not able to see its necessity.

While I claim the right to differ with Elmina or anyone else, yet I take John Stuart Mill to witness that unless I hav sifted this question to the bottom, I don't know whether it is "necessary" or not, and it is unbecoming, at least, to condemn its agitation. While there is one person who makes claims concerning the subject, which claims I hav not investigated to the best of my ability, my opinion is not worth a miller's dam.

Having spent part of my life in the Christian church, part in the United States navy, and a large part in the theater, I hav had some opportunity to observe the frightful extent to which immoralities and excesses prevail in these three ample fields for vice. I could bring scores to testify to the fact that unnatural vice in the navy (particularly on the school ships) is the rule, rather than the exception. The excesses of the theater (especially the variety theater), and the abuses of the priesthood, are legion. Yet is the work of showing up these abuses of nature's laws not a work of necessity? And shall parents go on sending their bright boys to the training-ship for a maritime education, only to get their young eyes dimmed, their minds clouded, and their constitutions, perhaps, fatally undermined?

I, for one, consider Mrs. Elmina's work of sexual reform the most important and necessary of all reforms, for once get the race to observe the laws of nature in their family relations and there is hope of a nobler humanity. What gave Colonel Ingersoll his manly form and creed-proof brains? No doubt, 'twas healthy conditions of birth.

Further on in your article, I quote, "If we had never, until now, heard of Mrs. Slenker, and knew nothing of her work, we would not consider the case one that called for an uprising of Freethinkers to defend invaded principles.' Allow me to suggest that if you had never heard of Mrs. Slenker until you heard that she was charged with or even convicted of mailing obscenity, until you did hear something of her and her works you would remain incompetent as a judge whether the Freethinkers would be justified in uprising. Having thought a great deal on the subject in question, and knowing the tendency of so many to sexual intemperance, I can't help wishing that there were more Elminas. If I take a false position in this matter, be kind enough to set me right, and oblige, W. P. BLYTHE.

COVINGTON, KY., Oct. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You will kindly pardon my troubling you, but I am bound to transmit you my unequivocal, hearty appreciation of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S merits. It is a great paper, and has too become, in time, a general and long-felt blessing to the misguided, suffering mankind.

The few trial numbers I read hav sufficiently convinced me that the paper will always be welcome—nay, as necessary in my house as the "daily bread." So please enter my name among your permanent readers.

I am as strong an Infidel now as I was once a Catholic believer until some three years ago. I could not leave my bedroom at morning without an ardent thanksgiving and prayer to the imaginary omnipotent father and son and their "blessed immaculate companion." Neither could I touch the bed at evening minus the same litany of devotions. I prayed before and after meals; prayed when leaving home, prayed on returning home, prayed and prayed to become good and holy, prayed for health and money, prayed for family and neighbors, for living and dead, prayed for and against everything.

Once—I don't recollect what induced me to do so—I reflected upon my so sincere and perpetual devotions. I thought of the omnipresent and all-knowing God, and finally it seemed to me that if God is present everywhere, and if he knows everything, then he must know our necessities; he must know what is best to make us happy without our calling his attention to it, and if he does not want of his free will to lend us assistance, then our prayers cannot change his mind, as he is unchangeable, unalterable, otherwise he could be no God. He has prescribed for each and everyone of his "children" a special office and salary, and punctum est.

I concluded, therefore, that my prayer was rather a sin than a virtue, and, in order not to offend God, I stopped praying altogether. But as prayer is the cardinal doctrin of the Christian church, the latter must be founded on sin, and sin is, they say, a crime. Consequently Jesus Christ, who so ardently advocated the prayer, preaching and praying himself, could not be God, nor sent by God; he was an impostor, a fraud, and impostors were his prophets and apostles.

So, to avoid supporting such an unholy institution, the church, I severed my connection with the same entirely. In every respect I feel more satisfied to-day than before, and calmly shall await my end without fearing that fire and brimstone shall be my reward if not attending church regularly, if not kneeling and praying, and fasting and confessing, and——

But too long hav I strained your patience; so wishing you all desired success in your true apostolic endeavor,

I remain, N. T. TANSKI, M.D.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., Aug. 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the next two years. I also inclose a communication I had published in one of our leading county papers (New Castle Guardian), and which explains itself. It stopped their priestly slang. And if the Liberals would meet these impudent, arrogant priests in a similar manner everywhere they would either be compelled to behave themselvs or step down and out. W. W. WALKER.

Editor Guardian: A friend has just handed me a copy of last week's issue of your valuable paper, and called my attention to "Fair Play's" statement of our doings at this place, on which please permit me to say a few words. But, first, allow me to say that I am in no wise responsible for the bitter feelings that seem to exist in certain quarters in this community. With malice toward none, and kindly feeling toward all, I was quietly minding my own business, when I was informed that Mr. Buzza, who was holding "revival meetings" in the Methodist Episcopal church, was denouncing me, or the class of people to which I was understood to belong, as "poor, puny, contemptible, ignorant, cowardly Infidels that would not stand fire. All you hav to do is to shoot and they will run." Also, that we had never read the Bible, and hated the truth, etc. It is said that even a snail, when tramped, will put out its horns, and there is a point beyond which forbearance becomes meanness. Feeling that the point was about reached, we thought that we would challenge him and his co-worker, Mr. Boyd, to defend on the platform some of the positions they had so loudly and insultingly stated in the pulpit, thus giving them an opportunity to refute the common charge that the pulpit is the coward's castle, and the result is before you. It seems it is beneath their dignity "to stoop to discuss with Infidels!" What wonderful dignity for a little town like Bedford! They claim to be commissioned by Christ. What to do? Is it to call the righteous or sinners to repentance? Is is not to convince an unbelieving "Infidel" world of the truth of Christianity? Certainly. And when we get them up an opportunity to do the very thing they claim they were sent to do—viz., an intelligent, respectable, and in spite of their cowardly efforts to boycott, an audience fair as to numbers, and then politely ask them to "stand up for Jesus" then and there—oh, no; oh, no; they had too much dignity to stoop, etc. What sublime dignity! And if they had not told us we would not hav known it. Why, Gladstone, Alex. Campbell, Dr. McCalla, Dr. Berg, Prof. Deitzler, and many other learned churchmen debated with Infidels without either stooping or losing their dignity. Gentlemen, it is not "dignity" that is the matter with you; it is cowardice. It reminds one of our colored brother's couplet:

De more you see de smoke, de less de fire will be,
And the leastest kind ob 'possum climbs de biggest kind ob tree.

And right here, in view of the fact that a large and increasing number of learned and eloquent men and women are daily lecturing to enthusiastic audiences all over the United States on "Rationalism," or, as the church people hav it, Infidelity, if our reverend friends hav no answer to giv them but boycott and dignity, they may write Ichabod on their religion, and Infidelity has come to stay. But they hav more important work, "namely, saving souls." I honor the preaching that tends to make men more just, wise, kind, liberal, and noble, as it tends to the elevation and ennobling of humanity; but such preaching (which "Fair Play" calls work) as that quoted above, and which has been the fashion with these gentlemen the past winter. will save no person's soul, but such a spirit of slander and abuse will degrade, shrivel, and damn the souls of all who cherish it, whether speaker or hearer. It is claimed that the success attending these meetings proves the conductor's means—preaching, etc.—all right, but I am prepared to show that some of our most successful revivalists hav been the vilest libertins, and even murderers, that ever cursed the earth. But, for the present, I will close. Yours truly, W. W. WALKER.

WEST UNION, O., Sept. 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Our third annual Liberal camp-meeting, with Mr. Charles Watts, editor of Secular Thought, Toronto, Canada, as lecturer, closed Sunday night, September 18th. A railway accident on Mr. Watts's train on his way hither deprived us of two of his lectures, but he gave us five in all, and the others will not spoil. Our Liberals cling to Mr. Watts like magnets to steel, and are determined under fairer skies, at some future time, to hear him again.

The orthodox folks will probably hav renewed faith in prayer, for their meanest minister prayed publicly for his God to visit evil on the Infidels of Adams county, and to specially pour out his wrath on the speaker who was coming to address us.

But if their God attempted to answer this prayer by the railway accident and the rain, he got in his work very imperfectly, for Mr. Watts was not injured in the accident, and the rain refreshed the parched fields of Infidel and Christian alike, and seemed to cause our Infidel friends to rally with a firmer determination in spite of the weather. The orthodox folks concentrated their energies to carry out their usual tactics to prevent attendance on our meetings. They circulated on the day of Watts's arrival that he would not be here. They imported a boy preacher as a special attraction, and every church in town held services at exactly the same hour as ours. They jerked their little orthodox bell-ropes savagely, and their bells clashed with a fierce, sharp, harsh, jangling discord, as though they were uttering volleys of orthodox oaths, in which hell, spelled in the good old way, seemed numerously interspersed, while in contrast the grand old court-house bell rang forth her deep, resonant notes, calling the people to the temple of justice to hear our noble orator Watts, in his appeal to the reason and moral perception of his audience, an audience that boldly, bravely chose to hear the discussion of "Secularism" while Superstition threw open her gilded halls, with the attractions of music, fair ladies, boy preachers, and all, all around them. Liberalism is taking deeper root in the minds of our people. When Science once subdues superstition, she will stand as long as the world stands. Nothing short of a wreck of the planet could destroy her reign. All day on Sunday, I saw intelligent-looking men standing on the streets looking toward the court-house with wistful eyes, not daring to enter, fearing the cruel hand of the church in their business or social relations. School-teachers are the most pardonable for not taking activ part in Liberal work, for if known, it means almost certain dismissal, yet some of them nobly assist us confidentially. I am the only outspoken Infidel worker in the county who holds a school, and I hav held my place by constant strategic warfare, and I do not know how long I can hold the fort, but I know I will not renounce my principles for any position. Many copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and Secular Thought were distributed to those who came boldly forward to eagerly receive them.

What we need here now is more subscribers to our Liberal papers, more readers of our Liberal books, a deeper study into the ethics of Secularism, more frequent meetings of our own society, more effort to develop the individualism and power of thought and expression among our own members, such as essays, readings, and discourses at our meetings and by our own members. We must not depend on great orators from a distance doing all our work, nor half of it. Like the sensible farmer in the old fable, let us resolve to do our own work ourselvs. I would not say dispense with our great orators, but our own work comes first, and when we come down to hard, thorough home work it will not be half so hard to employ a great orator and pay him well as it is now.

J. F. BECK, Sec. Adams Co. Secular Union.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

For Miss Susan H. Wixon.

Too deep for tears the grief that bends
O'er graves of fondly cherished friends,
And still rereads, with dizzy gaze,
The stone whereon, in brief, cold phrase,
A true companion's record ends.

In part I comprehend your woe.
I hav my mother still—I know
If I should lose her hand from mine,
Long, long for me no sun would shine,
No bird would sing, no flower blow.

We turn with scorn from priestly tales,
But there is truth that never fails—
View Nature's workings, then believe!
Why shou d the only One deceive?
What other Justice holds the scales?

Though faded blossoms sink to earth,
The atoms change, not cease, their mirth.
When summer's ray the garden warms,
They group anew, in graceful forms,
At beauty's e'er mysterious birth.

There may not fade the tiniest spark,
To leave the universe more dark;
Though deep it hide in earth or air,
Its every change, with tireless care,
The searching eyes of Science mark.

If empty evil, too, must liv,
Till debt discharged a quittance giv,
Then how can love's transcendent bloom,
Heart-sunshine, meet a voiceless doom,
Last remnant in the broken sieve?

Unless I, too, am but a mask
That sober Nature—childish task!—
To shape, then shatter, condescends,
For all my loved, lamented friends
Some time I not in vain shall ask.

Savannah, Sept. 25, 287. HUGO B. PLATEN.

Don't Carry Too Much Sail.

Don' carry too much sail, my friend;
The morn is fresh and fair,
The salt winds blow, the small waves go,
And on thy vessel bear;
But 'neath the calm sea lurks the swell,
And 'neath the cloud the storm,
And ships go down, and brave souls drown
In sight of the harbor warm.

So reef your flaunting sail, my friend,
And ne'er despise the oar,
But bravely stand, with steady hand,
And make for the welcome shore;
Don't carry too much sail, my friend,
The winds fall—don't you know?
The world looks on and laughs in scorn,
Saying, "I told you so!"

When many a proud heart's hopes go down
Biting the bitter dust,
When plans of years are lost in tears,
And true hearts learn distrust.
So lower your widespread sail, good friend;
Wear bravely your homespun suit,
To-morrow must pay the debts of to-day
And swallow their bitter fruit.

'Tis better to own the clothes you wear,
And a cottage ne'er so small,
Than stagger beneath the iron wreath
Of debt in a nabob's hall;
'Tis better to carry an honest heart
Than satins and plumes and lace,
If the glitter of gold o'er a heart as cold
Would only bring disgrace.

Be proud of the sphere of life you fill,
And honor it all you can;
But never forget, more noble yet
It is to be called a man.
The best of all the gifts of heaven
Is to know not how to fail;
But next to this right truthful is:
"Don't carry too much sail."

—E. Alice Kinney, in Detroit Free Press.

Memory Gems.

From the Works of Thomas Paine. To be learned and recited by the children.

It is the nature of compassion to associate with misfortune.

Any system of religion that is shocking to the mind of a child cannot be a true system.

I believe in one God, and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life.

I believe in the equality of man; and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy.

The word of God is the creation we behold. And it is in this word, which no human invention can counterfeit or alter, that God speaketh universally to man.

Human language is local and changeable, and is therefore incapable of being used as the means of unchangeable and universal information.

The creation speaketh a universal language, independently of human speech or human language, multiplied and various as they may be. It preaches to all nations and to all worlds; and this word of God reveals to man all that is necessary for man to know of God.

Mystery is the antagonist of truth.

All national institutions of churches, whether Jewish, Christian, or Turkish, appear to me no other than human inventions, set up to terrify and enslave mankind, and monopolize power and profit.

The world is my country; to do good my religion. S. H. W.

Witty Sayings of the Little Ones.

Little Edna, with her mother, was visiting her grandmother in Maine. Moses was the name of her chubby little playmate. One afternoon Edna, having grown tired of her playthings, went to her mother's room and soon returned, putting on her new white dress, from which the sash was hanging, having been pinned to the skirt. "Why, Edna," exclaimed her mother, "what mischief are you into now?" "Oh, nottin', mamma, only Moses tum to see me and I fought I'd dess up." "No, mine; didn't come to see you nuther," said Moses, drawing the back of his chubby hand across his face. "Well, I don't tare; I looks pitty all de same," said Edna.

One evening, at the approach of twilight, little Edna was riding from town with her grandmother, and, on entering the thick maple grove, it became very dark, and Edna commenced to talk in a whisper, when her grandmother said, "Don't be afraid, Edna, dear, God will take care of us in the dark as well as in the sunlight." "Oh, I isn't 'fraid, danma, only I tought de bears might tum and tarry de horse off."

Little Edna was one day walking in the fields with her aunt, and gathering sticks in her apron. "What are you going to with the sticks?" said her aunt. "Oh, I'se doin' to det papa's supper wid 'em!" and after a minute she said: "Do you know, aunty, I'se passionately fond ob flowers, berries, and kindling wood."

Little Mabel stood looking out of the window when a horse was being driven by with a linen duster thrown over him, when Mabel said: "Mamma, is it doin' to rain?" "No," said her mother. "Den what's dat jack horse dot on a dozzamer for?"

The Infancy of Weaving.

A piece of linen was discovered at Memphis, Egypt, containing 540 picks to the square inch. This fact would seem to indicate that the ancient Egyptians knew about as much about weaving as is known to-day, although the art was not so widely developed. One of the Pharaohs sent the Lydian king, Crœsus, a corselet made of linen and wrought with gold, each thread of which was composed of 360 smaller threads twisted together. Woven fabrics are found on the ancient mummies, but whether of cotton or linen it is hard to say, but they show that weaving and spinning were known very early in the history of the human race. Ancient Egyptian sculpture shows evidences of this art, which by some means seems to hav scattered all over the world. Even the Navajo squaws of this country are known to be expert weavers. A good Navajo blanket sells for $15, while a Mexican blanket can be had for $2.50. The ancient Romans had a cloth factory at Winchester, England; and the weavers had guilds and corporations as early as the eleventh century, and regal power was exerted to support the industry, although Queen Elizabeth, who had peculiar notions, refused to giv a patent to William Lee, who invented the knitting frame about 1589, and made woolen stockings. Elizabeth thought that if one man had the monopoly of stocking-weaving, her subjects would suffer from the loss of employment. Weaving was stimulated very greatly in England by the exodus of weavers from the Continental countries from various causes. Lee's invention was the most important in the whole range of textil industry. He died at Paris in 1610, according to Falkin's history of hosiery and lace manufactures. Burlanach, a London merchant, began spinning under the reign of James I., and in 1629 the spinners of London were incorporated under the name and style of "Masters, Wardens, Assistants, and Commonalty of Silk Throwers." By 1661, forty thousand persons found employment in London alone. In 1685, religious persecution in France drove vast numbers of skilled artisans to England and elsewhere, and some seventy thousand of them are supposed to hav settled in England and Ireland, and to hav aided largely to the foundation of this and many other great industries of the country.—Philadelphia Educational Review.

Value of Dead Horses.

"Say, what yer goin' to do with that old nag?" shouted a passing cart driver to a man who was superintending the removal of a lifeless horse on Willow street.

"Lots," answered the other. "We'll first of all ship the old hulk to the glue factory. There the hide will be taken off and sent to a tannery, and the flesh removed from the bones. The bones are very valuable, and when the frame is separated they are distributed into piles. Shin bones are worth $40 a ton. They are used for knife handles. Thigh bones bring more. They go to Europe at $75 a ton, and come back here after a while in the shape of tooth brush handles. The foreleg bones are made into parasol handles, collar buttons, trousers buttons, and other small articles of usefulness. Glue comes from the water in which the bones are boiled, while the dust from the sawing of the bones makes excellent medicin for cattle and poultry. All the rest that can't be made into bone black is ground up into powder and sold for fertilizing purposes."

"Well, who'd thought that old carcass was wuth so much?" exclaimed the carter in surprise.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

Ingersoll's Works.

The Gods. Paper, 50 cts; cloth, $1. In five lectures, comprising, "The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," and "Heretics and Heresies."

The Ghosts. Paper, 50 cts; cloth, 1.25. Contents: "The Ghosts," "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," "The Declaration of Independence," "About Farming in Illinois," "The Grant Banquet," "The Rev. Alexander Clark," "The Past Rises before Me Like a Dream," and "A Tribute to Ebon C. Ingersoll."

Some Mistakes of Moses. Paper, 50cts; cloth, $1.25.

Interviews on Talmage. Paper, 50cts; plain cloth, $1.25.

What Must We Do to Be Saved? Paper, 25 cents.

The Christian Religion. By R. G. Ingersoll, Judge Jeremiah S. Black, and Prof. George F. Fisher. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

Orthodoxy. 56 pages, 12mo, paper, 10 cents. $1.00 per doz. post paid. Printed in large, clear type, and containing as much as could be delivered in two ordinary lectures. This makes a grand missionary document. Liberals should scatter it generously.

Ingersoll Catechised: His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the editor of the San Franiscan. 5 cents; 50 cents per dozen; 25 copies, $1; 100 copies, $3. Millions of these should be circulated.

Vindication of Thomas Paine from the attacks of the New York Observer, by Robert G. Ingersoll. Price, 15 cents.

Address on the Civil Rights Bill. Large size octavo, paper, 10 cents.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete. Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 50 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Poetry.

The Singing Sands.

When down the length of Athabasca's lake
  The north wind sweeps,
The brown shore-shallows into singing break,
  A voice of music rises from the deeps.

It is the singing sands—the pebbled keys
  That from their caves
Respond in faint and haunting melodies
  To the long touches of the fingering waves.

Elf-tones that waken only when the wind
  Blows from the north;
No sea breeze cool, no zephyr sweet as Ind,
  No breath of plain or hill can draw them forth.

Thus life has singing sands that only sound
  To the cold wind of pain;
Sweet airs of joy and peace in fragrant round,
  Search for the secret of the voice in vain.

But when the north wind blows and high the seas
  Of suffering roll,
From the deep waters come the melodies—
  The sands of patience singing in the soul.

—Mary Leonard.

A Metaphor That Is Mixed.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

In the story entitled "Robbed Him of His Crutches," which originally appeared in the Religious Intelligencer, the following words are attributed to the late Mr. Beecher (see Truth Seeker, Oct. 8, 1887) in his alleged conversation with Colonel Ingersoll:

The human soul is lame, but Christianity givs it crutches to enable it to pass the highway of life. It is your teaching that knocks these crutches from under it, and leaves it a helpless and rudderless wreck in the slough of despond.

This is one of the most remarkbale metaphors it was ever my luck to meet. It begins with a human soul and ends with a rudderless wreck. But let us trace the evolution backward. We hav, then, in a slough of despond, a wreck that is rudderless and helpless on account of having had its crutches knocked out from under it by Colonel Ingersoll's teaching. Previously the wreck was a ship on the highway of life, which its crutches, given it by Christianity, enabled it to pass as a lame human soul.

Let us next, by a broad grasp, take in the whole meaning of the accusation against Ingersoll. Putting the first and last parts together we find that by the generosity of Christianity a lamé human soul is a ship on crutches, but provided with a rudder; and we are presumably to suppose that thus equipped it sails gaily along on the highway of life, successfully avoiding the slough of despond. The spectacle of a ship sailing on the highway is, of course, familiar to all parts of the world, civilized and barbarous. But while we are admiring the sight of a ship on crutches working up to windward, and tacking across the street by means of its rudder and crutches, along comes the piratical Ingersoll and knocks away the crutches of the ship. And I would call upon you, Mr. Editor, as a yachtsman, to picture, if you can, the distress of a ship whose crutches hav been knocked away by the teachings of Infidelity.

Then another consideration: According to the figure, there must be some connection, a lanyard perhaps, fastening the crutches and the rudder together, since knocking away the crutches leaves the wreck rudderless, and therefore helpless on the billowy and tempestuous highway. At the same time this pernicious teaching transfers the wreck from a highway to a slough, where it (that is to say, the lame human soul), erstwhile a cripple on crutches sailing up the highway, happy in the possession of a divinely-bestowed rudder, now lies a helpless wreck as aforesaid.

The figure, you see, presents surpassing, not to say incomprehensible, beauties whichever way you turn it; and, after viewing them, I am quite prepared to believe that Ingersoll was silent, and that the company took their hats and parted. As a close reader of the colonel's works, I am also qualified to testify that the man who constructed this metaphor is more than Ingersoll's master in powers of illustration. Nowhere in the colonel's writings do I find anything like it. The question of its authorship is altogether overshadowed by its kaleidoscopic beauties, which my feeble commentaries can in nowise fully develop.

G. E. Macdonald.

The Curious Gift of the Whangdoodle.

Williston Fish in Puck.

Since the magnificent, cat-like spring taken by the science of natural history on the publication of Goldsmith's "Animated Nature," progress in that study has been comparativly slow. It is said of Goldsmith that so deeply did he investigate his subject, so philosophically befogged did he become, that, in the end, he either would not undertake to say, or even did not know, in which direction the hock joint of a horse turns; but since his day it is only German scholars and Concord philosophers who pretend to arrive at this comprehensiv breadth of horizon; and it may be taken as practically a fact that not until now, when I seize the pupil pen to set down the subtler peculiarities of the animal whose name heads this monograph, does natural history again become a progressiv science. This may seem a trifle overweening, but the present is my second monograph, and I am already posing as a tireless investigator and a fearless blowhard.

The whangdoodle has for a habitat all that country where he is most frequently met by the hardy and intrepid hunter, but it is a strange coincidence that he is found, or at least spoken of, only in those regions where chestnuts flourish. The name whangdoodle is derived from whang, a whang, and doodle or doddle (Fr. duder, Sp. duda, It. dughliera), a small dude. The same word may be traced in the Sanscrit umastra. Compare Finnish k-ruin, Danish Fjyg.

In size the whangdoodle is too well known to need description. His weight is proportionate to his size. His pabulum consists of food of various sorts, which he takes by means of a curious apparatus evidently designed for the express purpose.

But the chief peculiarity of the whangdoodle is his ability to melt the human heart with the expression of his grief. The whangdoodle is generally of a gay and volatil disposition; but we know that it is sometimes the lightest heart that makes the heaviest mourning. The poignant griefs of the whangdoodle time alone cannot assuage; and it is on this account that nature has bestowed upon the animal exceptional powers of lamentation; the idea being that when sorrow falls into his light heart the whangdoodle will mourn, and that when he mourns somebody will come up with a club and kill him. It is a beautiful instance of the perfect adaptation by nature of means to ends, that somebody generally comes.

The only imitation of the whangdoodle's aggressiv dolor is that rendered by Anthony Comeskulk in weeping over the profligacy of mankind. Once when Comeskulk's friends heard him weep, it occurred to them—like an inspiration—to put him up against the whangdoodle on a mourning match. The preliminaries were arranged, an expert referee was appointed, and the contestants, coming on the ground, were stationed behind screens out of sight of the umpire. They then exercised their gifts. It is said to hav been the saddest moment in the history of our country. When the wails had ceased, the referee controled his emotion as far as he was able, and, pointing to the screen behind which stood the whangdoodle, remarked: "Indubitably behind that screen is a whangdoodle mourning for its first-born; but behind that one—oh, boo, hoo-hoo—is a whangdoodle mourning for twins!"

So Comeskulk was awarded the prize, which consisted of the works of Rabelais for himself, and a government order on all booksellers to sell nothing but expurgated editions of Little Red Riding Hood to everybody else.

Lucy and Me.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

As no one volunteers the information which Mr. Wm. E. Renwick seeks regarding the authorship of the verses printed in your issue of October 1st, I will say that they appear in the edition of Moore's poems published by Collier, New York, 1879. Mr. Renwick has the second and third stanzas transposed, and there are also a few verbal variations, such as might be looked for in lines quoted from memory. His version also introduces a certain Lucy unknown to Mr. Moore. Probably some young man, in whom communion with Lucy had produced that mild form of lunacy known as the tender passion, adapted the poem to the occasion, which was a proper thing to do beyond all question. No doubt you hav done the same thing yourself. I append the original.

G. M.

THEY MAY RAIL AT THIS LIFE.

They may rail at this life—from the hour I began it
  I've found it a life full of kindness and bliss;
And until they can show me some happier planet,
  More social and bright, I'll content me with this.
As long as the world has such lips and such eyes
  As before me this moment enraptured I see,
They may say what they will of their orbs in the skies,
  But this earth is the planet for you, love, and me.

In Mercury's star, where each moment can bring them
  New sunshine and wit from the fountain on high,
Though the nymphs may hav livelier poets to sing them,
  They've none, even there, more enamoured than I.
And as long as this harp can be wakened to love,
  And that eye its divine inspiration shall be,
They may talk as they will of the Edens above,
  But this is the planet for you, love, and me.

In that star of the west, by whose shadowy splendor
  At twilight so often we've roamed through the dew,
There are maidens, perhaps, who hav bosoms as tender,
  And look, in their twilights, as lovely as you;
But though they were even more bright than the queen
  Of that isle they inhabit in heaven's blue sea,
As I never those fair young celestials hav seen,
  Why—this earth is the planet for you, love, and me.

As for those chilly orbs on the verge of creation,
  Where sunshine and smiles must be equally rare,
Did they want a supply of cold hearts for that station,
  Heaven knows we hav plenty on earth we could spare.
Oh, think what a world we should hav of it here
  If the haters of peace, of affection, and glee
Were to fly up to Saturn's comfortless sphere,
  And leave earth to such spirits as you, love, and me.

Obituary.

Died, on Saturday, September 24th, at Dahlonega, at the residence of his son, Mr. Lory D. Miller, John W. Miller, in the 89th year of his age.

John W. Miller was born at Uniontown, Pa., March 28, 1798, removed to Ohio in 1812, was married to Miss Catherine Ford in Ohio about fifty-three years ago, and removed to Iowa, in the vicinity of Sigourney, in 1886. He lived in Sigourney until 1883, when he and his wife, who still survives him, removed to the residence of their son, where his death took place as related. He was made a Mason about fifty years ago, and will be buried by that order at Sigourney to-day.

He was the father of seven children—six sons and one daughter. Three of these sons volunteered in the army during the Rebellion. One of these was killed in action; another died from disease; another, D. T. Miller, the well-known lawyer of this city, survived the conflict and ministered to the last wants of his aged parent. Another son is O. L. Miller, principal of the Business College. Still another son, W. S., livs in Sigourney; the daughter, Hannah Harris, is, with her husband, residing in Nebraska.

The venerable old pioneer whose death we thus announce was remarkably well preserved, and retained his mental faculties to the last. He was an old-time Abolitionist, and was very conscientious in not only that belief but in everything else that he professed. He was Liberal in his religious views, and acted to the principles of the Golden Rule through all the years of his long and industrious life. He was a good neighbor, an indulgent father, and a kind husband, and goes down to the grave with the respect and affection of all who knew him. His end was peaceful; life went out tranquil and untroubled as the sleep of an infant; folding his arms across his breast, his spirit left the worn-out frame which had so well served its purpose.—Ottumwa, Ia., Democrat.

Books.

The Struggle for Religious and Political Liberty. By Theo. C. Spencer. New York: The Truth Seeker Publishing Co., 28 Lafayette Place. Price 75 cents.

The above is the title of a handsome volume, bound in muslin, of 140 pages. It is a book rich in information; its style is lucid yet condensed, and the subjects discussed handled with that candor which impresses the reader with the honesty and fairness of the author. The work is in a great measure historical, and we know not where so much information on the same subjects can be obtained in a single volume. The book, for this reason, is equally valuable whether one agrees with the author in his conclusions or not. The chapter headings are as follows: "Introductory; The Beginning; The Pagans and Jews; The Church of Rome; Mormonism; Mohammedanism; Dogmatism; Martin Luther and John Calvin; The Godhead; Persecutions of the Early Christians; Christians Persecute Christians; The Wrongs of Ireland; Huguenots Persecute Catholics; Catholics Persecute Huguenots; The Puritans; The Pilgrims; The Revolution; The Church of England; Protestant Churches of America; Slavery; The Cause Found." These headings giv a good idea of the contents. The style of the author is pleasing, and every page interesting. Few persons who start to read it will lay the volume down until it is finished.—Denison, Texas, Sunday Gazetteer.

Theo. C. Spencer has recently published a book that should be found in the home of every citizen. It is called, "The Struggle for Religious and Political Liberty," and is one of the best commentaries on the history of the human race that we hav ever read. Whoever may disagree with the views of Mr. Spencer, it will be generally acknowledged that he argues by the rule of reason from the basis of truth.—Home Advocate, Mapleton, Iowa.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW.
AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE
TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY;
TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

News of the Week.

THE fifth inspector has been given to the Henry George party.

THE syndicate owning the Scotch cutter Thistle now offer her for sale for $35,000. The price before the race was $50,000.

PRESIDENT and Mrs. Cleveland spent last Sunday with Mr. Vilas in Madison, Ind. They did not attend church.

THE Rev. Dr. Crosby says that drunkards should be treated as criminals, and that liquor should be stamped out gradually by raising the license.

DENIS KEARNEY is in New York. He says the cure for all our industrial evils is the exclusion of Chinese, beside which Mr. George's doctrins are quite unimportant.

AN iceman was arrested in this city for breaking the Sabbath last Sunday by selling ice. The judge discharged him. Two men arrested for selling a pair of shoes and a pair of slippers were held to bail. Another merchant sold a collar worth fourteen cents and was fined.

QUITE a number of New York women hav expressed their determination to vote in next month's election. Those desiring information as to the proper methods to adopt are invited to visit the rooms of the suffrage committee, 30 East Fourteenth street.

THE police made 67 arrests in this city last Sunday for violation of the liquor law. Nearly every saloon in New York now keeps its side door open on Sunday.

HENRY GEORGE and Mr. Schevitch, editor of the daily Leader and head of the Progressiv Labor party, hav agreed to debate their differences from a public platform October 16th.

A SENSATIONAL divorce case in Baltimore bids fair to involve a priest, a theologian, two journalists, and many prominent business men. The principals are Mr. and Mrs. Bottomer.

THE female employees in a large cigar factory in Madrid, Spain, struck against a reduction of wages last week and locked out their employers. They were given their old pay and set at work again.

THE police broke up a mass-meeting of the Progressiv Labor party at Union Square, this city, last Saturday night, and some fifty persons were clubbed. The assault of the police was totally unprovoked.

THE Boston yacht Volunteer, having come to New York and saved the cup, returned home last week. The owner, the designer, and the captain were given a reception in Faneuil Hall, and there was great rejoicing.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN has been delivering speeches lately about the Chicago Anarchists. His last one, in which he predicted dire calamity to the nation, was made October 5th, when he bade farewell to his audience, telling them he should never appear in public again.

THE authorities hav stopped the lotteries and grab-bags at Henry George's Anti-Poverty fair, and William T. Croasdale, the manager, is held to bail. The lotteries are similar to those adopted at church fairs, and Mr. Croasdale declares that if he is convicted there will be no more church fairs in New York.

THE hearing in the case of Editor O'Brien, of United Ireland, prosecuted for publishing meetings of suppressed branches of the National League, was adjourned until the case of Lord Mayor Sullivan, who controls a newspaper, and who had been guilty of the same offense, could be settled. The matter having since been decided in favor of Mr. Sullivan, O'Brien's prosecution will probably be dropped.

BURIAL OF ISAAC.

And Isaac gave up the ghost, and died, and was gathered unto his people, being old and full of days, and his sons Esau and Jacob buried him.—Gen. xxxv, 29.

Odds and Ends.

"WHAT is an epistle?" asked a Sunday-school teacher of her class. "The wife of an apostle," replied the young hopeful.

"MAMMA, will heaven be just like church all the time?" "I hope so, dear," said her mother. "Well, I sha'n't say my prayers any more; I'd rather go to the other place."

"Now," said a Walnut street Sunday-school teacher, "our lesson to-day is about the battle between David and Goliath. Why did they fight?" Little Towhead: "For the gate receipts and points."

"MA, do pugs go to heaven, like good little boys do, when they die?" "No, Johnnie; why do you ask such a silly question?" "Well, I was wondering whether Jip was always going to hav the best of me."

"O MY friends, there are some spectacles that a person never forgets!" said a lecturer, after giving a graphic description of a terrible accident that he had witnessed. "I'd like to know where they sell 'em," remarked an old lady in the audience who is always mislaying her glasses.

LAST Sunday a clergyman in Hartford, Conn., was speaking to children regarding the benefits of a temperate life. "Why," said he, "the strongest man that ever lived never tasted liquor. Who can tell me the name of the strongest man?" "John L. Sullivan," came instantly from a little fellow in the infant department of the Sunday-school.

"COME on. What are you waiting for?" inquired one little boy of another. "Mamma won't let me go." "She won't? My mamma lets me go most everywhere. Yours is awful strict, ain't she?" "Yes; she used to be the principal of a seminary." "Was she?" "Yes. I guess pop didn't think about the trouble he was makin' for me when he married a school teacher."

A TRAMP printer fell into the hands of the St. Paul police, who took him to court. "I'm sorry, Bill," said the judge. "I've let you go a good many times, but I think that this time I'll hav to put you to work on the stone pile for about thirty days." "All right, judge," responded Bill; "you've got everything in your own hands, and can do as you please, but I'll tell you right now that I'm no geologist, although a student of nature."

A SMALL boy not far from Boston was the other day guilty of some outrageous mischief, which he performed alone in a closed room, but which was quickly brought to his door. When his mother remonstrated with the youth, he met her reproof by the bold assertion: "You didn't see me do it!" "No," she replied solemnly, "but God did." "Well," the urchin retorted with an air of contemptuous superiority, "I guess God ain't going round giving away all he sees in this house."

DEACON BLANK: "How de do! I saw you at Deacon Goode's lecture last night." House Agent: "Yes; stirring lecture, wasn't it? The way he went for those women of fashion with no children was a caution." "Yes, he said every one of them ought to be locked up as criminals. By the way, one of Deacon Goode's houses is empty. You hav the renting of it and I would like to lease it for a year." "Can't let you hav it. Deacon Goode will only let the house to families without children."

IT IS ALL OVER.

No more along the silvery sands they stray
When starry night succeeds the golden day,
And Dian, with serene, unblushing face,
Glides calmly from Poseidon's fond embrace;
No more they linger on the pebbled strand,
And make believe to listen to the band
Discoursing airs from Sullivan and Strauss.
The nights grow cold, they spend them in the house.
And do they miss the beach, the pleasant walk?
Not by a very much extended chalk!

A TOURIST of world-wide experience puts forth the theory that the climate of California fosters mendacity, irreverence, and meretricious morals. He holds that the habit of sin in that state is not so much a matter of diseased conscience as of atmospheric pressure and sinister influences of weather. They hav practically no winter there, and so "miss the best means of keeping alive a realization of the presence of a higher and an overruling power, which people living in a sterner climate can so easily comprehend." The skies are so soft and the temperature so pleasant that men are led to think lightly of serious things, to forget how to cultivate the virtues.

LONDON Truth informs its readers that "the Minnesota legislature was recently opened with an extempore prayer, composed by a reverend member, from which the following is an extract: 'And now, dear Lord, bless the reporters, whose nimble pens catch every word almost before it is uttered. Like thyself, they are omnipresent, and almost omnipotent. If we take the wings of the morning and fly to the uttermost parts of the earth they are there. They meet us in the jungles of Africa, they waylay us in the solitary canyons of Colorado, and when at length we find the latitude of the magnetic pole behold they are there. May their light and goodness be equal to their power, and in the general assembly of heaven let no reporter be excluded.'"

ON THE WRONG TACK.

With her thumb on a black-headed tack,
With a hammer upraised in her hand,
Taking aim to obtain a good whack,
A woman sits smiling and bland;
A woman sits smiling and bland,
Sits on the half-carpeted floor,
Where tacks lie like shells on the strand,
Unnumbered and thirsty for gore.

With a yell that might make negroes pale,
With a leap which a goat can't surpass,
With a mangled and bleeding thumb-nail,
She falls in a chair, a limp mass;
She falls in a chair a limp mass,
And groans till the pain flees away—
A beautiful emblem, alas!
Of energy sadly astray.

Gems of Thought.

WITH all the ability claimed for a tutelar deity who made an attempt to conduct a country of his own special selection, containing less than 5,000 square miles—about one-twelfth the size of the state of New York—he seems to hav done nothing toward instructing the people he was so partial to about road-making; neither did the great lights and teachers hav any more conception of a macadamized carriage-road than a Bedouin Arab has to-day.—D. M. Bennett.

POPERY can build new chapels; welcome to do so, to all lengths. Popery cannot come back, any more than paganism can, which also lingers in some countries! But, indeed, it is with these things, as with the ebbing of the sea; you look at the waves thus oscillating hither and thither on the beach; for minutes you cannot tell how it is going; look in half an hour where it is; look in half a century where your popehood is. Alas! would there were no greater danger to our Europe than the poor old pope's revival.—Carlyle.

FLY to the desert. Though your wife put her arms about your neck, tear her hands away. She is a temptation of the devil. Though your father and mother throw their bodies athwart your threshold, step over them; though your children pursue you with weeping eyes, beseeching you to return, listen not; it is a temptation of the evil one. Fly to the desert and save your soul.—St. Augustine [St. Augustine, the greatest of the Roman fathers, stamped his own type of mind and character on the Christian church so deeply that he influences thought to this day almost as decidedly as does St. Paul, and certainly more than their professed master, Jesus. He borrowed the detestable doctrin given in the above extract from the gospels, but, for myself, I dare be known to prefer the gospel of St. Ingersoll, when he says; "While I liv, I purpose to stand by the folks." Augustine is a standing proof of the truth of the saying, "The greater the sinner the greater the saint." He was both a bigot and a fanatic of the first water, but his works are still worth studying.—Hylax.]

To what end is the clogging religion by multiplication of ceremonies and formalities, but to amuse the people and maintain in them a blind reverence toward the interpreters of the dark mysteries couched in them; and by seeming to encourage an exterior show of piety (or form of godliness) to gain reputation and advantage whereby they may oppress the exterior virtues and reality of it, as the scribes and pharisees did, though with less design? Why is the veneration of images and relics, the credence of miracles and legends, the undertaking of pilgrimages to Rome and other places more holy than ordinary, sprinklings of holy water, consecrations of baubles (with innumerable foppish knacks and trinkets), so cherished, but to keep the people in a slavish credulity and dotage, apt to be led by them whither they please by any sleeveless pretense, and, in the meanwhile, to prick various gains from them by such trade?—On the Pope's Supremacy, by Dr. Isaac Barrow (1630-1677).

EVERYWHERE, the new thought is at work, creating the religious belief of the future—a belief which, when it shall come, will be the most practical of beliefs, lifting the human mind into a surer and serener trust, laying upon the human conscience a more effectiv sense of responsibility for the world's welfare, summoning states to a finer justice, trade to a stricter honesty, and welding society to a more genuin brotherhood.—W. J. Potter.

WE can imagin the havoc that would hav been made in the statements and arguments of Jesus had Socrates met him face to face, and subjected him to his testing method. How ill would his loose, popular notions hav borne a close examination of their foundations; how easily would his dogmatic assertions hav been exposed in all their naked presumption [Let him that hath ears to hear, hear!] by a few simple questions; how quickly would his careless reasoning [hear, hear] hav been shattered by the dialectic art which would hav forced him to exhibit its fallacies himself before the assembled audience! But there was no one competent to the task, and when his opponents attempted to perplex him by what they thought awkward questions, he was able to baffle them, without much trouble, by his superior skill.—Amberley.

My days among the dead are passed;
Around me I behold,
Where'er these casual eyes are cast,
The mighty minds of old;
My never-failing friends are they
With whom I converse night and day.

With them I take delight in weal,
And seek relief in woe;
And while I understand and feel
How much to them I owe,
My cheeks hav often been bedewed
With tears of thoughtful gratitude.

THE SKELETON IN UNCLE SAM'S CLOSET

Notes and Clippings.

LEAOH, the Sunday-school superintendent who clipped the beard of Revivalist Mnason at Park Ridge, N. J., and drove him out of town, was fined $1,000 by the court.

HE had evidently studied history. She: "Freddie, how often hav I told you not to play with your soldiers on Sunday?" He: "Yes; but, mamma, this is a religious war." —Accident News.

THE debate between Sergius E. Schevitch, leader of the Progressiv Labor party, and Henry George, of the United Labor party, will take place somewhere in this city on Sunday evening, October 23d.

THE Rev. W. T. Davis, who preached on Boston Common without a license, was last week fined $50 and costs on each of four complaints. In default of $200, which Mr. Davis is unable to pay, he must go to jail for one year.

THE Sun wants to know what in the world the ladies of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Pittsburgh meant when they greeted Mrs. Cleveland with the words of Jehovah to Abraham: "In thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed!"

SOME wicked young Boston men met in their club house the other evening to play poker, and one of their number suggested that the winnings be given to a man who recently had been arrested in the North End for stealing cabbages for his starving family. This was agreed to, and at the close of the game the winners took a carriage, hunted up the cabbage thief's home, and made his family happy with a very respectable sum of money.

DO nine-tenths of the Philadelphia girls smoke cigarets? At the recent convention in that city of the County Woman's Temperance Union, Mrs. Bissed, the superintendent, is reported to hav said that she knows girl members of church who smoke, and is informed that nine-tenths of the girls puff the weed.

IN a recent issue we chronicled the importation from England, under contract, of the Rev. E. Walpole Warren by the church of the Holy Trinity of this city. The fine for importing laborers under contract is $1,000, and United States District Attorney Walker will bring suit to recover that amount from the church.

WHEN the Roman Catholic members of the House of Deputies of Chili offered a resolution by which Chili was to giv the pope $20,000 in gold on the occasion of his jubilee, the majority of the members howled with derision, and laughed the proposition out of the chamber. They said they were surprised and pained that the Catholic members took them for such fools.

THE National Grand Lodge of the Junior American Protestant Association in session at Reading, Pa., adopted resolutions condemning the action of the Pittsburgh school board in electing a Catholic priest as principal of the Monongahela public school, and declared that "the Catholic church is secretly and insidiously at work establishing herself in our midst for the destruction of that most glorious privilege, liberty of conscience, which to preserve inviolate should be the purpose of Protestant citizenship and Protestant Christianity."

A SIOUX CITY paper declares that the Salvation Army there has set apart one night in each week for the offering of prayer for the salvation of the numerous people in that city who are living as man and wife without ever having been married. Evidently facts are not suppressed so much in Sioux City as in some parts of the country.

A MONTREAL, Can., priest, whose last name is Ditcasson, was sentenced at the last session of the Court of the Queen's Bench to twenty-three months' imprisonment and to receive twenty lashes for outraging a young girl. The flogging, administered on the 13th inst., was a mere burlesque, and at the end the reverend rascal thanked the whipper for his tenderness.

JUSTUS SOHWAB, the prominent New York Communist, has just returned from a visit to his father in Germany. He says that he drank a bottle of wine with the chief of police at Frankfort-on-the-Main. If the officer had known who his guest was he would hav arrested him, as Schwab is a deserter from the German army, and is wanted by the authorities for circulating incendiary literature.

JOHN BRIGHT, writing to a Canada man on the temperance question, says: "The whole question and its solution must depend on public opinion, which may agree to restrictions which are important, but will for a long time, and perhaps always, refuse the absolute prohibition. It seems that a severe system of taxation is almost the only remedy which can be adopted with much hope of success. With Canada and with the temperance party in the United States, I hope and wish that the temperance cause may prosper."

THE Woman's Assembly, No. 1789, of Chicago, has adopted resolutions urging Governor Oglesby of Illinois to commute the sentence of the convicted Anarchists. Every newspaper in Chicago, with one exception, refused to print this fact. Sons of Liberty Assembly, No. 1307, also of Chicago, has adopted resolutions similar to those of the Woman's Assembly. Mrs. M. A. Freeman, the Freethought speaker, is recording secretary of this last named assembly.

THE Republican police commissioners and the Republican chief of the bureau of elections gave the fifth inspector to the Henry George party in New York, but the court declared the appointment illegal, and though Mr. George's men were on hand upon the first day of registration, they were not permitted to act. The matter will be contested. It is hinted that the appointment indicates a deal between the Republican and the United Labor parties.

THE Prohibitionists held a political meeting in Cooper Union last week. They started off with a prayer by the Rev. Dr. Deems, in which he said, "O Lord, we believe that every time we say, 'Down with the saloon,' thou sayest Amen! in heaven." A Kentucky colonel, who owned slaves till Abraham Lincoln took them away from him, said that the Prohibition was the real "G. O. P."—God's Own Party. Sam Small confessed that he used to be a high old drunkard, but owing to the mercy of God he had sworn off. It is pretty hard to tell whether the Prohibition party is a political organization or a prayer-meeting.

III.—Moral Maxims.

CHAPTER XIII.—HUMANITY.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

The wanton disposition of young children, like the michievousness of our next relatives, the tree climbing half-men of the tropical forests, has often been mistaken for natural malevolence, but is rather due to an excess of misdirected vital energy. In seeking a vent for the exuberance of that energy, a frolicsome child, like a playful monkey, is apt to become destructive, merely because destruction is easier than construction. Mischievousness, in the sense of cruelty and gratuitous malice, is, however, by no means a prominent character-trait of monkeys or normal boys. The most wayward of all known species of fourhanders are undoubtedly the African baboons; yet a long study of their natural disposition, both in freedom and captivity, has convinced me that even their fits of passionate wrath stop short of actual cruelty, and are, in fact, almost invariably intended as a protest against acts of injustice or violence. At Sidi Ramath, Algiers, I saw a number of babuinos hasten to the aid of a shrieking child, who had hurt his hand in the gear of an ox-cart, and whose cries they evidently attributed to the brutality of his companions. The sight of a wounded fellow-creature, a crippled rat, a mangled bird, a dying rabbit, never fails to throw my pet Chacma-baboon into a paroxysm of shrieking excitement, and within reach of her chain she will act upon the impulse of compassion by trying to redress the injuries of her playmates or rescuing the victim of a dog-fight. The fierce mandril, with resources of self-defense that would defy the attack of a panther, is nevertheless so averse to an aggressive exertion of that strength that menagerie-keepers can trust him to spare, if not protect, the smallest species of his distant relatives, as well as such petulant fellow-captives as young dogs and raccoons. The hunters of the Orinoco Valley can attract fourhanders of all species by imitating the peculiar long-drawn wail of a young capuchin-monkey. At the sound of that cry spider-monkeys, stentors, and tamarins will hasten up from all parts of the forest, attracted less by curiosity than the evident desire to succor a distressed fellow-creature.

That instinct of compassion still manifests itself in the disposition of children and primitive nations. I have seen youngsters of five or six years gasp in anguish at sight of a dying dog, or turn with horror from the bloody scenes of a butcher-shop. Sir Henry Stamford describes the frantic excitement of a Hindoo village at the discovery of a number of buckshot-riddled hanuman-apes; and that sympathy is not limited to the nearest relatives of the human species, for in the suburbs of Benares the gardener of a British resident was pursued with howls and execrations for having killed a young Roussette—some sort of frugivorous bat. The mob repeatedly cornered the malefactor, and with shrieks of indignation shook the mangled creature before his face. The traveler Busbequius mentions a riot in a Turkish hamlet where a Christian boy came near being mobbed for "gagging a long-billed fowl."

"Man's inhumanity to man," as practiced by their foreign visitors, inspired the South Sea Islanders with a nameless horror. A sailor of the British ship Endeavor having been sentenced to be punished for some act of rudeness toward the natives of the Society Islands, the natives themselves interceded with loud cries for mercy, and seemed, indeed, to settle their own quarrels by arbitration, or, at worst, boy-fashion, by wrestling and pummeling each other, and then shaking hands again. A similar scene was witnessed in Prince Baryatinski's camp in the eastern Caucasus, where a poor mountaineer offered to renounce his claim to a number of stolen sheep, rather than see the thief subjected to the barbarous penalties of a Russian court-martial. In Mandingo Land Mungo Park was mistaken for a Portuguese slave-trader, nevertheless the pity of his destitute condition gradually overcame the hostility of the natives; so much, indeed, that they volunteered to relieve his wants by joint contributions from their own rather scanty store of comestibles. Even among the bigoted peasants of northern Italy the butcheries of the Holy Inquisition at first provoked a fierce insurrection in favor of the condemned heretics. In India and Siam some two hundred million of our fellow-men are so unable to overcome their horror of bloodshed that in time of famine they have frequently preferred to starve to death rather than satisfy their hunger by the slaughter of a fellow creature.

A diet of flesh food has, indeed, a decided influence in developing those truculent propensities which our moralists have often been misled to ascribe to the promptings of a normal instinct. In our North American Indians, for instance, a nearly exclusively carnivorous diet has engendered all the propensities of a carnivorous beast; but the next relatives of those sanguinary nomads, the agricultural Indios of Mexico and Central America, are about as mild-natured as their Hindostan fellow-vegetarians, while Science and tradition agree in contrasting the customs of flesh-eating hunters and herders with the frugal habits of our earliest ancestors. The primitiv instincts of the human soul are clearly averse to cruelty.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

The apologists of Supernaturalism have frequently insisted on the distinction between naturally advantageous and naturally thankless virtues. Under the former head they would, for instance, include Temperance and Perseverance; under the latter, charity and the love of enemies—thus arguing for the necessity of assuming an other-worldly chance of recompense for the unselfish merits of a true saint.

But a humane disposition is, on the whole, quite natural enough to dispense with the promis of preternatural rewards. Good-will begets good-will; benevolence is the basis of friendship, while malice begets ill-will, and is apt to betray its claws in spite of the soft-gloved disguise of polite formalities.

A humane master is better served than a merciless despot; his dependants identify his interests with their own; his family, his tenants, his very cattle, thrive as in an atmosphere of sunshine, while habitual unkindness blights every blessing and cancels all merits. Mental ability seems rather to aggravate the odium of a cruel disposition, while, on the other hand, we are almost ashamed to notice the mental or physical shortcomings of a kind-hearted man. Intellectual attainments have never reconciled the world to the demerits of a spiteful despot. Tiberius, the most abhorred of all the imperial monsters of tyrant-ridden Rome, was, next to Julian, mentally perhaps the most gifted of Cæsar's successors. Philip the Second was the most astute, as well as the most powerful, sovereign of his century, but his cold blooded inhumanity prevented him from ever becoming a popular hero. Henry the Eighth's services to the cause of Protestantism did not save him from the execrations of his Protestant subjects. Pedro el Cruel was probably the most enlightened man of his nation, a friend of science in an age of universal ignorance, a protector of Jews and Moriscoes in an age of universal bigotry. But his delight in refinements of cruelty made him so hateful that at the first opportunity his Trinitarian and Unitarian subjects joined in a revolt which the tyrant tried in vain to appease by promises of the most liberal reforms.

Tolerance, properly speaking, is nothing but common humanity, applied to the settlement of religious controversies; the essential principle of civilization is humanity applied to the daily commerce of neighbors and neighboring nations. Superior humanity alone has founded the prestige of more than one potentially inferior nation.

A benevolent disposition, moreover, finds its own reward in the fact that the order of the visible universe is, in the main, founded on a benevolent plan. The system of Nature, with all the apparent ferity of her destructive moods, tends on the whole to insure the greatest possible happiness of the greatest possible number, and the natural inclination of the benevolent man is therefore in sympathy, as it were, with the current of cosmic tendencies; his mind is in tune with the harmony of Nature.

C.—PERVERSION.

The unparalleled inhumanities of the medieval bigots seem to form a strange contrast with the alleged humanitarian precepts of the Galilean prophet, but were nevertheless the inevitable consequence of a doctrine aimed at the suppression of the natural instincts of the human soul. "Whatever is pleasant is wrong," was the shibboleth of a creed that has been justly defined as a "worship of sorrow," and the practice of the self-denying virtues was valued chiefly in proportion to their afflictiveness. Herbert Spencer, in his "Data of Ethics," has demonstrated with absolutely conclusive logic that the universal practice of altruism (i.e., the subordination of personal to alien interests) would lead to social bankruptcy, but the clear recognition of that result would have been only an additional motive in recommending its promotion to the world-renouncing fanaticism of the Galilean Buddhist. Secular advantages were more than foreign to the purposes of his reform. "Divest yourself of your earthly possessions," was the sum of his advice to salvation-seeking inquirers. "Renounce! renounce!"—not in order to benefit your worldly-minded neighbor, but to mortify your own worldliness. Abandon the path of earthly happiness—not in order to make room for the crowding multitude, but in order to guide your own steps into the path of other-worldliness. Disinterestedness, in the Christian sense, meant the renunciation of all earthly interests whatever; and the same moralist who commands his disciple to love his enemies also bids him hate his father, mother, sister, brother, and friends.

"Seek everything that can alienate you from the love of earth; avoid everything that can rekindle that love," would be at once the rationale and the summary of the Galilean doctrine. Shun pleasure, welcome sorrow; hate your friends, love your enemies. It might seem as if precepts of that sort were in no danger of being followed too literally. We can love only lovely things. We cannot help finding hatefulness hateful. We cannot relish bitterness. We might as well be told to still our hunger with icicles or cool our thirst with fire. But even in its ultimate tendencies the religion of Antinaturalism was anything but a religion of love. The suppression of physical enjoyments, the war against freedom, against health and reason, was not apt to increase the sum of earthly happiness; and the sense of tolerance—nay, the instinct of common humanity and justice—was systematically blunted by the worship of a god to whom our ancestors for thirty generations were taught to ascribe what Feuerbach justly calls "a monstrous system of favoritism: arbitrary grace for a few children of luck, and millions foredoomed to eternal damnation." "The exponents of that dogma," says Lecky, "attributed to the creator acts of injustice and barbarity which it would be absolutely impossible for the imagination to surpass, acts before which the most monstrous excesses of human cruelty dwindle into insignificance, acts which are, in fact, considerably worse than any that theologians have attributed to the devil."

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

The Millennium of Madness, as a modern Freethinker calls the thousand years' reign of the Galilean superstition, might with equal justice be called the Age of Inhumanity. "The greater possible misery of the greatest possible number" seems to have been the motto of the medieval dogmatists, and, short of any plan involving the total destruction of the human race, it seems, indeed, not easy to imagine a more effective system for crowding the greatest conceivable amount of suffering into a given space of time. In the pursuit of their chimeras fanatics have never shrunk from sacrificing the happiness of their fellow-men; class interests have made patricians callous to the sufferings of the poor, and revolted pariahs to the fate of the rich, but in the party warfare of antiquity cruelty was merely a means for the attainment of enlarged opportunities of enjoyment. But to the maniacs of the Middle Ages inhumanity seems to have become an end as well as a means. They inflicted misery for its own sake; they waged a persistent war against happiness itself, and their sect-founders vied in the suppression of sympathy with every natural instinct of the human heart. "If any sect," says Ludwig Boerne, "should ever take it into their heads to worship the devil in his distinctive qualities, and devote themselves to the promotion of human misery in all its forms, the catechism of such a religion could be found ready-made in the code of several monastic colleges."

Dissenters were murdered, and converts, under the full control of their spiritual taskmasters, were doomed to a slower, but hardly less cruel death, by wearing out their lives with penance and renunciation.

"According to that code," says Henry Buckle, "all the natural affections, all social pleasures, all amusements, and all the joyous instincts of the human heart were sinful. . . . The clergy looked on all comforts as sinful in themselves, merely because they were comforts. The great object of life was to be in a state of constant affliction. Whatever pleased the senses was to be suspected. It mattered not what a man liked; the mere fact of his liking it made it sinful. Whatever was natural was wrong."

The dogma of salvation by faith seemed to make the enforced propagation of that faith a sacred duty, and soon drenched the face of the earth with the blood of pagans and dissenters; the worship of sorrow drove thousands to devote themselvs and their children to a life of perpetual penance; and the insanities of the hideous superstition culminated in that dogma of eternal hell tortures that deprived its converts of the last solace of nature, and barred the last gate of escape from the horrors of existence.

E.—REFORM.

The skeptic Holbach, and several of his philosophical friends, directed the keenest shafts of their logic against the doctrin of eternal punishment, and never wearied of repeating that the belief in a merciless God naturally tends to fill the world with merciless bigots. "How insignificant," they argued, "the occasional sufferings of a transient life on earth must appear to the converts of John Calvin, who held that about nine-tenths of the human race are foredoomed to an eternity of nameless and hopeless tortures. How absurd they must deem the complaints of a life-weary wretch, who, ten to one, will soon look back to the comparative bliss of that life as to the happiness of a lost Eden." The Universalists are fond of enlarging on the moral of that theme, yet from a wider point of view their objections might be extended to the entire doctrine of other-worldliness, since Holbach's argument might find its exact analogue in the dogma of post mortem compensation. "His soul will be the gainer," thought the Crusader who had demonstrated the dangers of unbelief by smashing a Moorish skull, "and if he should die his spirit will enter the gates of the New Jerusalem." "Oh, the ingratitude," actually said a priest of the Spanish-American land robbers, "the ingratitude of the wretches who grudge us the territories of their base earthly kingdoms and forget that our gospel offers them a passport to the glorious kingdom of heaven!" "The ingratitude!" repeats the modern pharisee, "the base ingratitude of those factory children who grudge me the privileges of my position, and clamor for an increase of wages to gratify their worldly desires. Consumption? Hunger? Frost? should not the rich promises of the gospel compensate such temporal inconveniences, and hav I not founded a Sabbath-school to save them from the lusts of their unregenerate souls?"

Only a few months ago a Chinese philosopher acquainted us with the verdict of his countrymen on the "gospel of love" that sends its missionaries on ships loaded with brandy and opium, and escorted by armadas for the demolition of seaports that might refuse to admit the cargo of spirituous and spiritual poisons.

Secularism, the religion of Nature, should teach our brethren that their highest physical and their highest moral welfare can be only conjointly attained, and that cramping misery stunts the soul, as well as the body of its victim. It should preach the solidarity of human interests which prevents the oppressor from enjoying the fruits of his inhumanity, and makes the curses of his dependents, nay, even the mute misery of his starving cattle, react on the hap piness of a cruel master. It should expose the business methods of the humanitarians who propose to silence the clamors of their famished brethren with consecrated wafers and drafts on the bank of the New Jerusalem.

The Christian duty of transferring our love from our friends to our enemies may be one of those virtues that have to await their recompense in a mysterious hereafter, but natural humanity can hope to find its reward on this side of the grave.

Bible Biology and Evolution.

Biology, or the science which treats of all forms of animated matter, like physiology and paleontology, is a very young science. Man has regarded living forms in the light of "special creations" for so many thousands of years that it required an age of great and general intellectual enlightenment to be reached before even the most courageous among men of science would be bold enough to study any forms of life apart from the generally accepted view of theology. For they would doubtless reason that if God created every living thing either out of the water or out of the earth, it was but reasonable to suppose that he made them very much as we find them today. If, for instance, God made a wolf or a bear, and if it is admitted that like always produces like, then it would be rational to conclude that wolves and bears would remain wolves and bears for all time. On the other hand, if God made man, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, by parity of reasoning it would be rational to conclude that man would remain man forever. And if there were any variations they would be merely slight and unimportant, and insufficient to cause the slightest doubt that all men were brothers, and proceeded from the original genus homo.

But when men of science came to study geology with an open mind, and with sufficient courage to proclaim the results of their investigations and deductions, it was found that the order, according to the Bible, in which the forms of life made their appearance on the earth was totally wrong, and that, whereas, Genesis says that they appeared in the following order: 1. Fishes and birds; 2. Mammalia and reptils; 3. Man; science reveals the fact that the proper order was: 1. Crustacea; 2. Fishes; 3. Reptils and birds; 4. Mammalia generally; 5. Man. Indeed, geology demonstrates that we hav millions and billions of fossil shells in the Cambrian period, long before the existence of fishes; then the great fish period of the Devonian period; then the Saurian period; long afterward come the archaic animals of the mammoth family; then those still nearer approaching the types of animals belonging to the history of man; and finally man with his contemporaries. It will thus be seen that we hav six periods instead of three. To go more minutely into the subject, it may be said that in the Plutonic or unstratified series no life-forms appear, the conditions not being favorable; when, however, we come to the stratified rocks we find in the Palæozoic (or primary formations), which is subdivided into seven periods:

1. Laurentian, containing fossil remains of the foraminifera, some of the first living organisms.

2. Huronian, containing fossil remains of the lower organized molluscs.

3. Cambrian, containing fossil remains of sponges, sea weeds, star fishes, sea lilies, lowly shell-fish, marine worms, and the first land-plants.

4. Silurian, fossil remains of coral, chambered spiral shell-fish, crabs, sea worms, and bony plates and scales of a low form of fish.

5. Devonian, fossil land plants, fishes belonging to shark, ray, and sturgeon families, and first fossil insect.

6. Carboniferous, fossil scorpions, beetles, and amphibians.

7. Permian, fossil reptils.

In the secondary division:

1. Triassic, gigantic reptils and first mammals (small marsupials).

2. Jurassic, or oölitic bird reptils, and several species of marsupials.

3. Cretaceous, fossils of new bird-reptils.

In the tertiary division:

1. Eocene (dawn of recent life), consisting of sandstone, limestone, sands, clays, marls, coral rags, and lignites, and containing fossil equine forms, birds, reptils, bats, and marsupials.

2. Meiocene, containing fossil apes and marsupials.

3. Pleiocene, fossil apes, bears, and hyenas.

4. Pleistocene, fossil remains of apes and men, and implements of stone, bone, and horn, etc.

The above list I hav abbreviated from Dr. Hardwicke's work on "Creation and Evolution," and, having compared it with some standard works on geology, find it quite accurate.

Now, the science of paleontology supports geology entirely in establishing the above order of living forms on the earth.

What is the evidence of paleontology?

1. Certain flint implements hav been discovered in certain strata of the earth that indicate the great antiquity of man.

2. These flint implements are found side by side with the bones of the extinct animals.

3. The skulls of human beings are found in caves, also with the remains of extinct animals; and generally the flora and fauna of the earth afford unmistakable evidence in corroboration of the doctrin of evolution. Sir John Lubbock in his work on "Pre-Historic Times," after examining the evidence of paleontology, says that the "so-called flint instruments are undoubtedly of human workmanship;" secondly, that they are of the same age as the beds in which they are found; and lastly, of a human skull found by Dr. Schmerling in the cave of Gugis, he says: "There seems no reason to doubt that it really belonged to a man who was contemporaneous with the mammoth, the cave bear, and other extinct mammalia."

Sir Chas. Lyell supports this view, in his "Antiquity of Man;" Karl Vogt, in his address to the German Scientific and Medical Society, and, indeed, all men of science of position and reputation.

But to turn from generalities to particulars.

In 1774 a scientist named J. F. Esper made a discovery in Bavaria of the remains of human bones mingled with remains of the Northern bear and other species then unknown; in 1797 John Frere, an Englishman, made a similar discovery.

In 1826 Tournal, of Narbonne, made some important discoveries in Aude, France, where he found bones of the bison and reindeer cut and carved by the hand of man, together with remains of edible shell fish, which must hav been brought there by some one who dwelt there.

Later, in 1833, Schmerling found in some caverns in Belgium two human skulls surrounded by teeth of rhinoceros, elephant, and bear.

In 1842, and again in 1847, important discoveries were made in Devonshire in England at a place called Kent's Cavern; while in 1857 the Neanderthal skull was discovered, of which Professor Huxley wrote that it was "the most brutal of all known human skulls, resembling those of the ape."

Discoveries of a remarkable character were made in 1863 and 1864 of human remains along with bones of mammoth, rhinoceros, and other extinct animals. Still later, in 1868, in the valley of the Seine portions of human skeletons were found in the same beds where paleolithic implements had been embedded.

This, then, is some of the paleontological evidence—evidence which not only demonstrates the vast antiquity of man, but shows also the gradual, evolutionary process which has been going on through the vast epochs over which the lives of extinct animals and man hav stretched.

But to understand the wide-reaching character of this evolutionary method in nature we must glance for a while at the known facts of general biology.

For this purpose let us take Haeckel's statement on the subject. In his "Pedigree of Man," Professor Haeckel givs the following order to the appearance of living forms on the earth:

First, the "Moneron," a stuctureless albuminous atom of bioplasm, which is so simple a form of life as to be even without a cell.

We hav, then, this protoplasm developing into, firstly, a number of single nucleated cells, called Amœbæ, and these in turn into masses of nucleated cells, called Synamœbæ. After these comes Cilata, which consist of Synamœbæ, covered with vibratil cilia. From these we go to Gastræada, and from these again to a low form of worm called Turbellaria; then by slow processes are evolved from these lowly forms Acrania, or first vetebrate animals, "without shells, brains, central heart, jaws, or limbs, but with a true vertebral cords." We thus reach the first vertebrate class. But of these there are eight classes:

1. Lancelet, or Amphioxas.
2. Cyclostoma.
3. Pisces.
4. Dipnoi.
5. Amphibia.
6. Reptilia.
7. Aves.
8. Mammalia.

Then there are fourteen orders of Mammalia from the water Monotremata (Ornithorhynchus) to the Simiæ (apes). Then we come to species of anthropoid apes, and lastly to man. Haeckel's arrangement of these latter are as follows:

|---|---|
| | ANTHROPOIDA. |
| Asiatic (Satyri). Brachycephali. | 1. Lesser Orang (Satyrus Moris).2. Greater Orang (Satyrus Orang). |
| African Pongines. Dolichocephali. | 1. Chimpanzee (Pongo Troglodytes).2. Gorilla (Pongo Grilla). |
| | HOMINES. |
| Wooly-haired. Ulotrichi. Dolichocephali. | 1. Papuan (Homo Papua).2. Hottentot (Homo Hottentot).3. Caffre (Homo Cafer).4. Negro (Homo Niger). |
| Straight-haired (Lissotrichi). Mostly Brachycephali or Mesocephali; a few Dolichocephali. | 5. Australian (Homo Australis).6. Malay (Homo Polynesius).7. Mongol (Homo Mongolus).8. Polar Man (Homo Arcticus).9. American (Homo Americanus).10. Caucasian (Homo Mediterranium). |

Now, if we take the above statement of the evolutionary process in the order of the development of living forms, we shall find by careful investigation that it is corroborated in every particular by the sister sciences, geology, paleontology, and biology.

Nor is this all. The evolutionist carries his investigation still further. He studies the animal form in the fœtus, and finds that at various stages the brain of the human being resembles that of fish, reptile, bird, etc., and so on until it reaches the highest degree of development, viz., the human. So that many scientists declare to-day that the history of the human being in the fœtus is "a picture in little or outline of the history of the race."

Here, then, we hav ample evidence of the ignorance of the Biblical writers. Science teaches, the facts of geology demonstrate, that the age of the earth is to be measured not by thousands, but probably millions of years; that the earth has undergone numerous changes of which there is no mention in historic times. Paleontology, as Haeckel well says, "furnishes us at the present time in many ways the most reliable and most accessible kind of evidence as to the order of creation in the past. For the fossils, or petrified remains of plants and animals, that we meet with in the sedimentary strata of the earth's crust are, in truth, the fossil remains or impressions of those organisms, long dead, that hundreds of thousands or many millions of years before peopled our earth. Among these organisms, also, in conformity with evolution, must hav been the veritable ancestors of the species of plants and animals in existence to-day, and the allies more or less closely related of those dead and gone ancestors. Hence, our naturalists, especially those who wish to proceed as carefully and exactly as is possible, as well as those who would extend paleontology yet further, place in that science their greatest hope, and regard it as the sole reliable evidence in favor of phylogeny."

But it will be said, "If the doctrin of evolution takes us back by gradual stages to the lowest form of life, which we find to be a protoplasmic germ, what theory does the evolutionist accept in regard to the origin of life?" The evolutionist does not pretend to giv an authoritativ answer to the question. But he has his belief. It is this. Matter is indestructible; force is also indestructible; and combinations of matter and force cause all the phenomena of the universe. To use the memorable words of Professor Tyndall, in his address to the British Association in 1876, the evolutionist "closes with Giordano Bruno, and recognizes in nature the universal mother that produces all phenomena as the fruit of her own womb, without the meddling of the gods."

Animate life, the evolutionist believes, evolved out of what is called "inanimate matter." Is this unreasonable? Every particle of matter in the universe is in motion, every atom in constant activity. How do we know that any particular atom is dead? What we call death is merely change. No! The doctrin of evolution involves the affirmation that matter and force contain the potentiality of all forms of life. Life is motion. The sun's motion on its axis, the moon's revolution round the earth, the growing trees, the running rivers, the surging waves of the sea, are all manifestations of life; and just as the vegetable and animal kingdoms are continually unfolding from simple forms to complex, so the vast universe is one ceaseless, but gradual, unfolding of natural forces; and this evolution seems likely to go on forever.

News and Notes.

Rockport, Mo., is six miles off the railroad among the rolling hills, whose main productions are corn and hogs, and orthodoxy. Freethought is something new in these regions, and is almost as unknown as the whistle of the locomotiv. To be off the railroad nowadays is to be almost a century behind the times, and Rockport rejoices in this ancient atmosphere. However, I enjoyed my sojourn in this rural community. Rockport is a pretty village. It has a stately court-house, being the county seat. There are seven churches among the two or three hundred dwelling-houses that are submerged among a multitude of shade trees that were glittering with the changing hues of autumn, and in the glorious sunlight made music as the prairie winds swept over them.

I felt happy in this retired and luxuriant spot, where fruits and flowers are so plentiful, and the wealth of harvest gleams on the billowing landscape. Besides, I found some royal Liberals here, who hav borne the brunt of the battle for many a day through every vicissitude, and who are still brave and hopeful. The pleasant home of Mr. and Mrs. G. G. Beck was a haven where no discouragement can come to the Secular pilgrim, for here was devotion to thought and the open heart and hand. It seems that Beck is a good Freethought name, for from the East to the West I find its bearers in the van of progress, and in the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER these bold iconclasts can send greeting to one another. Besides my friend Beck, there is M. M. Klein, Oran Moore, S. S. Hughes, and others—not many, but true and forward-looking. S. S. Hughes belongs to the transcendental company, and likes to think that the "Oversoul" is in all things. He is something after the fashion of Emerson. But he has no dogma, and holds his gentle faith in the spirit of fraternity. There is room and verge enough for all such in the camp of Freethought.

I gave two lectures in the Opera House, where Remsburg had preceded me with his vigorous utterances. The audiences were small, and if I had been speaking on any other subject than Freethought I should hav given up in despair, but I knew the future was with our side, and so I bide my time. Rockport will not always be as sleepy as it is. It will hear the thunders of reform with the whistle of the locomotiv. It will know that this world moves, and a dead Christianity will not always fling its shadow over these lovely scenes. Corn and hogs may continue to flourish, but orthodoxy must seek its heavenly abode where "the woodbine twineth," as the waves of life come surging over these fruitful lands.

I am glad, however, I did not wind up my campaign at Rockport, but that the bright consummation came at Shenandoah, Iowa, where I had on Sunday afternoon and evening two of the largest audiences I hav greeted this year, and so whatever courage I might hav lost was regained amid this splendid promis. This is where Mrs. Krekel lectured some years ago, and produced a wonderful sensation which is not yet forgotten, and the life of those Freethought discourses is in the air to-day, and made a part of its triumph.

I enjoyed while here the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Holcomb, and Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Humphreys. Dr. Humphreys has an orthodox brother who still preaches the gospel of damnation with a grim faith that no amount of knowledge can discompose. However, the balance is kept up by another brother, A. G. Humphrey, of Galesburg, Ill., who can wield an incisiv pen for truth, and his criticism of the so-called "Christian science" is one of the keenest I hav read, and it simply demolishes this modern instance of Brahmanic philosophy.

I was glad also to meet Mr. and Mrs. Hedgecock, subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so, of course, old friends, though I met them for the first time here. Colonel Baker, who introduced me at the lectures, S. Smith, S. A. Thomas, Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Farnham, Edwin Gregg, and many others are our bright and progressiv spirits in this Eden-like country, which in the October sun is rich with harvest gold.

Every way Shenandoah has been a delightful field of labor. I came across a college chum whom I had not seen for twenty-five years, and old Dartmouth days came back—when all the world was beautiful, and romance thrilled the heart. I sometimes wish I were back again, that I might dream the glorious dreams once more.

We just escaped the rain—a bright space between the storm of Saturday and of Sunday night—but Monday dawned magnificently. Massiv and brilliant clouds swept along the shining blue. The vast prairies rolled away, and mingling green, and gold, and brown were in the fresh landscapes, and lustrous groves wavered in a thousand ranks against the sky. It was a day for hope and joy, and with dreams of fire I hurried the locomotiv onward to the glittering East. I am now in Chicago, where everything rushes furiously along, as if there were but a day to liv. I heard George Francis Train last night, and he is, indeed, the lightning express. He makes the sparks fly. He says that he stands on the top of the universe and sees all things. He expects to liv to be two hundred years old. He is pleading for the Anarchists in his wild, vigorous way, and I am glad of it, for what a horror it will be if these men are hung! Who can predict the far-reaching results of such an awful injustice?

I look forward to a successful Congress. Our Chicago friends, as usual, are earnest and generous in their efforts. I expect a new impulse and greater practical instrumentalities for Liberal advancement. I may be at Alliance, O., October 23d, and shall be at Farmdale, October 29th and 30th, to lecture.

Arrangements immediately after the Congress will be made for a lecture tour to the West again, to the Pacific coast, California, Oregon, and Washington Territory. The work of this year has opened vast fields of labor, and we must keep in the harness.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

MINIER, ILL., Oct. 2d and 3d.—This is a prairie village, but its people are enterprising and genuinly progressiv. The Liberals comprise the best cultured and most prosperous people of the town, and are as broad in their views and as generous as their boundless prairies. They hav a little society here for the dissemination of Liberal and scientific advanced thought among the people. All with prompt alacrity under the inspiring lead of the young merchant prince, S. S. Tanner, chip in their five dollars apiece, and from the earnest interest evinced in the lectures I judge the people appreciate the efforts made to educate them up out of the ruts of superstition. If there were only a real practical organization of Liberals, with a lecture and publication bureau, Minier would be a most powerful auxiliary.

HAVANA, ILL., Oct. 4th.—Under the pilotage of H. A. McHarry, of Mason City, I visited Havana. Mr. McHarry has been a Methodist exhorter and revivalist, and although he has emerged from the darkness of superstition, he retains all the fire, zeal, energy, and the propaganda spirit that made him such a power in the Methodist church. Mr. McHarry is a Spiritualist of the Elias H. Gault description, and an energetic, self-sacrificing Liberal. The notice at Havana was short, but under the rallying of the young enthusiasts there a goodly number attended the lecture, and I had assurances that it resulted in several new recruits, as well as cheering the dear old veterans and affording some of them new ammunition to fire into the ranks of the enemy. I greatly enjoyed my brief sojourn with the Liberals of Havana, and shall bear their earnest request to return to them at very first opportunity in kindly remembrance.

WESTFIELD, ILL., Oct. 5th, 6th, and 7th.—I made earnest efforts to reach Westfield in time for my appointment on the evening of October 5th. At Midland City I took the Chicago & Ohio River Railroad. They now call it the Dansville & Olney. Travelers, take note; don't take that road. If you are compelled to go in its direction, hire a small boy and a wheelbarrow; you will get there much sooner and ride quite as comfortably. I was informed that the train went not that night beyond the city of Kansas, but there I should find a good livery if I desired to go on to Westfield, and a large hotel if I stayed over. Kansas is a Christianized mud-hole—a huddle of shanties out on the prairie. The hotel! I took, or attempted to take, one meal there; it is the baddest bad even among the detestable abortions called hotels in this section. I found the livery stable, and paid the enterprising keeper $3 to take me to Westfield, less than nine miles. We started with two dilapidated equine monstrosities and a light buggy, and rushed over the distance with the velocity of a tortoise. We beat the record of all other teams of Kansas; we made a mile every fifteen minutes, and by bribing the driver to urge them to the utmost the horses kept up that rate of speed, and we made nine miles over reasonably good roads in two hours and fifteen minutes. On arrival the Jehu declared, with a sigh of relief and satisfaction, "There, I told yer I'd get yer thar;" and he had—9.15 P.M. The audience had departed an hour ago. Westfield is a conundrum to me. It is a village of magnificent distances, and in the days of long, long ago evinced great enterprise, but orthodox piety struck it and mildewed it. I traveled its length and breadth, and everywhere, like the dead king, was evidence of D. K.; yet there is some show of effort to throw off the fatal inertia. Messrs. Biggs and White, Liberals, hav built a handsome brick store, and over it a fine large hall or opera house, and there are three or four other brick buildings in the village, showing on the part of some an unwillingness to yield to the moldering stagnation; and I sincerely hope this spirit of enterprise will win a grand victory, for it is a most beautiful and picturesque location. Instead of the eternal prairie flat, it is hills and dales and woods. While I was there the gaudy hues of autumnal foliage delighted the eye, and made beautiful variety of scenery in all directions. There are a few right-royal, generous hearts in Westfield and vicinity; several came many miles to attend the lectures. Charley Biggs, as his kindly, generous nature prompts old and young to call him, is a worker for Freethought. He and his uncle are a power for good in the community. The first night a few ladies came, but left before the lecture was fairly begun. The next night's attendance was very much larger, and had about twenty ladies who stayed through, and nearly all asked for and took home Liberal papers. One young man, a member of the most aristocratic and pious family in the place, declared his conversion to Liberalism.

It is hard, up-hill work for one or two to hav to stem the current of sectarian hate and ostracism. Oh, how much we need a national organization that could help the noble, worthy workers in small towns!

TUSCOLA, ILL., Oct. 9th and 10th.—Quite a goodly attendance greeted me at the Opera House here on Sunday afternoon. The genial face of the editor of the Republican, the leading newspaper of the county, smiled appreciation of each point made. The lecture was well received, and a large turn-out in the evening was promised. But ere evening shades arrived came the dark clouds and torrents of rain, and kept at it all night long. I groped my way to the Opera House in the black, damp darkness because I thought it duty to go, not really expecting anyone would be there, but had quite a gathering, including one bright, handsome lady. I did not learn her name, but she is a heroin, or, in other words, a true woman. Monday evening there was a very large attendance, but it was not till Tuesday morning that I realized the interest awakened. I had to leave on the 7 A.M. train, yet that early hour found everywhere the lectures the subject of talk and discussion. Some declared if their hired help ever attended another Liberal lecture they would discharge them; some claimed the law should prevent such lectures; some tried to defend their faith. I imagin that later in the day it must hav been real lively. I am now on my way to Olney. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Mr. Jamieson's Land Boom.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Letters from Liberals are still coming to me as a result of the two or three articles which hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER this summer over my signature. Perhaps this letter may dampen their enthusiasm. Some of the few Liberals here, I learn, are not exactly pleased because, in reply to one correspondent, who inquired if there are "many Liberals here," I answered, "No." They are of the opinion that I ought to hav said, "Yes." I am writing these letters, and hav a way of my own. My friend says, "There are many Liberals in this valley, but they keep still about it." This is doubtless the reason why I hav not discovered them. I do not count a man a Liberal who does not count himself. The Christian's test of loyalty to his faith is a readiness to "stand up for Jesus!" When I find so-called Liberals helping to build churches, never subscribing for a Freethought paper, never paying a dollar a year for a course of Liberal lectures, never using their influence to get a Liberal lecturer into their town for fear of damaging their popularity with orthodox Christians, I say, Deliver us from such Liberals! They do not stand up for Liberalism. They are too weak and faint-hearted to make a ripple as they float down the stream of time. So, if there are many Liberal of that vapid sort in this valley, this is a great disadvantage to begin with. We need some live Liberals; men of sterling integrity, and women; men of convictions, who are not afraid to avow them; yet, obtruding them on none, respecting the rights of all, genial and gentlemanly.

Disadvantage No. 2.—Little rain. July and August are called the "rainy season." In those two months, I verily believe, the rainfall was not equal to a half-day Michigan shower.

Disadvantage No. 3.—The land is supplied with water by irrigation. If the water is purchased, the cost is from $1 to $2 an acre each season; $1 in this part of Colorado. Farmers hav formed irrigating companies. This affords them water at much more reasonable rates. Such stock companies are, however, managed with too much business looseness. Time and experience will correct their mistakes.

Disadvantage No. 4.—The richest land is covered with a growth of greasewood and chico. It costs from $1 to $1.50 an acre to get it grubbed fit to plow.

Disadvantage No. 5.—Fencing is necessary.

Disadvantage No. 6.—Some portions are alkali and adobe land.

Disadvantage No. 7.—Stone and timber are twenty to thirty miles from the central portion of the valley.

In some future article I will turn a few of these disadvantages into blessings.

I hav been requested by a number of Liberal correspondents to organize a Liberal settlement in the San Luis Park. If twenty-five heads of families will pledge themselvs to come, and will bear their share of the necessary expenses for printing, postage, stationery, advertising, travel, and time, I will devote myself to making the settlement a success, and secure homes on free government land (aside from land office fees) to the amount of 160 acres to 320 for each family. Here is a chance to better your condition, each man to own his own farm in independence. No use to let Christians take all this land. For particulars address W. F. JAMIESON.

Two Open Letters to Prominent Men.

UNTAXED PROPERTY.

To James Gordon Bennett, Esq., Proprietor of the New York Herald:

SIR: In the Herald's issue of the 7th inst. is a notice of Surrogate Rollins's decision under the collateral inheritance law that the large bequests by the late Henrietta Lenox to religious corporations are not liable to taxation.

This decision is directly in the teeth of Magna Charta, and insults every taxpayer not of the Lenox sect, for which those who procured, as well as those who made, the law through knaves or fools as legislators deserve castigation, and to be declared outlaws forever. For there is no imaginable excuse for it, for why should you or I be compelled to pay taxes to protect or to improve the value of property of any sect whose principles we may abhor as being actually blasphemous? The Lenox family is of the Scotch Calvinistic heresy, and if disciples are no better than their master Calvin, or the syndics of Geneva, what their master and his followers hav done, that would they do again if favored as they seek to be by having us to pay their taxes and protect their property without remuneration; for should a mob assault their church the city is obliged to pay for it. They may be very quiet now upon the homely farmer's maxim that "the still sow sucks the swill," but the only principle on which real patriots and statesmen act is that what has been will again occur when circumstances favor like developments. What, then, has been the case in Scotland from Scotch Calvinism? What the feeling against all sects but their own?

The answer may be found in the paraphrase of Holy Willie's prayer by Robert Burns, of which three verses will be quite sufficient to exhibit its true spirit. Allow me to quote from memory, and pray for the correction by your devil if not well spelled:

O thou wha in the heavens dost dwell,
Wha, as it pleases best thysel',
Sends ane to heaven and ten to hell
A' for thy glory,
And no for any gude or ill
They've done afore thee;

We bless and praise thy matchless might,
When thousands thou hast left in night,
That I am here afore thy sight,
For gift an' grace,
A burnin' and a shinin' light
To a' this place.

Lord, bless thy servants in this place,
For thou hast here a chosen race;
But God confound their stubborn face,
An' blast their name,
Wha bring thy servants to disgrace
An' public shame.

New York, Oct., 1887. PRO BONO PUBLICO.

THE CLERGYMAN AND THE GYPSIES.

To Hon. Daniel Magone, Collector of the Port of New York:

SIR: Although I liv inland, and you are a dweller by the salt, salt sea, I hav a crow to pick with you, Mr. Magone. You were appointed to your present responsible position by a president who, in my opinion, for downright and direct honesty is the peer of any one of our American executivs, the immortal George not excepted.

I say this after having voted the Republican ticket from Fremont to, but not including, Blaine. I had to draw a line somewhere, and I used the chalk on Blaine, although I did not vote for Mr. Cleveland.

Any man who, with a great flourish of trumpets, to protect his wife's honor, commenced a lawsuit, and when the election was over ignominiously crawled out of a position of his own seeking, isn't fit for a ruler over sixty millions of people, and they very properly squelched him, and are certain to do so every time he asks their suffrages. Grover Cleveland's honest, square-toed "tell the truth" is like a diamond to French paste, and proclaims the difference in the two men.

There is an old aphorism, Mr. Magone, which reads, "Like master like man." I hav spoken thus of Mr. Cleveland's strongest point, honesty, in order to show you how you do not resemble him; for in what I am going to say to you I feel you are not honest, and that you know you are not honest.

From a letter to the Buffalo Courier of Oct. 1, 1887, it appears that the ministerial supply in our highly favored country is so limited that the church of the Holy Trinity in New York city, founded and built by the eccentric Rev. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, thought it necessary to import an English minister to take charge of said church.

Before this I was aware of the multitudinous commodities brought into the country through the custom house, but I was hardly prepared for an importation in the shape of a clergyman. A wise and level-headed Scotchman, one Mr. Kennedy, took the position that it was a violation of the contract labor law, as the new pastor's salary was fixed in advance. And right here we say the gentleman from the land o' cakes is, without doubt, honestly and absolutely correct in his position. However, you took a different view of it, and declined to send the imported preacher back to England. I could hav told in advance that you would do so. Why? Because who ever knew of a politician that failed to toady to the church? Politics and toadyism everlastingly go hand in hand.

But mark, Mr. Magone, how soon your views changed! About the same time, on the steamer Wyoming, came a band of English gypsies. How now about this "contract labor law?" The collector's mind is made up with astonishing celerity, and with adamantine firmness; the gypsies must go back whence they came. The point is made by the astute collector that they are, in effect, paupers.

Then it follows, as the night the day, that the imported preacher is a beggar. If they are strolling paupers, he is a religious beggar. What do these poor gypsies do? Why, most of us hav seen them along our byways and highways, with their Rosinante steeds tied to the trees, a fire kindled, corn taken, apples appropriated, and fortunes and the future told to confiding country folk.

In other words, they pretend to tell of the future—in this life only. What does your preacher, imported or otherwise, do? His pretense is to tell of the future beyond the tomb. Now, Mr. Magone, do you not know as well as we that in so far as the future life can be told, as far as the awful enigma of the grave can be solved, the gypsies are just as reliable as the preacher? Do you not know this? You certainly do, and if you were as honest as Mr. Cleveland, whose servant you are, you would hav put the preacher and the gypsies on precisely the same level, and that you did not do this is because you lack honesty, sincerity, and manliness. This is what ails you, Mr. Magone, and all your ilk, and I am afraid it will always be so.

If there is a more shabby set of unprincipled beggars, paupers, frauds, id omne genus, than the priests, preachers, and clergymen of our day, then I pity the gypsies, or any other class who prate of the future, about which their ignorance is too dense for discussion. Their hell is a myth knocked to smithereens by the "New Version;" their absurd fables about the structure of the universe banished to the unknown by science, and their scraps of nothing made into stars, blossomed into myriad and magnificent worlds through the agency of the modern astronomer.

Yet they trail along with their antiquated trash, hat in hand; a dollar here, a quarter there, a penny yonder, any trifling favor thankfully received; the most useless lot of mortals to day on this planet; and yet our statesmen (if we hav any), our politicians, and our millionaires toadying to them in order to use them to hoodwink the multitude, and thus fix on the minds of unborn millions the vagaries of countless past ages when man was only one remove from the monkey.

In conclusion, Mr. Magone, the next time a commodity comes through the custom house that you hav any doubts about, try and skirmish around and find a little honesty in your immediate neighborhood, and, my word for it, you will not make fish of one and fowl of another, as you hav in this instance; and I really hope honest, Scotch Mr. Kennedy will stick to you and make you send back the "contract labor" clergyman on the same vessel that carries the poor, unoffending gypsies. Hoping you may die an honest man, I remain, Sincerely yours,

ONONON.

Taxation of Church Property.

In these days of "supposed" general retrenchment in regard to public expenditure in our national affairs by the party now in power, why is it that we hear so little of late on the subject of taxation of church property?

I read, only a few days ago, in one of our local papers, that all church property that was taxable amounted to more than $50,000 in valuation.

Which, really, is the greater imposition on the public, the lying idle and unemployed of so much surplus revenue of the people's money in the national treasury vaults, or the silent permission of great and wealthy church corporations holding immense amounts of property, both real and personal, scot-free of all taxation?

Three hundred millions of money in the national treasury to-day, it is claimed, and that for the most part could be expended more liberally and generally for the public good, it would seem, than it really is, and seven hundred millions of church property in the land paying a pitiful sum of a half-million dollars of taxes to the government.

Is it not a burning shame when, by increased competition from foreign labor and other causes, the laboring man in this country, especially if he hav a family, is able to gain so "little" in the way of a livelihood, that these immense and overshadowing monopolies (not a whit better than such as are represented by Jay Gould or any other railway magnate) should be allowed to contribute so little toward the payment of the national debt and the running expenses of our national government?

When the small farmer or poor mechanic, or even small traders in the mercantil occupation, hav their taxes to pay on every extra two hundred dollars of personal property, certainly a better "rendering to Cæsar" should be observed by those who are supposed to teach justice, humanity, and righteous dealing for all men. THOS. J. CAMPBELL.

Maso, Kan.

Mere Superstition.

A logical old Presbyterian elder writes to the Sun:

"What is to become of our old theological doctrins? Where will the Westminster catechism land?

"The clergymen assembled to represent the entire Presbyterian church in the meeting of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, a few days since, found themselvs divided on the question of human probation beyond the grave.

"That subject involves all there is of what is understood as revealed religion.

"It amounts to this, viz.: All men die eternally in Adam. Those who are saved are saved by faith in Christ, who died for our sins.

"Now, if there is probation and consequently possible salvation beyond the grave, what was the object of the sacrifice of Christ?

"Did he, knowing of all the possibilities of human existence, here and hereafter, accept the humiliation of his incarnation, his life of degradation, and his most miserable death in order to accomplish an end which may be reached in another way? Is that possible?

"The Christian church has always preached salvation through faith only in Christ, or eternal perdition. That doctrin is the only reason why that church should exist. Drop that and the church falls to pieces.

"And yet there are men in the American board of commissioners for foreign missions who are willing to drop it.

"And, what is more, the defenders of the old doctrin seem to hav been very weak in the discussion held on that subject. The defense indicated a doubt. If the progressiv ideas of the present generation hav exploded the Christian religion, let us know it.

"If it has been ascertained that the faith is vain, let us throw off the yoke, for in that case it becomes mere superstition."

The elder is right. Christianity is either true or false. It cannot be both. Neither can it be partly true and partly false.. The probation-beyond-the-grave theory is a revolt of men's hearts against the cruelty of their creed. The desire that men shall escape hell does credit to their humanity, but their retention of the creed forever disables them as reasoners. The scheme laid down in the Bible is plain enough, and it is correctly stated by the Presbyterian elder. There is not in the whole Bible a single line authorizing the eschatological doctrin held by some of the faculty of Andover. According to the Bible, you go to hell or you go to heaven—which, depends upon whether you believe Jesus Christ is the son of God and died in the manner recorded as an expiation of the sins of men—sins incurred in the childish way related in the first fable of the book. The idea is, indeed, mere superstition.

Religion and Its Origin.

When we meet a man, a neighbor whom we know, with whom we hav done business, and with whose methods of action and manner of thinking we hav become conversant, we thereby become impressed with the conviction that he is an honest, rational man. On to-morrow we meet this same man, and in conversation with him we learn for the first time that he believes that a man said to hav been born eighteen hundred years ago, known by the name of Jesus Christ—that this man had been conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, and that henceforth he is going to renounce the world, the flesh, and the devil, and is going to seek a mansion in the skies.

What inferences would these facts legitimate? You would say at once, He is a little off. These facts, in themselvs, might not be sufficient to determin the point as to his sanity or insanity, but should you further be advised of the fact that this man to that end has sold all that he has, and has given it to the poor, this would seem to confirm your first impression that he is a little off. But suppose, still further, that he takes no thought for to-morrow as to what he shall wear or eat; you would think that you hav additional confirmation of your first impression. But he furnishes you with another item that still lends its support to your first impression. He prays, and he fasts, and he sees what a narrow escape he has had. He feels that he is a brand plucked from the burning, and if justice had been done him he would hav been in hell long ago. He begins to feel, in view of his redemption and the exposure of the entire race to endless perdition, that "woe is me if I preach not this gospel of my new master." And hence he begins to warn his neighbors, and assures them that they will all go to hell if they do not repent and believe as he does, and do as he has done. Surely your first impression would be more and more confirmed But suppose that a lack of confidence arises as to the wisdom of his method, and he is led to recognize the fact, and, in consequence thereof, becomes impatient, and draws around him a following of those who share in his delusion, and they espouse his cause, and he, through their proffered support, enforces his opinions under threats from his God and the coöperation of his followers, even unto the death of those who do not concede the truthfulness of his mission. This would surely confirm the opinion, not only that he is a little off, but that he is insane upon that point. Why would this conclusion be forced upon the thoughtful observer? Because he sees at once that the intellectual and moral faculties coördinated could not be pressed into such service. His acts are not rational. He is diseased. He has religion, and that is his mental disorder. It is a noteworthy fact that the symptoms in this disease are paralleled in those of other diseases.

The devotee discloses a morbid state—a loss of appetite, a furred tongue, and an unsteady, excitable pulse—of course varying according to the temperament of the devotee. All pathological criticism would concur in this opinion. The facts which we hav noted are surely a lawful outcome of this disease, just as clearly as in any case where a diagnosis has been made which would declare that insanity is present. But this is not all that has a bearing upon our definition. In the light of our definition we are permitted to read and understand the history of religion as we hav not under other definitions. Who are they who attempt to write up the history of religions who do not feel the constant necessity of writing in apologetical terms? Their history is so full of crimes, persecutions, and bloodshed, that some kind of reason must be assigned, and usually every possible reason but the true one is given. A thousand excuses are rendered to soften the frightful record revealed in the history of religion. One of the most telling apologies given is one that is made seemingly with the greatest confidence. Here it is: "These cruelties, charged upon religion, lose all of their force when we remember that they are the abuses of religion, but not religion itself." This sounds well, and it only lacks one thing, and that is, it is not true in any sense. If religion is fundamental in our nature, no such thing would or could be possible. But the theory of this apology is false at any rate. There is nothing admissible in the theory which allows the historian to divorce the acts of a people from the people, and then write their history. The history of a man, or a nation, is made up of the acts and gestures of both. Religion must, in like manner, be judged in the light of the data which it has made. We are not at liberty to sanction this decree of divorcement. Religion, therefore, must be studied in the light of the data which it has formulated through its evolution. The criminal records of religion cannot be isolated from it; they are to be considered in inseparable connection. This point will appear evident.

Take the case of John Calvin in the murder of Servetus. Here is a terrible crime. Thousands, yes, many thousands, like it in the history of the Christian religion. No history of John Calvin can be complete with this murder left out. This act of his is the key to his history. There could hav been no real cause for this cold-blooded murder in the relation existing between himself and Servetus. Servetus had done him no wrong, yet without the slightest reasonable provocation he did the horrid deed. Was this a murder in any proper sense? There were no reasons existing between the two men to suggest such a crime. Mr. Calvin had religion and the liver complaint, the latter he had for twenty years; ample time to render eminent assistance in organizing a special religious enthusiasm which would tend to break up moral and intellectual coördination—religious insanity following. When a man has a severe attack of religion, seen in the breaking up of mental equilibrium, and at the same time the liver complaint, he is not to be trusted. He is fatally diseased, and needs more pity than censure. We hav here John Calvin's mental and physical condition—a result of having two of the most fatal diseases known to mankind. Herein we hav a reasonable defense of John Calvin; he had religion in its most fatal form. In hearing the evidence in this case, we must pronounce the prisoner at the bar insane, and hold religion responsible for the crime of murder in the first degree. In his interest we must say that the intellectual and moral powers could not hold mental empire in the presence of such a fate as that which befell Servetus. They had no coördination in consciousness, and hence we giv him the benefit of having religion, a disease in the insane form. Millions of human beings hav been put to death through like agencies and under similar circumstances. Is it possible for the clear-headed intellects of this age to imagin that these cruelties would hav taken place had it not been for this religious insanity? We are willing to concede that, usually, the perpetrators of these cruelties thought that they were doing right.

Religion being a disease, this fact is accounted for. And this is in exact accord with the history of insane people. They are always the injured party; religion being a disease—a mental malady—and hence the victims of this disease are always those whom the rest of the world is plotting against. And thus it is these insane cruelties are so intimately interwoven in the history of religion: this dreadful disease—I say dreadful—for what has ever in the history of this world produced such dreadful results as this religious abnormality? Look at our religious wars and persecutions. Is it possible to imagin the parallel of these in cruelty? What could be more dreaded than the thought of a repetition of these things? This disease is quite like other diseases in this, that at certain times it is more malignant than at other times. It has had during the past many serious outbreaks; at such times its victims hav been almost innumerable. Note this disease in the history of Spain for three hundred years. During these, on an average, one thousand a year were imprisoned or murdered, thus aggregating three hundred thousand of the best and most intelligent men and women of the Spanish nation; all of this under an intensified attack of this disease. Take the massacre of St. Bartholomew, in which sixty-three thousand Christians were murdered in one night by Christians. What a fearful mental malady; what religious insanity; what a malignant form this religious disease assumed! Who can claim that these people were sane? No, no; they had religion, and here is only one of a million like expressions through its frightful history. Allow me not to think that these people were rational, were sane. To think them thus would be to blacken and defame the great human heart beyond any possible redemption. See the bloody history of witchcraft, then think it possible that the cruelties practiced upon these poor innocent mortals were perpetrated by sane people.

Take the history of demonology, do we not find all the symptoms of mental disorder—an intense malignant type of religion? A little more than two hundred years ago, on Boston Common (the Athens of America), a girl sixteen years of age had been reported by the mother to the priesthood, that she had disobeyed her mother, and in obedience to the divine book was led without the gates and stoned to death. This is religion. This is that dreadful mental deformity which has defiled the race, and damned a woman with the touch of impurity because she was a mother, and sent her babe out into the world with the curse of God almighty's depravity upon it. I confess that I do not feel at liberty to compliment our humanity in such disparaging terms as to say that these cruelties and deeds of infamy were, or could hav been, done by sane people. These deeds, so terrific in deep depravity, could not hav been conceived by healthy, intelligent human beings. So, in charity to our race, as well as in fact, we are compelled to read the history of our humanity under the mitigating circumstances to the jury that the actors in this dreadful religious drama were insane. They had the fatal disease, religion. Again, in demonstration of the truth of our definition, the diagnosis of this disease in its incipient form allies it to many other diseases. They usually foreshadow a morbid condition, and quite a decided tendency to look with comparativ indifference on those things and relations which largely made up the concern of daily life. The diagnosis at this point shows quite a tendency toward unstable mental equilibrium—seen further in the fact that the world, and the things in the world, are losing hold on him. The things that he once loved he now hates.

And he reads, "He that cometh unto me and hateth not his father and mother cannot be my disciple." He shows signs of other-worldly-mindedness. His eyes are turned toward heaven, he begins to feel divine drawings, and the work of regeneration is going on; the new birth is near at hand. Such being the true diagnosis, the treatment is readily suggested But the treatment in this disease differs somewhat from the usual treatment which is given in other diseases. Instead of administering remedies to reduce the excitement, those are given which tend to increase the malady. His kindhearted physician will recommend to him such remedies as will promote the severity of the attack, with the assurance that the "kingdom of heaven is at hand," and he is impressed with the necessity of looking away to Jesus in the exercise of a living faith and by faith receive the ingrafted word of life, which will make him a child of God. All of these measures tend to strengthen the disease, and when he is sufficiently doctored he is turned over to the nurse, the church, who will attend strictly to business and see that the excitement is kept up until the work is done and he is confirmed in this disease, "which redeems him from the curse of the law, and makes him truly a child of God." And thus we see that he is doctored and nursed into this disease instead of out of it. He is now not of this world; he is an heir to a mansion in heaven. The prognosis in this case is quite evident. It indicates that in a short time he will become so completely confirmed in this disease that he will find out that "I am holier than thou," and then if he does not leave for Canada, he will become so deeply impressed with his oneness with God that he will wish that he had the power to make everyone feel his authority, and if need be, to burn all heretics, especially Mr. Ingersoll, and sit as judge on the judicial bench in New Jersey, where he could charge a jury in such a way as to force the conviction of a heretic, guilty or not guilty. This is what would be called a favorable prognosis—"He got it; he has come out." If this can be seen from any other standpoint to be anything but a disease, partial insanity, I confess that I am unable to see it.

The Effect of Christianity on the World.

In this essay I use the word Christianity in the sense of belief that Jesus is a teacher specially inspired and divinely exalted above all other men. People who call themselvs Christians believe as much as this almost without exception; and most of them place Jesus even higher. At all events, we must giv the word a large enough meaning to take in Roman Catholics; and we must keep in mind the history of all the great churches, in order to be able to speak justly of the working of the system which they hav kept up. I hav for many years carefully studied the state of thought before and after the advent of Christianity; and I feel confident that there are two ways, at least, in which this religion has exercised a pernicious influence on the world.

In the first place, it is largely to Christianity that we owe the great place which theology has taken in human thought during the last eighteen hundred years. The questions of the personality of God, of the liability of going to heaven or hell, of the advantages of particular ceremonies, and of the inspiration of certain books hav attracted such attention, during the sway of the Christian church, as they never had in Europe before. At the period when the church was most powerful, we find legions of volumes written about theology, and scarcely a word about anything else. The few chronicles, secular poems, and treatises on subjects of practical interest are merely an oasis amid the great desert of religious books. No other religion could hav done more to turn the minds of men so far away from all they needed to think of most. And certainly if our forefathers in the Middle Ages had been less religious, they would hav given their attention to improving their own condition rather than to disputing about the nature of God, and taken more pains to make this life on earth heavenly than to settle the precise boundaries of heaven. I speak of the Middle Ages, because Christianity had a power then in Europe which she has never had since. No difference of creed could now call forth such crusades as laid waste the vineyards and destroyed the cities of Languedoc. Never again will Europe hear the tocsin of St. Bartholomew or see such fires as were kindled by the Inquisition. The keen interest in theology which led to such crimes must be called characteristic of Christianity rather than of the Middle Ages or of Roman Catholicism, for the period when Protestantism had most power in New England was also that in which we had no literature but sermons, and no public amusements but executions of Quakers and witches.

Where do we find more of Christianity than in the New Testament, and what writers do we find more keenly interested in theology than Peter, Paul, and John? None of the authors of the Old Testament, or of Greek and Roman literature, ever looked so intently up to heaven and away from earth as did these apostles. No wonder that literature declined as soon as Christianity became prevalent; that science passed away for the time; and that poetry and philosophy were silent except when theology gave them themes on which to speak! Nowadays we hav a great secular literature; we hav keen interest in politics, business, and science; and this is because the church is growing weak, and theology has retreated into the background. Thus one of the plainest effects of Christianity has been to prevent men from paying proper attention to the practical matters they needed most to think of.

But even now it is sad to see how much time is wasted by preachers and congregations in thinking of subjects about which nothing is really known. and no one is ever likely to get any knowledge of the slightest value. If all these ministers and their people could suddenly take up morality, and giv all their thoughts to such questions as health, education, and politics, the world's rate of progress would double at once. I can look at the tone of thought encouraged in our churches only as the greatest waste of mental power the world has ever seen. Progress has found its fiercest opponents in the popes. Protestantism is more favorable to family life and civic liberty than Romanism, but even now we find business-habits and the making of money preached against continually. Scarcely anywhere, even among liberal Christians, do we find full recognition of the real sanctity of industry, economy, and enterprise, or the real guilt of extravagance and indolence. Still the church givs most of her strength to laying down precepts which are not to be followed, except in monasteries and nunneries. Thus she fails to giv people such help and advice as they really need. What we want is a morality which will enlarge business life, and not try to cramp it; which will show people how to amuse themselvs innocently, and not condemn all social pleasures indiscriminately; which will make the home prized as the holy of holies—the true temple of God. It is consecration of this life and this earth that we need. We ask it of Christianity, and still she bids us renounce the world, the flesh, and the devil, make no attempt to lay up riches here on earth, abstain from all worldly pleasures, and strive to enter some unreal heaven hereafter, instead of making our best of the real heaven which social sympathies and family ties enable us to establish here. Morality is harmony with our social relationships, our family ties. the demands of our business, and the needs of good government. Morality means making the best possible use for our mental and physical growth, and for the happiness not only of ourselvs but of our neighbors, of all the opportunities given by social institutions, by family life, by possession of property, and by maintaining free government. The religion which disparages these holy opportunities and privileges may call herself the friend of virtue. She is such a friend as the tamed bear in the fable who tries to brush off a fly from the forehead of his sleeping master, and cracks his skull.

A second peculiarity of Christianity has been the importance it has given to correctness of belief. Thinking so much about God, Christ, and the devil, heaven, hell, and the sacraments, has led Christians to believe some views blessed and other views accursed. The view which is blessed in the eyes of one Christian is cursed in that of another; but all Christians, while they differ about whose view is the truth, agree that the truth, whatever it is, has a saving efficacy. All honor Jesus, and each sect thinks its own mode of honor holy and all the others unholy. Neither Judaism nor any form of paganism has laid such stress on definit belief. Moslemism copied from Christianity the doctrin that he who happens to hold the favorit creed is to be saved by his faith and his neighbors lost by theirs. All Christian sects agree in this except the Unitarians, and even among them there hav been persecutions. Even Unitarians sometimes look at Infidels and unbelievers as vicious.

Orthodox Protestants, like Catholics, treat heretics, skeptics, rationalists, and Freethinkers as natural enemies. But what is a heretic? A man who chooses for himself what to believe. So a skeptic is a man who makes inquiries. A rationalist is a follower of reason. That Freethinkers and Christians should be natural antagonists speaks for itself. The French hav a word, mécreant, for those hav given up Christianity. We hav taken that same word and made it English, as "miscreant." Still preachers speak of science as their enemy, and they are right, for the victory of science means the destruction of all intolerance. We hav outgrown Torquemada. No more crusaders will gather to destroy whole cities, like Béziers, where forty thousand men, women, and children were massacred together amid shouts of "Kill all; God will know his own!" But the spirit which prompted these horrors has not passed away. It still survives in the creed sacred to the whole Church of England: "He therefore that will be saved must thus think of the Trinity." This same spirit of persecution is sanctified by attributing to Jesus the words: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." These baleful words are not in the best manuscripts, but there is reason to fear that even Jesus called those who would not listen to his disciples more guilty than the sinners of Sodom, and denounced refusal to accept his inspiration as the unpardonable sin not to be forgiven, neither in this world nor in the next. The Epistles and the Apocalypse agree with the gospels in denouncing the wrath of God against all heresy and unbelief. All this is simply hostil to mental activity, which we honor as one of the highest duties of men.

We believe that we are morally bound to develop and strengthen our intellects. Jesus and the apostles did not. There is not a word in the New Testament to show that they thought a man has any intellectual duty, except to believe what they told him. They thought the best quality of the intellect was passiv receptivity: "Blessed are the poor in spirit," "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of heaven as a little child, he shall not enter therein." Remember how Paul sneers at "the opposition of science," and at "philosophy falsely so-called." All Greek wisdom was condemned by the apostle, as Jewish learning was by his master when he denounced lawyers and scribes. No wonder that the first great result of the establishment of Christianity was the Dark ages. I am coming back to evils already mentioned. Both these errors of Christianity, the insisting on faith as salvation, and the attempt to fit man for heaven rather than to make earth more fit for man, hav worked in this same way. They hav hindered knowledge and encouraged ignorance; they hav done this knowingly; and thus they hav been led, though unconsciously, to check virtue and suffer vice to grow unchecked. And this neglect of morality has been also fostered by the failure of the church to show proper reverence for the family or the state, and by the total neglect of Christianity to giv due honor to the business virtues, and show how well-adapted industry, prudence, and enterprise are to assist the development of still nobler qualities. I do not deny that Christianity has done good, but these evils outweigh all its benefits in my eyes. I am glad of all the opposition made to it by organizations of Liberals under any name. I rejoice in all that is done by Freethinkers independently. I honor the great poets on our side, Shakspere, Goethe, Shelley, Swinburne, Emerson, Victor Hugo. I hail the prog- of science. Before that inevitable reign superstition and bigotry must pass away. F. M. HOLLAND.

Our Indian Problem.

Having lived for twenty-eight years upon the "border," and during that period traversed the entire region bounded by British Columbia, the Rocky Mountains, Mexico, and the Pacific, I hav constantly been surprised that the "reservation system" continued to receive the sanction of our wise statesmen, when a critical analysis of what has been accomplished, compared with what was (or should hav been) intended, would hav pronounced that system a farce and a fraud—a farce so far as the Indians are concerned, and a fraud upon the people who support it.

Apprehending that the ultimate object sought is to bring Indians to adopt civilized modes of life, in order that they might subsist upon the products of a more limited area of territory, I hav wondered why a plan should hav been devised under which a colony of intelligent and industrious white families would inevitably degenerate into ignorant vagabonds in a few generations. That Indians can adapt themselvs to civilized life is demonstrated by the fact that a few hav done so, not because of the plan, but in spite of it. Nomads rarely, if ever, abandon their modes of life voluntarily. The dolce far niente of such an existence has a charm not to be lightly broken; therefore few Indians will establish homes while a precarious subsistence can be obtained from the forest, the stream, and a herd of ponies, with an occasional "lift" from "Uncle Sam." And I will here observe that this generous "uncle" has just completed a school-house, at a vast cost, that is ample to accommodate two hundred pupils, with boarding and lodging, on the "Colville reserve."

But this "uncle" did not take into consideration the influence of the Catholic mission near the school, or else he would hav built one suitable for about a score of pupils, unless, indeed, he intended to place the school under control of that "mission," seeing that the "father" has not only set his own holy face against the school, but is doing all he can to set the Indians against it as well. He (the priest) has gone so far as to call a general assembly of the Indians for the purpose of choosing a chief to supersede Tonascut, the present great chief of the reservation, and recognized as such by the Indian Department, simply because it was through Tonascut's efforts that the school was established, and because Tonascut is wise enough to desire a secular school instead of a parochial one. I prophesy that the priest will win the game, i.e., that either the Catholic church will control the school and absorb its revenues, or else there will be no attendance worth mentioning. This kind of strife is the legitimate result of the "reservation system." The general scramble for the golden eggs which the reservation "goose" lays leaves little time to be devoted to the true interests of either the Indians or the government.

The remedy for the defects in the reservation system is the abolition of reservations.

The solution of the "problem" lies in the idea embodied in the phrase, "lands in severalty," but that idea has not yet been fully realized even in theory, because its advocates are still hampered by reservation shackles. The "lands in severalty" idea must not mean "lands in severalty" within the limits of the present reservations, with all the appendages of agents, farmers, doctors, teamsters, etc., etc. The abolition must be absolute. Not a trace of the present system must remain. The Indians must be permitted, nay, caused, or forced, if you please, to take lands anywhere off, as well as on, reserved territory.

All tribal relations must cease, and the individuals scattered far and wide. They must not be permitted to herd together in Indian communities, as they will cling to the traditions and habits of savage life, and adopt only the vices of civilization, brought to them by the generally low, vicious white men who are found herding with them.

The change must be radical and complete wherever "lands in severalty" is adopted.

The Indians must pass from federal to state or territorial control, and be governed and protected by the same laws that govern and protect their neighbors. The children must be taught in the same schools with the white children, and grow up, just as hundreds of half-breeds are now growing in many places, to be respected members of society. This is the only solution that is possible, except gradual extermination, as at present practiced by the "reservation system," which, in a few more years, will not leave enough Indians to employ the energies, talents, morality, and honesty of one "Indian agent."

Has Cupid Hit our Brother?

Peter Eckler in the Ironclad Age.

I fully indorse your commendation of the merit of the "descriptiv writing" of George E. Macdonald, and recall with pleasure his description of a carriage ride in New Hampshire, which was printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 11. 1886.

On this interesting occasion George ingenuously admits that he did not go out riding alone. He admits the presence of a companion—uses in a general way some complimentary words about the girls of New Hampshire, and seems to hav returned from the trip in a happy and contented state of mind. Everything seemed to him joyous and pleasant. He says:

> I liked the looks of New Hampshire this year better than ever before. The farms were greener, the barns were fuller than last year; people appeared more cheerful. I got the same horse and carriage I had in other years. The carriage rode easier, and the old horse had grown more contemplativ. He is a thoughtful beast. Going up hill he stopped often to think, and having come to a conclusion, he would take a long breath and go on again. I imagined it took him longer to make up his mind than previously. His forelegs hav got sprung a little out of perpendicular. I should say they would fit pretty closely the inside of a barrel stave. His appetite, I was gratified to observe, remained unimpaired. I gave him his own way, and the spider spun his web undisturbed between the whip and the dashboard.

We are left in complete ignorance as to the identity of the party of the second part on this memorable excursion. On this point our writer is provokingly reticent. We only know that on that day and that afterward George became a dreamer. His favorit place for dreaming was under an apple-tree on the old homestead where he had passed his childhood. He says:

> The hours they flew on angels' wings,

> I sat under the old apple-tree in the dooryard, where we used to roll about when we were boys. The tree is dead and furnishes hardly any shade; so I sat in the sun and watched the summer clouds go over, like ships sailing in the sky. The old times came back, and old familiar faces clustered around, and I saw them best with closed eyes. The hum of bees and the drone of vagrant flies sounded now as then, and with their music came memories, floating drifting, appearing, and disappearing, like things seen through a glass reversed - distant but distinct. Thus I saw my friends not only as they are now, but as I knew them then; not only those who still walk the earth, but those who hav sunk back to that dreamless sleep from which they first awakened on this life. So under the apple-tree I dozed and dreamed.

I think no reader will deny the beauty and merit of the above extract, and that all will heartily indorse your generous praise of Macdonald's writings. He writes naturally feelingly, truthfully.

There is, however, another view of this subject which, while it does not detract from the beauty of Macdonald's style, may serve to render it in this instance still more interesting.

Whenever a young writer and printer from New York is satisfied to go riding, with a chosen companion, behind a "contemplativ and thoughtful" old horse in New Hampshire, and allow the "spider to spin his web undisturbed between the whip and the dashboard"—whenever he seems willing, like little Sally Waters, to sit in the sun and listen with closed eyes to the humming bees and droning flies, and there doze and dream, we may mistrust why this is thus. We may suspect that the artful pagan god, with the silver bow, called Cupid by mortals, has again launched an unerring dart.

On this subject, however, I will not further digress, but close by repeating your remark that such descriptions as George givs us are "most admirable." In this weary humdrum world it is surely a relief to listen to the > Sounds and sweet airs that giv delight and hurt not, and to recall the old scenes, the old times, and the old friends of our childhood.

TWO THINGS WANTED.

First. We want some money from every friend who owes on his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The balance in the bank from which to draw to satisfy the paper manufacturers and the printer is very small, and we must increase it, or run in debt. There are many hundreds of dollars owing us by subscribers, and we desire to kindly but firmly call their attention to the matter. We need the money, and it is not right for them to keep it from us. We would also respectfully suggest to those whose subscriptions expire during the present month that now is the time to renew. We would call attention, too, to our club rates. Get a new subscriber, and so get your own paper cheaper.

Second. We once more ask our friends to send us the names of all the Infidels of their acquaintance who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. The intention is to send them sample copies of the paper with the hope that they may subscribe.

Religion in Young Massachusetts.

Fifty years ago the estimation of Americans of "our forefathers" ranked them all as saints, and their glory was sung and chanted without cessation. A critic of the Puritans was eyed askance, and berated as a heretic. This was because the true history of Massachusetts had been skilfully concealed, only a few antiquarians having the smallest conception of the real state of affairs existing in the Puritan colony. Once in a while, however, some public speaker hunted up a few facts and divulged them; then some historian revealed a few more, and gradually the halo around the pilgrims' heads was found to be of a rather moonshiny character. To-day, if one wants a simile for meanness, for bigotry, for intolerance, for cold-blooded cruelty, he quotes the Massachusetts Puritans.

In Brook Adams's "Emancipation of Massachusetts," just published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., we hav a revelation that ought to remove the pilgrims forever from the role of martyrs and heroes, and place them in a deserved pillory, scorned by the whole world. No historical work that we hav read recently excites such feelings of contempt for the period of which it treats as this book by Mr. Adams, which follows the religious development of the Puritans from Plymouth rock to the Revolution. And while Mr. Brooks closed the story too early—for it was not until 1833 that the legal separation of church and state in Massachusetts was effected, and even now the separation is not fully complete—yet he givs enough to show that Christianity superimposed upon undeveloped and intolerant people makes the worst and most cruel despotism possible.

The first compilation of laws made for the government of the colonists contained a penal code copied word for word from the Pentateuch. These were incorporated in what was—most ironically, it seems to us of the present day—called "The Body of Liberties," the work of the Rev. Mr. Ward, pastor of Ipswich. The influence and power lay entirely with the clergy, who as early as 1631 had enacted a law that no man should be admitted as a member of the body politic unless he was first a member of the church. The town meetings, therefore, became at once church meetings, and the government was purely theocratic. The minister stood at the head of the congregation, and molded it to do his will. He held the key to the situation in holding the power to admit to membership in the church. The temporal power was entirely in their hands. They were the arbitrators between the magistrates and the deputies, and their decisions were based upon religion. One question asked of one of these ministerial boards was "whether a judge be bound to pronounce such sentence as a positiv law prescribes, in case it be apparently above or beneath the merit of the offense?" The answer of the ministers was that the punishment should fit the crime, and the example adduced was this: "So any sin committed with a high hand, as the gathering of sticks on the Sabbath day, may be punished with death when a lesser punishment may serve for gathering sticks privily and in some need." It will be seen from this that the clergy early trained the people in hypocrisy as well as cruelty. In 1635 it was enacted that no church should be formed by anyone without first securing the consent of the "elders of the greater part of the churches of this jurisdiction." Thus was conformity secured; it was made permanent afterward by giving the magistrate power to "put forth his coerciv power [on "schismatical churches"] as the matter shall require." In 1648 they adopted the Westminster Confession of Faith, and were then provided with all the essentials of religion. The clergy were in full power; the laws had been made to suit them; the religious standard adopted by which to gage all professions; and, as the last measure needed by the clergy, the building of meeting-houses was forbidden without leave from the town or the general court, both of which meant the ministers. The New Englander, then, was the vassal of his priest, and Winthrop, whom Mr. Adams calls the most enlightened magistrate the ecclesiastical party ever had, was so much a slave that he wrote: "I honored a faithful minister in my heart, and could hav kissed his feet." The clergy paid no taxes, and were not amenable to criticism. For saying "she had as lief hear a cat mew" as Mr. Shepherd preach, Ursula Cole was sentenced to pay a fine of five pounds or be whipped. In those days five pounds were equivalent to between $125 and $150 now. The ministers tolerated not the slightest opposition even from their most devoted retainers, and were not satisfied with the submissivness of their flocks unless they publicly wept when the minister administered admonition and reproof from the pulpit.

From this point on to the Revolution were enacted those scenes of cruelty which must everlastingly disgrace American history and the name of Puritan. Burning with fanaticism and love of power, the ministers regarded persecution of heretics as duty they owed to Christ and to the state. "The good that is brought to princes and subjects," said John Cotton, "by the due punishment of apostate seducers and idolaters and blasphemers is manifold." "All motivs," writes Mr. Adams, "combined to drive them headlong into cruelty; for in the breasts of the larger number even the passion of bigotry was cool beside the malignant hate they felt for those whose opinions menaced their earthly power and dominion; and they never wearied of exhorting the magistrates to destroy the enemies of the church." The fundamental principles of the theocracy, therefore, were persecution of opponents and death for heretics. One of the earliest laws punished blasphemy by death, and special punishments were devised for Antinomians, Baptists, Quakers, and other sectaries, such as fine, imprisonment, branding, whipping, mutilation, banishment, and hanging. A few of the cases of persecution which Mr. Adams has dug from ancient records will serve as examples of the hundreds and thousands that occurred. Of the Antinomians they were:

"John Wheelwright, banished. He was sent to Piscataqua—yet 'it was marvelous he got thither at that time, by reason of the deep snow in which he might hav perished.' Twelve others were given leave to depart 'or abide the action of this court; others were disfranchised, and fifty-eight of the party were disarmed in Boston alone.'

"Anne Hutchinson was banished, with her family, only to be slain by the Indians.

"For threatening to appeal to Parliament against the theocracy, Dr. Childe was fined £200; John Smith, £100; John Dand, £200; Tho. Burton, £100; Samuel Maverick, £100, and for a technical offense, an additional £50. A carpenter named Joy was kept in irons four or five days for the same crime, and was released only when 'he humbled himself for meddling in matters belonging not to him, and blessed God for these irons upon his legs, hoping they should do him good while he lived.'"

In 1644 the General Court "ordered and agreed" that all who opposed the baptizing of infants should be banished. This law was vigorously opposed, but it stood, though the court sometimes commuted the punishment to whipping. But Henry Dunster, for refusing to baptize his infant, was driven from his home, "to die in poverty and neglect."

"For protesting against an 'unrighteous act' of his pastor, and turning Baptist, Obediah Holmes received thirty lashes with a three-thonged whip.

"John Speer, who sympathized with Obediah Holmes, was put in prison.

"On the 27th of May, 1688, Jho. Gould, William Turner, and John Farnum, 'turbulent Annabaptists,' were banished under pain of perpetual imprisonment. They did not leave, and lay in jail about a year, then escaping, but were again seized, and died of the cruelties inflicted."

How many Baptists were prosecuted, says Mr. Adams, is not known; "this much, however, is certain, they not only continued contumacious, but persecution added to their numbers." Thirteen of the most influential dissenting ministers in England wrote their Massachusetts brethren, begging them to desist, lest they should be made to suffer in retaliation, but this remonstrance was unheeded. The first meeting-house built by Baptists was seized by a marshal, and they were obliged to fight for its possession. A number of the congregation were summoned to court, admonished, and forbidden to meet in any public place.

The persecution of the Quakers began with their appearance in Boston. Mr. Adams givs its chronology as follows:

1656, July. First Quakers came to Boston.

1656, 14th Oct. First act against Quakers passed. Providing that ship-masters bringing Quakers should be fined £100. Quakers to be whipped and imprisoned till expelled. Importers of Quaker books to be fined. Any defending Quaker opinions to be fined, first offense, 40s.; second, £4; third, banishment.

1657, 14th Oct. By a supplementary act; Quakers returning after one conviction for first offense, for men, loss of one ear; imprisonment till exile. Second offense, loss other ear, like imprisonment. For females, first offense, whipping, imprisonment. Second offense, idem. Third offense, men and women alike; tongue to be bored with a hot iron, imprisonment, exile.

1658. In this year Rev. John Norton actively exerted himself to secure more stringent legislation; procured petition to that effect to be presented to court.

1658, 19th Oct. Enacted that undomiciled Quakers returning from banishment should be hanged. Domiciled Quakers upon conviction, refusing to apostatize, to be banished, under pain of death on return.

Under this act the following persons were hanged:

1659, 27th Oct. Robinson and Stevenson hanged.

1660, 1st June. Mary Dyer hanged. (Previously condemned, reprieved, and executed for returning.)

1660–1661, 14th March. William Leddra hanged.

1661, June. Wenlock Christison condemned to death; released.

1661, 23d May. Vagabond act. Any person convicted before a county magistrate of being an undomiciled or vagabond Quaker to be stripped naked to the middle, tied to the cart's-tail, and flogged from town to town to the border. Domiciled Quakers to be proceeded against under act of 1658 to banishment, and then treated as vagabond Quakers. The death penalty was still preserved, but not enforced.

1661, 9th Sept. King Charles II. wrote to Governor Endicott, directing the cessation of corporal punishment in regard to Quakers, and ordering the accused to be sent to England for trial.

1661, 27th Nov. Vagabond act suspended.

1662, 28th June. The company's agents, Bradstreet and Norton, received from the king his letter of pardon, etc., wherein, however, Quakers are excepted from the demand made for religious toleration.

1662, 8th Oct. Encouraged by the above letter the Vagabond law revived.

1664–5, 15th March. Death of John Endicott. Bellingham governor. Commissioners interfere on behalf of Quakers in May. The persecution subsides.

1672, 3d Nov. Persecution revived by passage of law punishing persons found at Quaker meeting by fine or imprisonment and flogging. Also fining constables for neglect in making arrests and giving one-third the fine to informers.

In July, 1656, Mary Fisher and Ann Austin arrived in Boston from England before any law was made against the Quakers. They were placed in jail, stripped naked, and afterward sent back to England. The jailer kept their bed and Bible for his fee.

Nicholas Upshall, for condemning the Quaker law, was banished.

Sarah Gibbons and Dorothy Waugh, Quakers, were whipped and kept three days in the house of correction without food.

George Wilson was flogged at the cart's-tail with so severe a whip that the Quakers wanted to buy it "to send to England for the novelty of the cruelty."

Elizabeth Hooton and Joan Brooksup were driven into the wilderness and there left. They escaped to the Barbadoes. Elizabeth Hooton returned to Boston with a license from the king to buy a house. She was imprisoned, and sentenced to be whipped through three towns. At Cambridge she was tied to a whipping-post and received ten lashes with a three-stringed whip; at Watertown she received ten more stripes with rods of willow; at Dedham, ten more blows were given her. Then she was carried into the wilderness and left at night among wolves and bears.

John Liddal and Thomas Newhouse were whipped through three towns. Surviving his punishment, Newhouse was again whipped.

William Leddra and Wenlock Christison were hanged.

The Rev. John Rayrer ordered Magistrate Richard Walden to whip Anne Coleman, Mary Tompkins, and Alice Ambrose, at the cart's-end through Dover, Hampton, Salisbury, Newbury, Rowley, Ipswich, Wenham, Lynn, Boston, Roxbury, and Dedham, and on a very cold day Walden "caused these women to be stripp'd naked from the middle upward, and tyed to a cart, and after a while cruelly whipp'd them, whilst the priest stood and looked, and laughed at it. . . . They went with the executioner to Hampton, and through dirt and snow at Salisbury, half way the leg deep, the constable forced them after the cart's tayl at which he whipp'd them."

And so the horrible recital goes on, page after page, until one grows sick and faint at reading the barbarities practiced in the name of Christ by the early settlers of Massachusetts, dominated in every thought and action by the priests. It is not as though these outrages were the acts of a few irresponsible fanatics, for whom the church had no responsibility; the blame cannot be shifted in this way, in spite of the numerous attempts to do so by succeeding clergymen who, like Increase Mather, hav deliberately lied about them. It was the settled policy of the church to drive out contradicting sectaries and doubting heretics. Even Episcopalians, Church of England members, were sent back with a warning that no Episcopalianism was wanted around Boston. The Puritan clergy were the instigators of all the persecutions, and controled the magistrates as fully as they did the communicants. It was church work—all of it—as entirely as were the sermons and prayers. All measures with them were for the "honor of the gospel" and the "prosperity of instituted churches." Both of these cant phrases meant, the welfare and power of the ministers, to maintain which the people must be in subjection in all spiritual and temporal affairs. To accomplish these the Roman church never worked harder, meaner, or more cruelly than did the Protestant clergy of New England.

The relics of their reign are still numerous. They are found on the statute books of most of the states; seen in the practice of the courts, and in the conduct of Christians toward unbelievers.

The clergy to-day are making vigorous, if not entirely successful, efforts to preserve the "prerogativs of the cloth"—prerogativs handed down to them from the archaic age when the priest was the lawgiver, the physician, the one supremely favored mortal—exempt from all burdens and the recipient of slavish homage, of debasing respect, and degrading adulation.

It is well, every now and then, to show the fellows up, or they might form the impression that the world is ignorant of their rascalities.

Mr. Davis and Mr. Reynolds.

The Rev. William F. Davis, the crank preacher who insisted on using Boston Common as a church, has been sentenced to one year in prison. This heavy sentence was imposed because it was not his first offense, as he had been reprimanded on one previous occasion, and lightly fined on another, for the same offense. The trouble with Mr. Davis was that he arrogantly claimed that he had a right to do just as he pleased everywhere because he preached Christianity.

Many papers are now exclaiming against the sentence, characterizing it as an outrage on religious liberty. This is not so. Mr. Davis was arrested for violating a city ordinance in collecting a crowd on the Common, and not for anything he said. We notice, moreover, that the same journals which denounce the prosecution of Mr. Davis are the same which chuckled over the arrest of Mr. Reynolds, and declaimed against him while upholding the authorities. Yet Mr. Reynolds's is the only case of the two in which religious freedom was outraged. Mr. Reynolds spoke on his own property, and invaded no one's right. Mr. Davis insisted on using municipal property as his own, and thereby invaded the rights of every person in Boston. Mr. Reynolds was arrested for what he said; Mr. Davis for where he said it. Mr. Reynolds acknowledged the rights of others, respected them, and made his missionary meeting a purely private affair for those who chose to hear him. Mr. Davis ignored the rights of everybody but himself, claiming that, as he was a missionary of Jehovah, he had rights superior to all others, and that they must hear him whether or no. But because Mr. Reynolds was teaching heresy to Christianity, the press abused him and justified his arrest. Because Mr. Davis was teaching what Mr. Reynolds was exposing, the press call his arrest an outrage on religious freedom. The deductions to be made from this are clearly apparent.

The Difference.

The grandmotherly personage who writes letters from the City Hall signed Abraham Hewitt, mayor, stopped all raffles at the Anti-Poverty party's fair held in this city last week, but allowed the "church of the Sacred Heart" to conduct about a dozen lotteries for the benefit of the priest of the parish.

The principal difference between these fairs was that one was held by people who did all they could to defeat Mr. Hewitt's election for mayor last fall, and the other was held by orthodox Catholics who always vote the Tammany Hall ticket with their eyes shut. No doubt Mr. Hewitt could see in Henry George's lotteries demoralization of the very worst kind. But in the other one the sharpest-eyed argus in the whole mythical or political world could see nothing but beneficient works for the Lord's sake.

It's funny what a difference some things make to some men.

Go Buy a Judge!

In completion of the bargain which the Galveston News seems to hav made with puritanical Judge Cook, to the effect that it would support the Sunday laws if allowed to break them itself, its managing editor has been arrested, taken before Judge Cook on a habeas corpus, and discharged. The legal accusation against him was that he forced his employees to labor on Sunday. The law bearing on his case is article 183:

"Any person who shall hereafter labor, or compel, force, or oblige his employees, workmen, or apprentices to labor on Sunday, shall be fined not less than ten nor more than fifty dollars."

The next article of the law exempts from the penalties of this article a large number of occupations regarded as necessary, but newspaper work is not among them. The only provision relating to newspapers is that they may be sold at all hours of the day. Mr. Lowe was defended by Lawyer T. J. Ballinger, who made a first-rate speech in spots, and where it was not first-rate it was ingenious. It was, however, a quibble for Sunday newspapers alone, but contained much able pleading for Mr. Belo's right to pursue his commercial transactions on Sunday, protected from competing amusement furnishers by the strictest kind of a prohibitory tariff. The scheme is very ingenious, indeed, and we recommend it to all newspaper editors. All they hav to do is to buy a judge—the Sunday laws are already enacted—and agree with him to shut up everything but newspaper offices and the churches, and presto! the road to riches is open. As a relief from the sermons the people will buy the newspapers, and their circulation will grow so large that they can save the salary of the affidavit man! The combination promises untold possibilities.

We should like to hav seen this issue between the fanatics and the people fought out squarely and honestly away down in Texas. We should like to hav seen the News come to the front and fight the fight for liberty as vigorously, at least, as it fought Parson Briggs, of the Texas Christian Advocate, because he accused one of the News reporters of lying. But we search in vain for any intimation in Mr. Ballinger's argument that the Sunday law is an alliance of church and state, in which the state plays cat's-paw for the priests; we look in vain for any indignant reminder to the court that the fanatics should attend to their own business and leave honest men alone; and we are disappointed when we look for a single word to show that the News cares a penny for any more liberty than is granted in the permission to make and sell newspapers on Sunday. As a hucksterer of current Texas items the News is a success; as a defender of popular rights it is a gigantic failure.

But, then, its Sunday edition will contain the advertisments of all the pious shopkeepers of Galveston, and that is a great thing!

Editorial Notes.

Mr. Nathaniel Jarvis, Jr., clerk of the naturalization bureau, has just been investigated, and his accounts are $650 short. Mr. Jarvis is the gentleman who, a year ago, declined to receive Bohemian Rabitscheck's affirmation of allegiance to the United States on the ground that the applicant was an Atheist, and would not make a good citizen. This is one of the cases that do not require comment.

We wonder if it occurred to the readers of last week's Truth Seeker, as it did to the Editor, when he had got the matter ready for the pressman, that, on the whole, The Truth Seeker is favored beyond most papers in its corps of contributors. There is Dr. Oswald, keen philosopher and scientist, giving us the best of his thoughts and historic researches, which other journals would hav to pay him royally for, and would gladly do it if his thoughts were not so heretical. In the same issue Mr. F. M. Holland, author of the most scholarly history of Freethought, one of the ablest thinkers and writers around Boston, tears to pieces the economical theories of another equally eminent gentleman, Mr. Denslow, for years editor of a great daily. Then came Mr. Putnam, jolly and jubilant, describing unpoetic fields with poetic fire, until he arouses an enthusiasm in the reader akin to his own. Following him the practical Reynolds, plain of speech and strong of blow, setting down the good and bad hotels impartially, but with malice for none; then Edgeworth, a bookworm and linguist of wide repute, possessing technical knowledge almost without end; fifth, the Quixotic, dogmatic, and illogical but sincere Malcolm, always wanting to do good; sixth, Mr. Burnham, the finished orator and writer, a minister in the past, now a preacher of the present, acute in reasoning, strong in statement, and implacable in hostility to error; and seventh, "Billington"—a name assumed by a gentleman who has stood high in theological circles and governmental positions, but who now devotes his energies to showing up shams as only he can do it—and one of the most incisiv and forceful men in the country. If these men had been gathered in some scientific or literary monthly with a big name—where most if not all of them are often met with—the daily press would hav had paragraphs saying "the —— magazine for October 15th is occupied by a number of uncommonly strong writers," and the editor of the magazine would be happy as the presses were kept busy printing edition after edition. But these are not all who make The Truth Seeker valuable. The outspoken sentiments and plain matter-of-fact recitals by the friends who write short letters to their favorit paper, telling which lecturer last visited them and how they liked him, and when another was expected there; or letting the Liberal world know what deviltry the Christians of their neighborhood are up to; or penning obituaries pathetic because sincere; or instructing some other correspondent, or saying a good word for the persecuted of the family—these compose a feature no other paper has, and make a bond of union which is the life and strength of Liberalism. Together with the Children's Corner, and a few minor beauties thrown in, we think The Truth Seeker is a good journal for Liberals to patronize. If they did but know it, they are getting through our columns the best thoughts of the best men of the century.

New Editions of Books, and New Prices for Old Books.

A new edition of Prof. Felix Oswald's "Secret of the East" is now in press, and will be issued shortly. Price one dollar.

The price of Gibbon's "History of Christianity" has been reduced by the publisher from two dollars to a dollar and a half. It is a necessary book for every Freethinker. Mr. Eckler has also cut the price of "Voltaire's Romances" from two dollars in cloth to a dollar and a half, and in paper to one dollar. Half calf, or half morocco, marbled edges, is still four dollars. We can supply them promptly.

The Motto card, "Reason is a Better Guide than Fear," has been changed by the publishers to "Reason is the Lamp of the Mind." The former is no longer on sale; the latter can be supplied to all at twenty-five cents each.

Saladin's "God and His Book" is on hand from London, the six pamphlets gathered into one book, cloth bound, and selling for a dollar and a half. It is worth ten dollars to every Freethinker who likes to "corner the parson."

Mrs. Anna Zimmerman writes to Mrs. Slenker that she is delighted with "Little Lessons," as it is all for assimilation by the children, and is not padded out as children's books are apt to be. Echoes from Sunny Land regards it as "just the book for children." Mrs. Zimmerman also regards "John's Way," another of Mrs. Slenker's works, as "the best of books."

Thomas Paine's works still hold their own with the Liberal reading public, and we are printing new editions of the "Age of Reason," and "Common Sense." Since Mr. Bennett purchased the plates of Paine's books we hav sold a great many thousands of them, and expect to sell more. We presume Thomas Paine is responsible for the Infidelity of more people than any other man except Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

A new edition of Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man" is in press, and will be completed in time for the fall trade, and for winter reading. There is no book on our list which we can more cheerfully recommend than this.

Letters from Friends.

NEWPORT, ME., Oct. 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Is there no one of all your many correspondents that has any remarks or words of commendation for the truly inspiring words of your correspondent "Alhaza," of Lexington, Ky.? Read those grand words: "A gift at every poor man's door will cause him to follow the giver;" and, "Do people crave excitement? Let there be a holy rush toward the abodes of wretchedness." The whole letter is full of grand inspiration. If the writer will send me his, or her, address, I would be pleased to send a paper. SEWARD MITCHELL.

NAPA CITY, CAL., Sept. 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I like your paper so well that I can't well refuse to renew my subscription, and Heston's pictures so perfectly represent the Bible characters that they are a treasure within themselvs. They speak and convey ideas to the minds of many much more effectivly than any written descriptions of the same subjects. I hav delayed a little in order to get a new subscriber to join us. He has been raised, and always lived, under the shadows of the orthodox church, and you know it takes a man and a manly effort to break the shackles. I feel that he possesses all the qualities of a true man, and I am sure he will hereafter be an independent thinker. R. F. GRIGSBY.

REDDICK, ILL., Oct. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week came promptly to hand. and its contents were duly assimilated. I like it better every week. I read the Boston Investigator and also the well-named Ironclad Age.

If every individual of this lovely little planet of ours would go aboard one of these grand old vessels they would verily outride the storms of superstition, bigotry, and ignorance. They never founder at sea nor get overloaded; they are three of the stanchest ships that plow the sea of science and reform. My word for it, read those three papers, and you will never be left in the slough of doubt and disappointment. Long may they float and their banners wave! I hope to see some or all of THE TRUTH SEEKER attachés at the Congress at Chicago. C. B. HUNTER.

SUNSET, TEXAS, Sept. 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to your notice I inclose $3 for continuation of THE TRUTH SEEKER from October 27th one year. The funds would hav been sent without the notice, for I cannot do without the inspired weekly instalments of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like every part of the paper; can tolerate even Friend Grabill. John Bushel has aroused a tiger in a Baptist brother out here, who says he will write to him and make him take back assertions made in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 10th entitled, "Wonderful Absurdities," page 579. The book, "Men, Women, and Gods," I bought of you started out on an errand of mercy. One man who got it read it and sent it on, but paid me for the book. I don't know where it is now, but, Speed the journey! is all I've got to say. "Bible Morals" has gone where the wind listeth. So may it be.

I send seventy-five cents for "Christianity a Reward for Crime," "Bible Fabrications Refuted," "The Origin of the Christian Bible," and a "A Vindication of Masonic Right;" also "The Public Schools and the Catholic Church."

HARRIET DAVIS.

SNOHOMISH, WASH. TERR., Sept 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Circumstances—the loss of my home, my ill-health, etc.—compelled me, to my great regret, to leave Kansas, which I did with a heavy heart. Please send my TRUTH SEEKER to this post-office instead of Columbus, Kan. I am treated very kindly here by J. S. Martin, your correspondent and advocate, and others. This is a favorable region for the light of truth and humanity to spread and flourish. Many who came here from the creed-bound and priest-ridden East left behind them much mental darkness and error, and are transplanted to a region more favorable to the growth and ascension of manhood. This region is a great contrast to and complement of the Kansas prairie region—too much wood and water here, too little there. The many Freethinkers here need organizing, need to be brought to the surface, and brought into relations and conditions where they will speak out and work for the true and the good like my friend Martin. The League formed here by Mr. Putnam has been promising, but its growth and prosperity will depend upon the zeal and contributions and work of its individual members. It is the constant every-day work and coöperation of all the members of this or any other Secular Union, and not the temporary spasmodic excitement of a particular occasion, which will assure perpetual growth and success. J. H. COOK.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 30, 1887.

When one is right, one cannot be too radical; when wrong, too conservativ.—Thomas Paine.

That government is best that governs least.—Thomas Jefferson.

MR. EDITOR: If there is truth in the above sentences, the people and their masters, the law-makers (but chosen as servants)—hav they heeded it? Why do we need masters or law-makers? Is it not because we hav been falsely educated from time immemorial that we need the government of one over another instead of learning that we should be a law unto and governing ourselvs instead of others? Elmina says, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 11th: "Here am I in bonds because I tried to learn, teach, and educate; because I sought earnestly for facts and gave freely of them." Is not the idea (government), as I hav above stated, put in force, the cause of her prosecution and persecution? Is she right in her efforts to learn, teach, and educate? If so, can she be too radical? Can she be too earnest and activ in her efforts to remove all that causes suffering, misery, and wrong in and to the human race? Is not knowledge our greatest, highest, and best god, and obedience thereto our savior and only savior? If so, should we not sustain and encourage Elmina and all other teachers of truth in their endeavors, instead of prosecuting and persecuting them? My observation and experience hav shown me there is great suffering and wrong in the human race, and there can be no effect without a cause. If Elmina is seeking for the cause of this suffering, and endeavoring to remove it, should not all assist and sustain her in her holy and pure efforts? I for one think we should. ABNER J. POPE.

FALL RIVER, KAN., Oct. 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 24th, Brother Kelso prefaces his letter with the question, "Is there any such a thing as Liberalism?" (Answer, Yes.) "If there is, what is it?"

It is Liberalism to search for facts, and, having found them, to follow whithersoever they lead. If these facts make myth and fable of the account of creation as found in Genesis, and substitute instead the order of creation as revealed in the science of geology, stand by the facts. It is much better to hav a small belief, predicated on facts, than to hav a huge belief, founded on myths, fables, and falsehoods.

If the facts prove that Adam and Eve were not our first parents; that the story about the garden of Eden, the fall of man, and the so-called plan of redemption, are unscientific, unphilosophical, and foolish, it is Liberalism to discard these myths, and, whenever occasion demands, "speak out in meeting."

If the facts in history, sound philosophy, and reason prove that every man is his own redeemer; that all the Christs and saviors are myths; that the only salvation from sin is to stop sinning; that hell and heaven, at best, are conditions, and not localities; that the "universe as it is" is the only creator, it is Liberalism to follow the facts, and assert our belief accordingly whenever good taste or intellectual independence demands.

It is Liberalism to allow each individual the fullest exercise of his intellectual and moral powers, the fullest freedom of thought and speech, always having due regard for the happiness, the rights, of others.

It is Liberalism to eradicate from ourselvs egotism, selfishness, sordidness, sensuality, and lead pure lives, keeping in mind that each is accountable to himself, and not to an imaginary tribunal far off in the realms of space.

P. VAN HYATT.

WINDOM, KAN., Oct. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Some time since I saw a letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER in which the writer says something about Spiritualism being a cousin to Christianity. As a writer from Brooklyn in your paper of September 17th professes to be a Spiritualist, and so earnestly defends the Bible, it would seem that the first mentioned writer was correct. I therefore wish to correct an error which I think exists in the minds of many persons. There are really two classes of Spiritualists; one class, like the man of Brooklyn, who try to make out that the old heathenish and nonsensical falsehoods of the Bible, such as the story of Jacob's ladder, were inspired by spirits, or were clairvoyant visions. There is another class who look upon the Bible as upon any other book of like absurdities, obscenities, and immoral teachings; who rely for evidence to support their belief upon facts which come within their observation through the aid of modern spiritual phenomena. I am not a Spiritualist, neither a Materialist; but in regard to the belief of a future existence, purely Agnostic. But I cannot see why a man who is free from the superstitious fear of God, hell, and the devil should defend this sickening old bundle of falsehoods, under the guidance of which Christians hav murdered, robbed, and stolen, and hav committed other horrible crimes down to the present time. I would advise the Spiritualist of Brooklyn, and all others who defend the Bible, to read "Spiritualism Sustained," by Col. John R. Kelso, after which they will probably be more willing to behold Mr. Heston's pictures which so admirably throw ridicule upon such stories as Jacob's ladder and others.

W. SILVESTER.

ADRIAN, MICH., Oct. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to make a few statements and to ask a few questions. In an article printed in the Eastern Star (Spiritualist) the writer says that he has been through all the grades—mineral and animal kingdoms—from the eternal previous up to the present time. His age is probably seventy years. This seventy years is of human form. Before his advent to humanity he was through all the elements of geology, pollywog, turtle, and all other grades up to man—dog, ape, horse—yet he says he is a Spiritualist. I admit he is progressiv. He says all other methods are at variance with truth, but still uses the term God as at the head of all future stages of what may be, as well as of the past. Geology and the Bible cannot hinge, for that book says this world and all that's in it was created in a week, and built out of nothing. And the same element, God, made man; he then constructed a woman out of the same material for the companion of Adam. Now, then, the question, Why did he not make a woman, and substitute himself in place of making Adam, if the mode of populating this earth be according to the Bible history? He (God) went to a good deal of unnecessary trouble. Again, if God was the Bible God, the architect of all things and the earth, why did he make a devil to try to thwart and pester him in all future time, well knowing that he would? The devil took God [listen!] up on a high mountain and showed him all the earth, and said that he (the devil) would grant him all the earth if he would bow down and worship him. How could he show him all the earth? as it is proved by demonstration that the world is round. God did not know it was round, although he is said to hav made it. The ungodly woman says:

This world is round and, like a ball,
Seems swinging in the air;
The sky extends around it all,
And stars are shining there.

If the theory be true that the human production was matured by gradual development from vegetation to a full-fledged human being, through all the grades up, how do we know that when we come in contact with some obnoxious quadruped, and spurn it with our feet, we are not kicking one of our near relations? For it is held by some that we again enter into a brute's body. If we hav an existence after this body gets tired and must be dispensed with, it will be a square-toed existence — no probation, no waiting for the judgment—it will be a clean-cut life. Nature does nothing by halves. I cannot conceive of a personal creator—a being formed like a man—sitting upon a literal throne, dictating to his offspring an arbitrary obedieuce. The Bible says God made man after his own image. If this be true, then there is no help for us; we are doomed to eternal misery. It cannot be; we are not to blame for our existence. When the dissolution takes place it will be, "Here goes for the unknown." It will be light or darkness; we know not which. O. S. BARRETT.

SALMON CITY, IA., Sept. 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find an extract cut out of the Salmon City Recorder. It will show you the view that Judge Brezee takes of the decision of the Illinois Supreme Court. It expresses my sentiments. Success to your TRUTH SEEKER. It will be hard to improve on it. L. C. GEERTSON.

JUDGE BREZEE'S OPINION.

The Supreme Court of the state of Illinois has confirmed the decision of the court below in the case of the condemned Socialists. We hav no sympathy with this element, and it would be very difficult to find words expressiv of the contempt in which we hold them. At the same time we hold these men to be improperly condemned to death, and the sentence thus imposed to be one of the most atrocious perversions of law that has taken place either on the continent of Europe or America.

Those men are convicted not because they with their own hands committed the crime of murder, treason, or insurrection, but because they indirectly caused others to murder by writing and circulating newspaper articles, and by making public speeches. Let this principle be once established and it will end in the suppression of the liberty of the press and of speech. Starting with and enlarging upon that decision, no political editor, Democratic or Republican, would be safe from the gibbet were a political riot to occur and a party adverse to the accused be in power.

The execution of those men will hav a bad effect on the labor element. When the hangman shall hav completed his work a feeling of sympathy will be aroused which will become dangerous for the wealthy class. It will make Socialists of tens of thousands of American workingmen who hav heretofore disavowed any sympathy for the foreign agitators.

We hope governor will commute the sentences so that the condemned will not become martyrs. The decision of the court has done sufficient mischief already; its being carried into execution would be worse. No supreme bench of the state of Illinois can make us believe that the judgment in the case is good law.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Oct. 6, 1887.

DEAR FRIENDS: I am receiving so many letters of personal inquiry that I cannot answer them all, so if our kind Editor will permit I'll send one general letter, and perhaps the last before Oct. 31st. Many are inquiring how friends, relativs, and neighbors are looking upon me since the arrest, and how I am feeling personally.

I would say that our immediate family (husband, son, and myself) are as unitedly happy as we ever were, or anyone could wish for. Neighbors seem even more kind than of old, and as for me I must say I hav never been happier than during the past few months. True, there are shadows on the pathway of my life, just as there are on those of all other lives; but the sunshine has so quickly dispersed them as to leave little or no impress behind.

I hav had such a precious communion with so many noble minds and hearts that I feel all the while an uplifting and unfolding, a growing and developing which is so enthusing that I am more than recompensed for all that has come and gone. My motto has ever been to "make the best of what is," and I'm doing it now, and this is why I am full of peace and happiness, even with the sword of fate suspended over me. The sweet blessedness of knowing I hav thousands of friends all over the land who appreciate my work has banished the gloom that hung over me during the first few weeks of my trouble. To-day has been almost brighter than the ones which preceded it. A lovely, mild, sunny October day; one of the days when it seems to be a bliss to be alive. I hav busied myself since early dawn doing my home work, reading a pile of letters, fresh from the office and the hearts of the writers, answering some of the most pressing ones, scanning the newspapers, chatting with callers, caring for baby (my year-old grandson), dealing out papers, books, and vinegar to neighbors—not spiritual sourness—but the material acid which is just now in demand for making sweet pickles. I sent a basket of apples and some sweet-cakes to a sick child, and thus in little things passed the pleasant hours. For variety, when tired of pushing the pen, I ran into a neighbors where a bevy of ladies were quilting, and had a pleasant social chat.

I was both pleased and saddened by reading the "In Memoriam" of Eugene Remsburg: pleased that the child was so beautifully remembered, and saddened to think of the void left in the hearts of the parents and friends by the going out of the young baby life. I hope friends will continue writing, even though I cannot send greeting to each individually. I want to hear from everyone. It is such a great moral support and encouragement to know you are not ostracized and alone. With gratitude to all sympathizers and believers in real freedom, and in a broad, all-embracing charity of opinion, I am, Truly Yours,

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

ELMIRA, N. Y., Oct. 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Much has been said for and against Mrs. E. D. Slenker. I am not in favor of her methods or her outside wanderings. No one can find very much fault with her "Children's Corner," but there is room for sharp criticism in other directions. But I am of the opinion there will be no difficulty in establishing the fact that for months and years, perhaps, a woman Mrs. Slenker supposed to be a good friend was simply a deceptiv enemy. Mrs. Slenker was favored by the editors of many papers. This fact caused jealousy and envy to rankle in the bosom of one who should hav been willing to let Mrs. Slenker rise by her true worth, or fall by her false position without a dead-fall.

I am sure a person who would enter into correspondence with Comstock for such a purpose must some time hav been a Christian—a Sunday-school scholar—and learned the lessons of fraud and deception well. For Liberals to disagree and even become enemies is not strange or uncommon, but to plot with Comstock is outrageous, and deserves the condemnation of all.

The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav not forgotten that, when Helen H. Gardener first came before the public, the fact that she was introduced by R. G. Ingersoll, and was called a Liberal star by S. P. Putnam, roiled the good disposition of a few of the old dames who had starred the country for seventy-five years, and they were inclined to sit down on and dim the glory of Miss Helen; but it was a good deal like John R. Kelso, when he sat down on the hornet's nest: they made a mistake. It also reminds me of an old minister who was enraged because a young man was hired in his place, and he said he could snap the boot heels right off that young chap if they would just giv him a chance.

I hav only this to say in regard to the Slenker matter. The woman who would enter into collusion with Comstock is by nature possessed of the same elements as Comstock. The person who would write Mrs. Slenker a letter of friendship, asking questions apparently in good faith that would lead to answers that, if disclosed to Comstock, would bring trouble—such a person is more contemptible than Comstock, and the sin of such an act ten times more disgraceful than anything Mrs. Slenker could say in a private letter.

It will be but justice all around that the daylight should shine on all the facts in the case. Let the truth prevail, though the heavens fall. Yours for fair play, U. C.

DETROIT, MICH., Sept. 23, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I am heartily glad to see that the venerable advocate of freedom, J. Hacker, is yet able to use his pen, as he shows some of the fallacies of Henry George, but the errors of George are not greater than those of friend Hacker. It is just as far from truth to say that private ownership of land will of itself lead to universal independence as to say that private ownership of land is the cause of poverty. A statement was made some four or five years ago in THE TRUTH SEEKER, by a Mr. Perry (I think), that one-half of the farms in the New England states might be purchased for what the fences had cost; that one might ride for miles and find every farm deserted, and many of them grown over with trees. Now, this would indicate from both Mr. Hacker's and Mr. George's views that Mr. George is right, while I am certain that both are wrong. I hav a relativ who three years ago bought a forty-acre farm, all under cultivation, with good buildings and orchard, near a railroad and twenty miles from this city, for which he paid cash, and now he would be glad to get back what he paid out, and will take less. A labor paper published in Kansas says that the debts in recorded mortgages of one county in that state amount to over seven millions, and that the property of many counties will not sell for one-third the value of such debts. Now, most of the farms of Kansas were taken up as homesteads, and these facts would bear heavily on the side of Mr. George. But we must go farther back than does Mr. George or Brother Hacker for the cause of poverty. Our government has enslaved the people and is the true first cause of poverty, war, vice, and crime. Our government has never been anything but a heavy burthen and a curse from its first formation to this day. It was supposed to hav been formed to protect and preserve the rights and liberties of the people, but instead of doing so it has continued the same enslavement that had before existed under English rule. ALL TAXATION IS SLAVERY. Our forefathers refused to be taxed by England unless they were allowed to send representativs to help to tax (enslave) them. Just as if it made any difference who did the enslaving. And when they had separated from England our ancestors continued all through their seven years of war and misery to tax the people, while they huckstered their credit over the world, trying to borrow the debts of other nations and individuals to buy freedom with. And when they had won all that they had fought so long to obtain, they did not know what it was nor what to do with it. They had declared that it was a self-evident truth that ALL people are endowed by their creator with the INALIENABLE right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. But they never made even the slightest provision for establishing any of those inalienable rights. They went right along, ignoring and alienating every shadow of those rights which no power on earth had a right to interfere with. They even made provision in the Constitution for alienating every right of the people which they had declared so self-evidently to be inalienable.

Article 1 of section 8 of the Constitution says: "Congress shall hav power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to borrow money on the credit of the United States; to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas; to declare war; grant letters of mark and reprisal; to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy; to provide for organizing and disciplining the militia."

All of these provisions are for the enslaving of the people. Every word of them is in contradiction and in direct contravention of the declaration that all men hav an inalienable right which no power on earth can justly interfere with. Every man who believes in liberty should hav this, ALL TAXATION IS SLAVERY, hung up in every room in his house to be read of all men and women. And we must demand that our government shall cease all taxation, and shall create and issue a legal tender money and pay all expenses of government, and continue to do so until every dollar of debt, public and private, shall be paid, and every shadow of slavery be wiped off the face of this country. There never was nor ever can be any other slavery on earth but that caused by a government that taxes its people to support a government that enslaves them by taxing them to support such a useless curse. No one need to be at a loss for the cause of poverty, war, vice, crime, and misery who will study history, and reason from cause to effect. And if Brother Hacker and others wish to see any fruit from their life-work they MUST study these things. J. H. WOOD.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 1st one of the delegates to the International Freethought Convention is reported to hav "thought it unfortunate that a vote should be taken upon a theoretical question," and asserted that "if Freethought is to do good work it must be restricted." I think it pertinent to inquire if restricted thought is really free? and if Freethought is a theoretical question that may be confined in a strait-jacket of partisan dogma, or a universal principle that is equally applicable to all sides of every conceivable question, but is identical with none? I hav always supposed that Freethought, supplemented by intelligence and reason, is an investigator who proves all things and holds fast that which is good; hence, whatever else the Apostle Paul may hav been, he was indisputably an advocate of Freethought, though a Christian. Therefore Freethought is not incompatible with Christianity, priestcraft and Infidelity to the contrary notwithstanding. Except for Freethought, neither Christianity nor Infidelity could hav been possible; and now, evidently with a view to preventing those who would mount higher, they mutually endeavor to kick down the ladder upon which themselvs hav climbed. Hence, I think it should appear that priestcraft and Infidelity are at opposit extremes on the social question, and as far from an intelligent solution as it is possible to go, yet both pretend to hav found the only practical solution of the social problem. Their solution appears to consist in a mutual exposure of each other's sophistries. Not being prepared to question that solution as a primary condition, I shall wish them mutual success.

Some Freethinkers make an investigation of religion a specialty. I shall not think why, unless for the good they hope to find in it, for we should not be so ungenerous as to suspect anybody of the inconsistency of seeking evil, when evil abounds on every hand, and most people of average intelligence desire to escape it. There are some Freethinkers who make the investigation of the social problem a specialty, with a view to finding a solution that will make human existence on this planet universally endurable if not pleasant and desirable. I note a few suggestions by Mr. Denslow, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 24th, that seem to merit the attention of those last-named Freethinkers, and may hav been intended to invite it. Those "free soup houses," supported by the contributions of usurers and profit-mongers generally, were suggestiv of the benevolent highwayman who, having robbed his victim of the last cent, bethinks himself that it will hardly pay to kill the goose who lays the golden egg, and returns a dime to keep the poor devil from starving to death until he can procure more of which to be robbed in like manner. I well remember the efforts that were made at that time, through the press and otherwise, to divert attention from the real cause of "the present hard times." I am also aware of there being a few who were not diverted by those sophistries.

His allusion to "independent labor" is rich though not rare, for our country abounds with demagogs who pretend to be victims of that hallucination. Nevertheless, I am inclined to the opinion that independent labor is a myth, for I hav been on the road more than half a century, and hav not traveled far enough to meet him. But beggars abound on every hand, and profit-mongers are the most importunate beggars in the crowd. He not only solicits patronage himself, but also employs others to solicit it for him that he may realize fraudulent contributions on the false pretense of giving a full equivelent for that he receives, and notwithstanding the well-known fact that consumers pay a hundred per cent more for commodities than the entire labor cost of procuring and distributing them. Hence it should appear that private ownership is an expensiv luxury that is least participated in by those who pay for it—whose labor supports it. The knowledge of such facts, supplemented with the memory of those free soup-house times, and the possibility of their recurrence, should be a sufficient incentiv to intelligent working-men casting about them for protection from such impositions and the consequent calamities. Therefore, it is not protection, but the want of it, that is justly answerable for the sin of having given labor "the big head," and I hope Mr. Denslow will not forget it when he givs us the next instalment of instruction on the subject, for it is anything but agreeable to a protectionist that he should hav cause to defend protection against the unjust aspersions of its advocates whose insane hatred and contempt of self-asserting workingmen misleads them to perpetrate such a stupid blunder as to stab protection in hope of thereby wounding labor.

J. A. TUTTLE.

P.S.—Though not partial to bandying ungenerous and somewhat vulgar compliments, I will suggest the possibility that labor has not a monopoly of "the big head" on the social question. J. A. T.

LEBO, KAN., Oct. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: "N. S.," of Windom, Kan., in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 10th, opens the subject for a few remarks that may benefit some one, if not "N. S."

It is demonstrable that all subjects are bounded by two extremes, to one of which we are prone. A man may eat too much, or too little; talk too much, or too little; work too much, or too little; sleep too much, or too little, and so on through all life's doings. No act can be mentioned or thought of where this possibility is not apparent.

It is demonstrable that as we depart from the mean line between these extremes, where all thrift and happiness dwell, misery, direct or indirect, is inevitable; and, as a rule, the greater the departure, the greater the misery. The morbid excitement found in these extremes is not true enjoyment. It lacks breadth, depth, and tone, and is antagonistic to longevity. Satiety and stagnation follow, and the extremist in one thing soon becomes obtuse in all. The keen relish for enjoyment is gone. But before this stage arrives there is a period that the nerve centers are at a white heat, so to speak, and a rainbow beauty is around and over all. Going to these extremes has brought upon man all manner of mental and physical maladies. A large number are so utterly depraved as to be beyond aid. Through their own and ancestral departures from the happy mean, the equilibrium between the faculties is so far lost that only extinction will wipe out the record of sin and check the propagation of cranks and deformities. This, though dark and discouraging for some, is true as truth, and should stimulate those who can to avoid further excesses.

"N. S." admits he went to an extreme—worked too hard, and broke down, had a severe spell of sickness; then came visions and "whisperings in the air," all of which he attributes to spirits. He can't realize that these phenomena originate within his own shattered nervous system; that they are only pathological indications, for to him these hallucinations seem as real, and as external, as my pen or lamp does to me. But the melancholy feature of the case is, he nurses, courts, and encourages them, while they undermine and will in time dethrone reason. He even tells us, "I would rather not be cured of it."

Well, it would be unwise to attempt to cure one in love with his own disease, but what I say may do some one good who is not so far along as to be hopeless, and for the benefit of such I will talk to him, and let each appropriate what he or she may think good, and be able to use.

I realize that a gratuitous effort is seldom appreciated, and they who need it most are among the first to shout, "Crucify him," but this shall not deter me from doing my duty.

If "N. S." will hug his phantoms, let him do so, and in time he will serve as a warning to those who can reason logically, and thus benefit our race, as a stranded ship warns succeeding mariners of danger near at hand. He can visit any insane asylum and meet many who, like himself, hear "whisperings in the air," and, like him, see horrible and beautiful sights. Having had some experience with the afflicted, perhaps an example may be of interest.

I knew a youth of extra promis—few were his equals, and his superiors I did not know. When but a boy he gained literary notoriety—was a fine mathematician, a logician, a grammarian, and in fact excelled in all he undertook. He became a successful teacher, but soon entered a banking house as cashier, and made a good name for honesty, accuracy, and ability. He took an interest in real estate and loan brokerage, which was also successful, but, like "N. S.," he broke down under the strain; the overtaxed nerves gave way, and like "N. S." he began to see all kinds of visions, and hear "whisperings in the air." To him, as to "N. S.," all this was external and real, without instead of within; and when taken to an asylum, his distemper was found beyond aid, and in conversation with the creations of his own diseased brain his language is blood-curdling and vehement. If not too late—as I apprehend it is—let "N. S." take warning, for his case is a duplicate of the above in many respects. Banish as far as possible all unreal sights and sounds, and go under treatment at once for this morbid condition of your nervous functions. I know nearly all conditions are against you. From the cradle to the grave a greed for the marvelous is fostered by every possible means. The nursery, the Sunday-school, the pulpit, one-half the conversation we hear, and one-half we read is intended to excite feelings already preternaturally activ, and few children are so fortunate as to escape one or all of these soul-blighting inventions, all of which tend to further destroy a healthy and happy equilibrium of mind and body. Spiritualism, of which "N. S." is so enamored, is only a revision of theology stripped of some of its coarseness and vulgarity. It is a legitimate child of theology, and has inherited from its progenitor a morbid love of the marvelous and speculativ, with small love for science or truth. Come out of the clouds, "N. S.," come down on terra-firma, and deal with facts awhile. Set up no claim for yourself or your spirit friends that you can't demonstrate, for it looks silly in you. Your friends can't do as they claim. Of this I am positiv, but if you think they can, come over and I will giv you and them a test, and a fair one it shall be. If they giv me evidence of such powers as you claim, I will make you a present of $100; if they fail, you shall make me a present of a like sum. You will not come; you dare not come. You, and all like you, hav as great a horror of a logical mind as a victim of hydrophobia has of water. S. F.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Be Patient with the Living.

Good friend, when thou and I are gone
Beyond earth's weary labor,
When small shall be our need of grace
From comrade or from neighbor,
Past all the strife, the toil, the care,
And done with all the sighing—
What tender truth shall we hav gained,
Alas! by simply dying?

Then lips too chary of their praise
Will tell our merits over,
And eyes too swift our faults to see
Shall no defect discover;
Then hands that would not lift a stone,
Where stones were thick to cumber
Our steep hill-path, will scatter flowers
Above our pillowed slumber.

Good friend, perchance both thou and I,
Ere love is past forgiving,
Should take the earnest lesson home—
Be patient with the living!
To-day's repressed rebuke may save
Our blinding tears to-morrow;
Then patience, e'en when keenest edge
May whet a nameless sorrow.

'Tis easy to be gentle when
Death's silence shames our clamor,
And easy to discern the best
Through memory's mystic glamour;
But wise it were for thee and me,
Ere love is past forgiving,
To take the tender lesson home—
Be patient with the living!

Watching the Tongue.

Keep a watch on your words, my children,
For words are wonderful things;
They are sweet, like the bees' fresh honey—
Like bees, they hav terrible stings.
They can bless like the warm, glad sunshine,
And brighten the lonely life;
They can cut in the strife of anger
Like an open, two-edged knife.

Let them pass through your lips unchallenged
If their errand be true and kind—
If they come to support the weary,
To comfort and help the blind.
If a bitter, revengeful spirit
Prompt the words, let them be unsaid—
They may flash through the brain like lightning,
Or fall on the heart like lead.

Keep them back if they're cold and cruel,
Under bar, and lock, and seal;
The wounds they make, my children,
Are always slow to heal.
May Love guard your lips, and ever,
From the time of your early youth,
May the words that you daily utter
Be the words of the beautiful truth.

Gentle Children.

It is common to speak of gentle men and gentle women, and there is no reason whatever why we should not also speak of children as gentle also. Boys and girls—healthy, activ, full of fun and all manner of jollity—may yet, withal, be very gentle and kind, worthy to be called gentle children. Kindness is the mother of gentleness. It is a good, old-fashioned Anglo-Saxon word, and full of meaning. The Saxon way of spelling kind is cynd, and besides conveying the idea of pleasant and harmonious feelings, it refers to kinship by blood, to race relationship. The more one practices kindness—the doing of kind acts—the gentler he becomes; and the gentle boy, while liking to play, to run, jump, leap, is quick, also, to be helpful, to see many little things that he can do, and to do them at once, without waiting to be told. The gentle girl, no matter how young, saves her mamma many steps every day. She does not snap and snarl like some little animal when told to do a thing, but goes willingly, with nimble feet, to do it.

Gentle children are joys in the home. They are happy because trying always to make some one else happy. They hav many friends, because everyone likes gentleness, whether shown to human beings or dumb creatures. Then cultivate kindness, which begets gentleness, and strive to be always good and gentle children. S. H. W.

Fainting.

It is surprising how everybody rushes at a fainting person and strives to raise him up, and especially to keep his head erect. There must be an instinctiv apprehension that if a person seized with a fainting or other fit fall into a recumbent position death is more imminent. Always remember this fact, namely, fainting is caused by want of blood in the brain. The heart ceases to act with sufficient force to send the usual amount of blood to the brain, and hence the person loses consciousness because the function of the brain ceases. Restore the blood to the brain, and instantly the person recovers. Now, though the blood is propelled to all parts of the body by the action of the heart, yet it is still under the influence of the laws of gravitation. In the erect position the blood ascends to the head against gravitation, and the supply to the brain is diminished as compared with the recumbent position, the heart's pulsation being equal. If, then, you place a person sitting whose heart has nearly ceased to beat, his brain will fail to receive the blood; while if you lay him down with the head lower than the heart, blood will run into the brain by mere force of gravity, and, in fainting, in sufficient quantity to restore consciousness. Indeed, nature teaches us how to manage fainting persons, for they always fall, and frequently are at once restored by the recumbent position into which they are thrown.

The Bee's Sting.

I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 8th an article from Naturalist Clark about the bee's sting, formic acid, etc., so erroneous that I am constrained to reply, as I do not want to see error promulgated. Clark, I am confident never handled bees in a movable frame hive, and examined their workings daily, or he would never hav made so many erroneous statements. The sting of the honey-bee is barbed, and in that differs from wasps, hornets, and other stinging insects. When a bee givs a good sting, the sting is pulled out of the bee and it dies. Instead of the bee using its sting for the "artistic cell-work," it uses its mandibles and antennæ, two parts of its head. The reason why extracted honey does not keep is because it was not sufficiently concentrated by the heat of the bees before it was extracted, the same as syrups of all kinds will not keep if not sufficiently concentrated. Formic acid has nothing to do with the keeping of honey. All practical bee-keepers will confirm what I hav above stated. Yours for the promulgation of pure truth and knowledge, ABNER J. POPE.

Origin of the White Man.

There may be remains of Stone Age whites, but there are no certain remains of white savages of a low order. We may well doubt if there ever were any white savages; it is more likely that the white men were developed late in the history of the world from ancestors already far on in civilization; in fact, that this civilization, with its improved supply of food, its better housing and clothing, its higher intellectuality, was one main factor in the development of the white type. Here, however, it must be remembered that there is not a white race in the sense in which there is a Carrib race or an Andaman race. It includes several race types, and even the same languages, such as English or German, may be spoken by men as blonde as Danes or as dark as Sicilians. The fair-haired Scandinavian type has something of the definitness of a true race; but as one travels south there appear, not well-defined subraces, but darkening gradations of bewildering complexity.

The most reasonable attempt to solve this intricate problem is Professor Huxley's view that the white race is made up of fair whites of the northern or Scandinavian type, and dark whites who are the results of ages of mixture between the fair whites and the darker nations, though it is perhaps hardly prudent to limit these dark ancestors to one variety as he does. If now we cannot trace the white man down to the low level of primitiv savagery, neither can we assign to him the great upward movement by which the barbarian passed into civilization. It is not to the Aryan of Persia nor to the Semite of Syria that the art of writing belongs which brought on the new era of culture.—Nature.

Correspondence.

SCANDIA, KAN., Oct. 4, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines to-night. I hav never written to you before. We do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but we get it from one of our neighbors. I like to read the Children's Corner very much. We take the Boston Investigator, and would not do without it. I am going to school now—the teacher's name is Miss Nora Harris; she is a very good teacher. My brother is teaching school out in Smith county, two counties west of here; his school began last Monday; he is eighteen years old. We hav a new railroad through here; it is two miles north of our place. There was to be an excursion from Scanda to Fairbury, Neb., last Sunday morning, but they gave it up. I hav one correspondent through the Investigator. I like her very much; her name is Edith Peterson. I was so sorry to hear of the death of your mother. There has been more sickness in this county this fall than there has ever been before; there hav been eight or nine buried in the last two months from the typhoid fever. Sunday one week Mrs. Sherrard was buried; she was an Infidel. The 21st of this month the Dunkards are to hold their meeting; it will last a week or two. I will close my letter, as it is getting long. I wish some of the young readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER would write to me. I remain, Yours truly, MINNIE D. TAYLOR (Age 14).

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Apples of Gold. A Story-Book for the Young Folks. By Miss Susan H. Wixon. Second edition. Price, $1.25. This very excellent work for young masters and misses, has passed through a very large edition, and a second has been issued at a reduced price of $1.25, free of postage. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 50 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

ELEMENTS OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY

FOR HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. S. M. Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2,000 years B.C., on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Slenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixon.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable; it may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.
